Case Made Against Means Testing Medicare Part B Premiums. In a USA Today (9/15, 2.27M) op-ed, Shannon Benton, executive director of the Senior Citizens League, argues against Means testing Medicare Part B premiums, arguing that as "healthier and wealthier seniors see their monthly premiums rise…many are expected to abandon Medicare for private insurance. … Left behind will be the poorest and sickest -- and most expensive to treat -- who will be forced to pay higher premiums and deductibles, something they cannot afford." Benton adds, "The most vulnerable members of our society…should be protected. Means testing might inadvertently lead to poorer health care and increased expenses for those least able to afford the consequences of this costly mistake."

WSJournal Praises Effort To Eliminate Secret Holds In Senate. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M) says credit is due to "a group of Senators who have launched a campaign to get rid of one of the last bastions of government unaccountability, namely the Senate tradition of 'secret' holds. … This practice…has been around since at least the 1960s, though it has become a greater source of political harm with each passing year." The Journal adds, "The holds don't help the credibility of the Senate, either, since many are used precisely so that Senators don't have to go public and acknowledge opposition to a piece of legislation."

OTHER NEWS:

Retail Sales Post 0.2% Growth. The Financial Times (9/15, Pimlott) reports, "US retail sales unexpectedly grew in August, as sales of automobiles were better than feared and lower petrol prices encouraged consumers to spend. Economists had expected sales to fall by 0.1 per cent month-on-month, but in fact they rose by 0.2 per cent, after 1.4 per cent jump in July, a report from the Commerce Department said." The Times adds, "Observers were generally upbeat about the figures. "Consumers are sort of trucking along, although there is gradual slowdown under way," said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Whitehouse, 2.03M), meanwhile, says "American consumers tempered their shopping in August as the price of gasoline peaked at more than $3 a gallon, but a subsequent easing in fuel prices has led some economists to expect a rebound in coming months. … The moderate pace of August sales could suggest that, aside from the effect of the summer spike in gasoline prices, a sagging housing market has begun to take a toll on consumers by reducing their ability to extract cash from their homes."

Stocks Mixed. USA Today/Bloomberg News (9/15) reports, "Stocks snapped a four-day rally Thursday after the government said retail sales excluding autos rose less than economists forecast and an increase in import prices revived inflation concern. … The Standard & Poor's 500 index dropped 1.79 points, or 0.1%, to 1316.28. The Dow Jones industrial average lost 15.93 points, or 0.1%, to 11,527.39. The Nasdaq composite index rose 1.06 points, or 0.1%, to 2228.73." The Financial Times (9/15, O'Doherty) also says "US stocks dipped slightly on Thursday after retail sales data rekindled inflationary fears and pulled the main indices away from four-month highs." The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Ng, 2.03M) reports on the stock numbers in a story headlined "Stocks Slip As Natural Gas Hits Two-Year Low."

New Jersey Attorney Rankings Rankle Some. The New York Times (9/15, Donovan) reports, "Word of mouth is one crucial marketing tool for a lawyer. Getting your name on a list of top lawyers can be another, unless the list is distributed to consumers in New Jersey." The Times continues, "In an opinion that has set off a nationwide discussion, an ethics committee appointed by the New Jersey Supreme Court concluded this summer that a magazine advertising supplement listing the state's top lawyers violated rules of professional conduct. … The focus of the opinion by the Committee on Attorney Advertising was an insert to New Jersey Monthly magazine called New Jersey Super Lawyers, which listed the top 5 percent of the state's lawyers (1,658 of 35,441) and then offered an opportunity to advertise." The Times adds, "The panel questioned the process used to compile the list, but it was also clearly troubled that the supplement was 'designed for mass consumption' by New Jersey residents who may have been misled by what they read. … 'These self-aggrandizing titles have the potential to lead an unwary consumer to believe that the lawyers so described are, by virtue of the manufactured title, superior to their colleagues who practice in the same area of law,' the committee wrote of New Jersey Super Lawyers. … With that, New Jersey became the latest battleground in the long debate over how far lawyers can go to promote themselves. The New Jersey situation offers a snapshot of an issue that has divided lawyers since a 1977 United States Supreme Court ruling that allowed advertising. In this case, the concern is not so much the list as who reads it."

DOJ_NMG_0063257

Pennsylvania Judges Give Themselves Controversial Pay Raise. The New York Times (9/15, Urbina) reports, "The Pennsylvania Supreme Court partly reinstated a controversial raise yesterday that state legislators repealed last year after a popular outcry. … But the ruling said that only judges should receive the raise, not the legislators or other government workers who originally qualified." The Times continues, "The raise, which was passed at 2 in the morning on July 7, 2005, just before the General Assembly adjourned for the summer, was viewed by critics as sneaky and self-serving. It produced a reaction across the state that led to a Supreme Court justice's being voted out of office in November and the defeat of 17 legislators the following May. … In response to the public outcry, legislators repealed the raise in November." The Times adds, "The Supreme Court ruled that the Pennsylvania Constitution prohibited reducing the salaries of judges unless 'all salaried officers of the commonwealth' were also affected. The court said the legislation repealing the raise did not do that because it excluded many state employees. … As a result, the Supreme Court justices will receive the raise, which amounts to more than 10 percent of their current salary, while the rest of the state officials will not. … The court also said the raise for legislators was unconstitutional because legislators are not permitted to receive raises that they draft in the middle of a term before having to face voters again."

GOP Fundraising Advantage Ebbs. CQ Politics (9/15, Benenson) reports if "any prediction is safe in this turbulent and closely contested election, it is that Republican candidates and their affiliated national party committees will raise more money than their Democratic counterparts." But the "fundraising advantages enjoyed by the current GOP congressional majorities over the challenging Democrats are closer than in recent election cycles, according to data presented by campaign finance experts at The Brookings Institution in Washington." Their findings "seem to indicate that Democrats — who are benefiting from President Bush's unpopularity and strong public disapproval of Congress — have enough campaign dollars to seriously compete for control of the House and the Senate." In the "first 18 months of the 2005-06 campaign cycle, the six major national party campaign committees reported raising a combined $574 million, of which $334 million, or 58 percent, was collected by the GOP organizations: the Republican National Committee (RNC), the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC)." Their Democratic counterparts — "the Democratic National Committee (DNC), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) — raised $240 million, or 42 percent, of the two-party total." While the GOP advantage "is substantial, it is actually smaller than the Republicans' edge at a similar point in the competitive 2004 campaign." CQ Politics (9/15, Benenson) also lists the fundraising figures in a historical context in a separate story.

"Swift Boat" Donor Gives $5 Million To New GOP-Leaning 527 Group. The AP (9/15, Evans) reports Bob J. Perry, the "Republican donor who helped bankroll the Swift Boat attacks on Democratic Sen. John Kerry's war record has given $5 million to a new group targeting Democratic candidates." Perry, a Texas homebuilder "with close ties to White House advisor Karl Rove and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, recently made the hefty donations to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group." The 527 group, "which lists Perry as its sole donor — has spent slightly more than $500,000 on television ads and mailings criticizing Democratic Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Alan Mollohan of West Virginia, according to a disclosure form filed last week with the Federal Election Commission." The group "also is distributing mailing supporting Republican Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue's re-election campaign and Jim Nussle of Iowa, a Republican congressman running for governor." The West Virginia and Georgia races "are considered among the GOP's best shots at picking up seats in an election year where some experts believe the party is in danger of losing its majority in Congress."

Davis Taps Former Black Legislator As Running Mate In Florida. The AP (9/15, Skoloff) reports Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis "named a former state senator to be his running mate Thursday, a choice that could lead to Florida's first black lieutenant governor." Daryl Jones, 51, "was the first black candidate to make a serious run for Florida governor, coming in third in the 2002 primary." Jones, "a former Air Force fighter pilot, served six of his 12 years in the Legislature with Davis before Davis was elected to Congress in 1996. Jones was considered an intelligent, independent lawmaker and won respect among colleagues in both parties."

DOJ_NMG_0063258

Casey Discusses "Life Issues" At Catholic University. The Washington Post (9/15, A3, Cooperman, 748K) reports Robert P. Casey Jr., "the Democratic candidate seeking to unseat Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) in one of the country's hottest election campaigns, told a largely Roman Catholic audience yesterday that in his view, 'neither party has gotten it right when it comes to life issues.'" Casey, "a lifelong Catholic who opposes abortion, is the second high-profile Democrat who has recently given a major address defending the place of religion in politics." Casey's candidacy "is viewed by Democratic strategists not only as one of the party's best opportunities to pick up a Senate seat, but also as an illustration of its growing inclusion of politicians who oppose abortion and of its desire to reach out to religiously motivated voters." In his 45-minute lecture "at Catholic University's Columbus School of Law, his alma mater, Casey said that America 'must be a country dedicated to the common good' and that 'my understanding of our common good comes from my family and my faith.'" On abortion, he "called for Democrats and Republicans to 'unite . . . behind the understanding that the common good requires us to value all life.' As an example, he cited legislation proposed by House Democrats that would target 'the underlying factors that often lead women to choose abortion.'" Some of the "sharpest language in Casey's speech was aimed at his party. In 1992, the Democratic National Committee did not let Casey's father, then-Gov. Robert P. Casey Sr., speak at its national convention because of his antiabortion views. Referring to that 'dark night,' the younger Casey said the party 'insulted the most courageous pro-life Democrat in the land, who asked that those who believed in the right to life be accorded the right to speak.'"

Webb Apologizes For Remarks On Women In Combat. CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Blitzer) reported, "In Virginia, Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb is apologizing today for a long-ago claim that women are not fit for combat. It's the latest controversy over words in one of the hottest and increasingly nastiest Senate races in the country."

WPost Says Webb's Use Of Reagan Speech In His Ad Is Fair Game. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/15, A18, 748K) says President Ronald Reagan "seems to have admired" Sen. George Allen's Democratic opponent James Webb. So it "is easily within the bounds of fairness that the Webb campaign is airing an advertisement that includes 10 seconds or so of Mr. Reagan paying tribute that day to Mr. Webb's 'gallantry as a Marine officer in Vietnam.' The Allen camp has cried foul, and an official at the Reagan Presidential Library in California, acting on Nancy Reagan's behalf, has asked that the ad be pulled. Neither protest has merit. The late president's public utterances are not the private property of his library or family." Webb "has neither distorted Mr. Reagan's words nor taken them out of context; nor did Mr. Reagan ever repudiate them."

Cardin Highlights Steele's Ties To Bush. Democratic Maryland US Senate candidate Ben Cardin was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/14) if he can "possibly lose to Michael Steele in this election" since Maryland "is almost endemically a Democratic state." Cardin said, "I plan to take my record in Congress and the state legislature, former speaker of the Maryland legislature, my ability to get things done in this campaign. And I believe we're going to stick to issues. When we stick to issues, the voters of Maryland are going to send me as their next United States senator to Maryland." Cardin noted that Steele "was selected by the President, by Bush, to run as the United States senator. He was recruited by Karl Rove. He's the former chairman of the Maryland Republican Party. He supports the President on stem cell research. He supports the President's economic policies. He supports the President's Iraq policy. I think the people of Maryland are going to understand that they have a choice and their choice is to vote for someone who will be independent and stand up to President Bush."

Connecticut Is "Eye Of Storm" In Democratic Effort To Retake House. ABC World News (9/14, story 8, 2:35, Tapper) reported on the challenges faced by Connecticut Republican Reps. Christopher Shays, Rob Simmons, and Nancy Johnson. The story begins with a focus on Shays, who this week "was late to his own fundraiser, with Barbara Bush. Late because he was attending a funeral, for a 19-year-old Army private killed in Iraq. The war and Shays' support for it is the primary reason he might lose in November." Diane Farrell, Democratic candidate: "Friends of Chris have said to me, I can't do it this year. We cannot continue with the status quo." Tapper: "Forty-four House races are considered competitive. The vast majority are GOP incumbents playing defense. And here in Connecticut, it's the eye of the storm where Shays is one of three vulnerable Republicans. Shays, Rob Simmons and Nancy Johnson, are all in the fights of their political lives, as the northeast becomes increasingly Democratic terrain, just as the South became largely Republican a decade ago." Iraq, "at the moment, appears to be the defining issue. Shays knows that but still supports the war." Rep. Chris Shays: "One of the reasons I have big arguments with my own staff, congressional and campaign staff, about the war in Iraq, is they say that's not a winner. And I say that's not the point."

DOJ_NMG_0063259

Tapper: "Shays moderated his strong support for the war. This week, he's chairing hearings, calling for a timetable for US troop withdraw. For voters at the oyster festival is not good enough."

Dionne Says US Is Seeing Nationalization Of Politics. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/15, A19, 748K), "The United States is witnessing a centralization and nationalization of politics unprecedented in our history. This trend is rooted in the rise of the political consulting industry, vast changes in the technology of campaigning, and the intense competition between the two major parties for control of Congress. There is, as well, the concentration of political money at the national level as Washington-based interest groups, associations and lobbyists not only raise large amounts in political contributions within the capital but also mobilize campaign money from their allies around the country. … So in 2006 the local is not really local, everything is about controlling Washington, and 'independence' is a product being franchised by a national party apparatus."

Anne Richards' Passing Noted. The networks last night each eulogized former Texas Gov. Anne Richards. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 11, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "They were fierce political rivals, but on the death of Anne Richards, President Bush said today, 'Texas has lost one of its great daughters.' Richards, the former governor and Democratic firebrand, died yesterday of cancer of the esophagus. She was 73." CBS (Safer) added, "Anne Richards' leap from obscurity took place at the 1988 Democratic convention when she lit into George Bush, the Republican presidential candidate." Anne Richards: "Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

ABC World News (9/14, story 9, 1:00, Gibson) reported, "With her Texas twang and sharp tongue, she became an instant celebrity at the 1988 convention. With a speech that poked fun of the first President Bush. And also celebrated women." NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 10, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight Texans are mourning a former governor and one of the most colorful figures in modern American politics has tonight left the scene."

Ford Offers Buyouts To Union Workers. The Ford Motor Company has offered its 75,000 union workers a buyout incentive package. ABC World News (9/14, story 4, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "Last January, Ford announced it wanted to trim 30,000 jobs and close more than a dozen plants over the next six years. Then, in July, Ford said it was accelerating that plan. But it wasn't enough. Because now, Ford and the United Auto Workers have agreed on this new, one-time offer, to buy out all 75,000 UAW workers who worked there." Ford is "expected to announce massive job cuts among its salaried, nonunion workers. And possibly more plant closings."

CBS Evening News (9/13, story 3, 1:20, Mason, 7.66M) reported, "Employees will be offered anywhere from $35,000 to $140,000 to leave the company." NBC Nightly News (9/14, lead story, 2:45, Thompson, 9.87M) reported, "It's been a difficult year for the nation's number two automaker. $1.5 billion lost so far. Its share of the market shrink to under 18% as Americans stop buying Fords trucks and SUV's. As a result it's slashing production by 21%."

Krugman Says Technological, Economic Progress Has Done Little For Most Americans. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) that "the debate over whether the middle class is a bit better off or a bit worse off now than a generation ago misses the point. What we should be debating is why technological and economic progress has done so little for most Americans, and what changes in government policies would spread the benefits of progress more widely. An effort to shore up middle-class health insurance, paid for by a rollback of recent tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans -- something like the plan proposed by John Kerry two years ago, but more ambitious -- would be a good place to start. Instead, the people running our government are fixated on cutting tax rates for the wealthy even further. And their solution to Americans' justified economic anxiety is a public relations campaign, an effort to convince middle-class families that their problems are a figment of their imagination."

NYTimes Says Living Wage Proponents Have Moral High Ground. The New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) editorializes that Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley's veto of the "living wage" measure passed by the city council because "mandating higher compensation would do more harm than good," assumes a false choice between no jobs or low-wage jobs. The Times says "Wage gains do not automatically lead to higher prices. … Given Wal-Mart's profits, the company could improve its wage structure and still beat the competition." The Times adds, "The Chicago ordinance raised legal and technical questions. If Mr. Daley had not wielded the veto, it would surely have faced a court challenge. But proponents of living wages have the moral high ground, and are increasingly finding a political voice. Chicago hasn't heard the last of them, and Washington hasn't either."

WSJournal Decries "Big Boss Cronyism" Of New Jersey Government. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M) editorializes, "Last week federal investigators launched a probe into whether US Senator Robert Menendez illegally benefited to the tune of more than $300,000 from a rental-income deal he had with a nonprofit agency that received millions of dollars in federal contracts. … The allegations have sparked a mini-panic among state Democratic operatives, who not so long ago thought Mr. Menendez…had the November election in the bag. Now they see Republican Tom Kean Jr. surging into a lead." The Journal adds, "The more serious issue here is whether Garden State voters are growing weary of the culture of big boss cronyism that has contaminated their government from city hall to the US Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0063260

Bush, Roh Avoid Contentious Issues But Agree To Press For Talks. The Washington Post (9/15, A4, Baker, 748K) reports President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun "agreed yesterday to work together to restart stalled six-party nuclear talks with North Korea, but they skated over their deep differences in how to deal with the isolated Stalinist government in Pyongyang." Bush "stressed the potential benefits to North Korean leader Kim Jong-il if he returns to the negotiating table and ultimately gives up his nuclear weapons." He "avoided the sort of hard-edged tone that in the past has irritated the South Koreans, who want to take a less confrontational approach." The Post says the two leaders "made no concrete progress on the North Korean stalemate" and did not "reach a breakthrough on various other issues that divide them," including a FTA and a reorientation of the military command structure within South Korea. The Post describes relations as "increasingly strained" largely because of the North Korean issue.

The Wall Street Journal/AP (9/15) reports, "The Bush administration favors a hard-line approach, refusing to talk to the North outside six-nation talks." Roh "has tried to engage the North. Mr. Roh's low-key trip to Washington had many wondering whether there are cracks in an alliance forged five decades ago during the Korean War."

The Washington Times (9/15, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "said North Korea's refusal to return to negotiations had 'strengthened' the alliance of five countries trying to persuade the communist nation to abandon its nuclear program. " Bush, "in his first meeting with the South Korean leader since North Korea conducted missile tests in July, said the stalled talks should help convince President Kim Jong-il that 'there is a better way to improve the lives of his people than being isolated.'"

Ahmadinejad Says Tehran Amenable To "New Conditions" On Nuclear Program. The Financial Times (9/15, Dombey) notes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said on Thursday that Tehran was open to compromise on the dispute over the country's nuclear programme, as talks continued between the Islamic republic and the European Union." He "said that Iran was open to 'new conditions' on the subject," and is quoted saying, "I am announcing that we are available, we are ready for new conditions." Ahmadinejad "declined to say whether Iran was prepared to suspend uranium enrichment," however, Tehran earlier "floated the idea of suspending enrichment for an initial period of up to two months once negotiations began." The Times says the "State Department has denied any knowledge of a new Iranian proposal." Secretary Rice "emphasises that Washington is continuing work on UN sanctions against Iran – although earlier in the week she appeared to react more positively to reports of Tehran's new stance." The Times also notes "discussions this week at the [IAEA] suggest a divergence between France and Germany, which appear to be more enthusiastic about negotiations, and the UK, which is particularly keen to keep the US on board."

AFP (9/15) adds Assistant Secretary McCormack "acknowledged that [the US] will face tough resistance from some of its key allies as it presses for UN sanctions against Iran over its suspect nuclear program." He further "admitted Thursday that the upcoming negotiations would be 'hard-fought. The reality of it is that there are going to be intense negotiations on this." McCormack "predicted the process of trying to hammer out a sanctions package with the other Security Council members 'would take weeks,' a far less ambitious timetable than put forward earlier by" Undersecretary Burns, "who said a deal would be reached in September. But McCormack continued to express confidence Washington's allies would ultimately back the sanctions foreshadowed in their earlier resolution."

IAEA Criticizes House Report. The New York Times (9/15, Sanger, 1.21M) reports, "The International Atomic Energy Agency has complained about a staff report from the House Intelligence Committee, saying that it 'contains erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information' about Iran's nuclear program. Agency officials said Thursday that their concerns had echoes of their arguments with the Bush administration over Iraq three years ago." The charges "were contained in a letter dated Sept. 12 and sent to Rep. Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who is chairman of the committee." The AP (9/15, Jahn) says the letter also called the report "outrageous and dishonest."

Opposition Figure Says Iran Has Revived Laser Enrichment. The AP (9/15, Lederer) reports, "Iran has secretly revived a program to enrich uranium using laser technology, reportedly with favorable results, an Iranian opposition figure said Thursday citing information from members of the resistance inside the country." Alireza Jafarzadeh "said information about the laser enrichment program at Lashkar Ab'ad, about 15 miles northwest of Tehran, came from the same sources that led to his revelation in May 2003 that Iran had a clandestine nuclear program. There was no independent confirmation of the latest information and Iran's UN Mission called the allegation 'baseless and unfounded.'"

DOJ_NMG_0063261

Chavez Says Venezuela Will Aid Iran If Militarily Attacked. The AP (9/15) reports, "Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez pledged Thursday that Venezuela will support Iran if it is invaded as a result of the Middle Eastern nation's high-stakes nuclear standoff with the United Nations Security Council. 'Iran is under threat; there are plans to invade Iran, hopefully it won't happen, but we are with you,' Chavez told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a meeting of the Group of 15 developing nations."

54% In US Say Back Military Strike To Stop Iran From Acquiring Nuclear Weapons. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Harwood, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 54% say US should strike militarily if necessary to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Support reaches 62% if US joins international coalition."

Ignatius Believes Bush "Serious About Finding A Peaceful Solution." David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (9/15, 748K), "What would President Bush say to the Iranian people if he had a chance to communicate directly with them? I was able to put that question to Bush in a one-on-one interview in the Oval Office on Wednesday. His answer made clear that the administration wants a diplomatic solution to the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program -- one that is premised on an American recognition of Iran's role as an important nation in the Middle East." Bush, "answering quickly and without notes," said, "I would say to the Iranian people: We respect your history. We respect your culture. We admire the entrepreneurial skills of your people. I would say to the Iranian people that I recognize the importance of your sovereignty -- that you're a proud nation, and you want to have a positive future for your citizens. In terms of the nuclear issue…I understand that you believe it is in your interest -- your sovereign interest, and your sovereign right -- to have nuclear power. I understand that. But I would also say to the Iranian people, there are deep concerns about the intentions of some in your government who would use knowledge gained from a civilian nuclear power industry to develop a weapon that can then fulfill the stated objectives of some of the leadership [to attack Israel and threaten the United States]. And I would say to the Iranian people that I would want to work for a solution to meeting your rightful desires to have civilian nuclear power." Ignatius concludes, "I came away with a sense that Bush is serious about finding a peaceful solution to the nuclear crisis, and that he is looking hard for ways to make connections between America and Iran."

Krauthammer Suggests Deterrence "A Mere Wish." Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (9/15, A19, 748K) about "the larger danger of permitting nuclear weapons to be acquired by religious fanatics seized with an eschatological belief in the imminent apocalypse and in their own divine duty to hasten the End of Days. The mullahs are infinitely more likely to use these weapons than anyone in the history of the nuclear age. … Against millenarian fanaticism glorying in a cult of death, deterrence is a mere wish. Is the West prepared to wager its cities with their millions of inhabitants on that feeble gamble? These are the questions. These are the calculations. The decision is no more than a year away."

Haniyeh Says US "Undermining" Palestinian Unity Government. The AP (9/14, Hadid) reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh yesterday "accused the United States of undermining efforts to form a new coalition government and he called on Europe to take the lead in lifting international sanctions against the Palestinians." He is quoted saying Washington "does not want the Palestinians to be unified. It puts obstacles in the way of this political coming together. It wants to extort the Palestinian people and the Palestinian government." On President Mahmoud Abbas' plan to create a Hamas-Fatah government, the AP says, "While refusing to give up its calls for Israel's destruction, Hamas has said it will support Abbas' efforts to seek peace. The joint government…is to be based on a document that calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel — effectively recognizing the Jewish state." Abbas "added conditions to the timetable" yesterday, saying "the issue of an Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants in June, as well as Palestinian prisoners held by Israel, must be resolved."

Amnesty International Criticizes Hamas. The Washington Post (9/15, A15, Sullivan, 748K) reports, "Amnesty International on Thursday accused Hezbollah of 'indiscriminate' and deliberate killings of Israeli civilians during the recent armed conflict in Lebanon, three weeks after accusing Israel of violating international law with 'disproportionate' attacks on Lebanese civilians." The group "said its investigations showed that during the 33-day conflict, Hezbollah fired nearly 4,000 rockets into northern Israel, killing 43 civilians, seriously injuring 33 others and displacing hundreds of thousands. It said that about a quarter of the rockets were fired into urban areas and that many were packed with thousands of ball bearings 'designed to inflict maximum death and injury.'"

Israel Blames UNIFIL Outpost Attack On Faulty Maps. A short piece in the New York Times/AP (9/15) notes Tel Aviv announced yesterday that "the airstrike that killed four United Nations observers in July was the result of the Israeli military's reliance on inaccurate maps." Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev "said the report [of the findings] was given to diplomats from Canada, China, Finland and Austria, which each had an unarmed observer killed in the July 25 airstrike in the Lebanese town of Khiam, near Israel's border." He "said that fresh Israeli forces had just been deployed then in the area, where there was intense Hezbollah activity. The change in personnel prompted a need to duplicate maps and charts." The AP says the UN "is expected to issue its own report" on the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0063262

US Criticizes China's Weapons Sales. The AP (9/15, Klug) reports, "Top US officials on Thursday criticized what they called China's indiscriminate sale of weapons to rogue countries, suggesting that Beijing's policies had made the world a more dangerous place." Peter Rodman, assistant secretary of defense for international security, "urged China to reevaluate its relationship with Iran and North Korea, two countries with which the United States is locked in standoffs over nuclear weapons development. 'China's actions seem to us dangerously shortsighted,' Rodman told the US-China Economic and Security Review Commission, an advisory panel created by Congress. China's proliferation behavior, past and present, can come back to haunt it, even placing its own political interests in jeopardy.'"

Ukraine Puts NATO Entry Aspirations On Hold. In what the Wall Street Journal (9/15, A8, Cullison, 2.03M) calls "another sign of the cooling of the Orange Revolution's pro-Western zeal," Ukraine PM Viktor Yanukovych "told NATO that his country is putting efforts to join the alliance on hold because of lack of public support for the move." The Journal says Ukraine's "backtracking" is a "defeat" to the Bush Administration, "which had hoped a quick entrance of Ukraine into the alliance would tug the former Soviet state decisively closer to the West," and it is "likely to also spell problems" for Georgia's entry into NATO. While "public opinion in Georgia is strongly in favor of joining the alliance, NATO members in Europe are wary of admitting Georgia without Ukraine coming first." The Journal adds that Moscow "has lobbied hard against Ukraine's entrance" into NATO. The Washington Post (9/15, A15, Finn, 748K) reports NATO entry "is a cherished goal of Yanukovych's rival, President Viktor Yushchenko," who defeated Yanukovych for the presidency in 2004.

López Obrador Backers Abandon Blockade Of Mexico City. Supporters of Mexico's leftist presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador are abandoning their blockade of Mexico City's central avenues. The New York Times (9/15, McKinley, 1.21M) reports that the move "signaled a shift" by Obrador, who says he was robbed of an election victory. Obrador "is now striving to find a way to remain a political force over the coming six years, while Felipe Calderón, a conservative, serves as president. Mr. López Obrador and his aides have organized a mass rally for Saturday, grandly calling it the 'National Democratic Convention,' where supporters are expected to anoint Mr. López Obrador head of a movement still ill defined that will, among other things, press for a new Mexican constitution."

USA Today (9/15, Llana, 2.27M) reports, "López Obrador and his followers, who have rejected the results of a partial recount, say democracy here is in danger if what the former Mexico City mayor calls a 'new republic' is not created to address the gap between rich and poor." USA adds, "The purpose of the national convention, which López Obrador spokesman Cesar Yañez claims will draw at least 1 million 'delegates,' is to decide where the movement should go now that the electoral court has rejected a full recount, threw out claims of widespread fraud and certified Calderón the winner. They will vote on whether to name a shadow government and parallel president (López Obrador), complete with a Cabinet, though they have not said how they would govern."

Policymakers Hope IMF Will Play A Role In Combating Trade Imbalances. The Washington Post (9/15, D1, Blustein, 748K) reports, "Less than a decade ago, economists at the International Monetary Fund were jetting into the capitals of countries stricken by financial crises, patching together rescue plans aimed at staving off global economic chaos. … This weekend, as top economic policymakers gather in Singapore for the annual meetings of the IMF and World Bank, the global environment is dramatically different. The fund's era of crisis-fighting, which lasted until 2002, is a fading memory that staffers swap stories about like war veterans." The Post adds, "The hope of some of the policymakers gathering in Singapore, including those from the Bush administration, is that the IMF will start playing an active role in helping to combat another threat to the world economy -- huge imbalances in trade, specifically the $700-billion-plus US trade deficit and the corresponding surpluses in Asia and oil-producing countries."

O'Grady Says Latin America Needs "Sensible Guidance" From Financial Institutions. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M) that the 2007 edition of the report "Doing Business" finds that "poor countries could be much better off if only they would stop discouraging legal, tax-paying business activity. When governments make it expensive to operate in the legal sector, small and medium-sized businesses go underground, giving up economies of scale, the benefits of technology and productivity gains. … Serious leaders have taken steps to free animal spirits. Much of Latin America has not. In this year's report…the region largely finishes in the cellar." O'Grady adds, "Latin America has taken lots of money from international financial institutions over the years, along with lots of dreadful advice. Now it's time to take note of some sensible guidance, even if that would be bad for those who earn a living shoveling money out the door from Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0063263

Russian Bank Official's Killing Draws Calls For Harsh Response. The assassination of Andrei Kozlov, first deputy chairman of Russia's Central Bank, is drawing calls for a severe response from the government. The Washington Post (9/15, A12, Finn, 748K) reports that Kozlov led "a campaign to clean up the country's banks." He "was shot Wednesday evening outside a sports complex after attending a soccer match between bank employees. He died early Thursday of his wounds. His driver was killed instantly in the attack, which politicians said was probably a contract killing."

Ugandan Peace Dependent On Amnesty For Rebel Leaders. The New York Times (9/15, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports that the question of whether the cease-fire agreement in Uganda holds depends largely on whether rebel leader Joseph Kony and his top deputies are given amnesty for the killings committed by their "army of abducted children" who were forced "to burn down huts, slice off lips and pound newborn babies to death in wooden mortars, as though they were grinding grain." Whether amnesty will be granted "is uncertain, because they have been charged with crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Court in The Hague. Still, this is the furthest any peace deal has come, fueling hopes that one of Africa's most grotesque and bizarre wars, which cost tens of thousands of lives, may finally be over."

Anti-US Leaders Meeting In Cuba. NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 5, 1:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is a worldwide gathering underway tonight in Cuba with more than 50 heads of state arriving in Havana for a summit meeting. Some of the names on the guest list read like an enemy's list of the United States." NBC (Mitchell) added, "At times this looks like a reunion of the axis of evil, George Bush's worst nightmare. Already the summit has indicated it will support Iran's position against the West in its showdown over nuclear research."

OfficeMax Opposes Families' Efforts To Collect From Cuba. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Perez, 2.03M) reports, "In February, nearly 45 years after two American men were executed by Fidel Castro's government, their families were on the verge of collecting $88.5 million in damages from Cuba's long-frozen U.S. accounts. Then the relatives of Howard Anderson and Thomas 'Pete' Ray ran up against an unexpected obstacle: OfficeMax Inc." The company is owned by Boise Cascade Corp., which "controls the largest single US claim against the Cuban government for property confiscated after the 1959 revolution." Antiterrorism laws passed in 1996 and 2002, allowed the Anderson and Ray families "to seek, and ultimately win, wrongful-death judgments in Florida state courts, with a federal judge in January clearing the way to tap into the frozen Cuban funds. OfficeMax wasn't pleased with the news. In March, the company filed court papers in New York U.S. District Court, Southern District, seeking to block the Ray and Anderson relatives from collecting."

Municipalities Booming Despite China's Effort To Rein In Economy. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, Browne, 2.03M) reports that local governments in China "are encouraging a frenzy of construction to boost their economies -- even as China's central government seeks to throttle back investment that is producing runaway economic growth. The economy expanded 11.3% in the second quarter of this year from the same period a year earlier, far outstripping the government's target of 8% for the whole year. … Concerns are mounting that the boom could cause property bubbles that weigh down banks with bad debt when they burst. It also could clog railway lines and ports and trigger brown-outs as overloaded power grids collapse. Already, it is generating outsize demand for energy and raw materials, pushing up the cost around the world."

Rabbis Ordained In Germany For First Time Since World War II. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 7, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Germany today, a major step toward healing the wounds of the holocaust. Three men were ordained as rabbis, the first time that has happened in Germany since World War II when Hitler destroyed the college of Jewish studies."

Gerson Calls For "Muscular Multilateralism" In Darfur. On the CBS Evening News (9/13, story 9, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) former Bush speechwriter Michael Gerson commented on the "genocide" in Darfur, Sudan, saying that the US "has worked with just about every international group from the United Nations to the African union. And visiting Darfur, I've seen the result. The burnt-out villages, the victims of systematic rape, the vast and hopeless camps. Everyone knows what is needed to stop the bleeding, a UN peacekeeping force with the firepower and authority to protect civilians from attack. What might be called a muscular multilateralism. The UN Security Council has agreed to a force. America's called for its deployment by October 1, but that deadline seems to be slipping."

Friedman Says US Should Follow Brazil's Lead On Ethanol. In his New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "I came to Brazil to try to better grasp what is real and what is not in the ethanol story, because no country has done more to pioneer sugar ethanol than Brazil. My impression, after talking to a range of Brazilian experts, is that not only is ethanol for real, but we have not even begun to tap its full potential. With just a few technological breakthroughs, Brazil really could be the Saudi Arabia of sugar and we could actually achieve that energy dream of getting 'barrels from bushels.'" In Brazil, 34,000 gas stations "offer both gasoline and ethanol (compared with around 700 in the U.S.) and...70 percent of new cars sold here can run on either gasoline or sugar ethanol. As a result, Brazil has replaced about 40 percent of its gasoline consumption with sugar ethanol." Friedman "asked Brazilian experts what they'd do if they were the U.S. president. The consensus answer: Require U.S. oil companies to provide ethanol fuel pumps at all their gas stations, require U.S. auto companies to make all their new cars flex-fuel and improve mileage standards, and get rid of the crazy 54-cent tariff we've imposed on imported sugar ethanol (to protect our farmers). And then let the market work."

DOJ_NMG_0063264

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Senate Panel Rebuffs Bush On Detainees."
"Princess Finds The Shoe Fits."
"Is OC's Defining Structure A Hall, Mall Or Matterhorn?."
"FDA Issues Spinach Warning."
"Writing On Olmec Slab Is Hemisphere's Oldest."
"Gov. To Sign Hang-Up-And-Drive Bill."
"Muslims Lash Out At Pope's Remarks."

USA Today:
"Immigrants Turn Utah Into Mini-Melting Pot."
"Strategy On Terror Suspects Splits GOP."
"The Rival Plans."
"Some New Cities Outsource City Hall."
"Profiles Of The Privately Managed Cities."

New York Times:
"Rebuff for Bush On Terror Trials In A Senate Test."
"Ford Offering 75,000 Employees Buyout Packages."
"Uganda Peace Hinges On Amnesty For Brutality."
"Pataki Appointments Leave a Lasting Stamp."
"Debate Grows As Colleges Slip In Graduations."
"In Gamble, Calif. Tries To Curb Greenhouse Gases."
"Fund-Raising Teamwork Saves A Football Rivalry."

Washington Post:
"Senators Defy Bush On Terror Measure."
"Ford Set To Offer Buyout Packages."
"House Votes To Disclose Earmarks."
"In a Volatile Region Of Iraq, U.S. Military Takes Two Paths."
"Bureaucrat Takes Blame In Vote Fiasco."
"As Border Crackdown Intensifies, A Tribe Is Caught In The Crossfire."

Washington Times:
"Republicans Defy Bush Over Detainees."
"D.C. Delinquent In EMS Oversight task force Reveals."
"House Passes Border Fence."
"Muslim Critic Tells Pope To Apologize."
"New York Ave. Plans Include 2 New Hotels."

Detroit Free Press:
"Ford Buyouts To Cut UAW Ranks In Half."
"Schoolkids Romp Back In Detroit."
"They've Seen bad Times Before."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Detainee Set Back For Bush."
"It Could Have Been You."
"Massey To Leave Morehouse In 'Very good Shape.'"
"Dancing In Stands Steals Show From Braves' Field."

Houston Chronicle:
"Vote On terror Rules Defies Bush."
"A Legacy Of Inspiration For The Next Generation."
"Richards' leadership Strongest Outside The Capitol."
"At Summit, Nations See Oil As Path To Prosperity."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Detainees Debate; John McCain Interview; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Ford Buyout-UAW; Canada-College Shooting; Canada-Shooting Analysis; Heating Bills Lower; Connecticut House Campaign; Anne Richards Obit; Adoption Story.
CBS: Detainee Debate; John McCain Interview; Ford Buy Out-UAW; Global Warming; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Canada-College Shooting; Germany Healing Wounds-Jews; Terrorism Informant Betrayed; Michael Gerson Opinion; Medical Breakthrough In Robotics; Segways Recalled; Microsoft's Zune; Anne Richards Obit.
NBC: Ford Buy Out-UAW; Ford Buy Out Analysis; Detainee Debate; Detainee Debate Analysis; Havana Summit Meeting; Canada-College Shooting; Medical Breakthrough-Robotics; Wal-Mart Ends Lay Away Service; Payday Loans Controversy; Anne Richards Obit; Getting Pregnant.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: E-Coli Outbreak; WI-School Attack Plot Thwarted; Canada-College Shooting; Senate-Detainee Treatment.
CBS: E-Coli Outbreak; WI-School Attack Plot Thwarted; Canada-College Shooting; Ford-Employee Buyouts; Space Shuttle.
NPR: Senate-Detainee Treatment; House-US Border Fence; OH18 GOP Primary; Space Shuttle; Wall Street; E-Coli Outbreak; NHTSA-Electronic Vehicle Stability Control Requirement; Ford-Employee Buyouts.

DOJ_NMG_0063265

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks at a reception for the Republican Governors Association, private residence, Los Angeles. speaks at a reception for the Republican National Committee, Sequoia Capital, Menlo Park, Calif.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets at 10 a.m. for morning business.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 11 a.m. House meets for pro forma session.

9:30 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on contact lens sales. Maureen Ohlhausen, Director, Office of Policy Planning, FTC; Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff; Jonathan C. Coon, Chairman & CEO, 1-800 Contacts, Inc., Draper, Utah; Gregory A. Fryling, Chief Operating Officer, CooperVision, Inc., Lake Forest, Calif.; Dr. Oliver D. Schein, Johns Hopkins University; Dr. Wiley Curtis, Alexandria, Va. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Subcommittee on National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations. Third in three-part series on ``Iraq: Democracy or Civil War?'' Today's topic: ``What are the Consequences of Leaving Iraq?'' Fouad Ajami, Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies; James Fearon, Stanford University; and Peter Galbraith, National War College. Location: 2154 Rayburn.

Other: LATINO EDUCATION-CONFERENCE _ Latino elected officials representing 14 states gather for 2nd Annual National Summit on the State of Latino Education. Location: Hamilton Crowne Plaza, 1001 14th St. NW.

FOOD POLICY _ The Consumer Federation of America holds its 29th annual National Food Policy Conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. Panel discussion on U.S. agriculture policy, with representatives of the food industry, farming and international arena. 10:30 a.m. Acting FDA Commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach discusses nutrition priorities and challenges. 1 p.m. Agriculture Undersecretary Richard Raymond discusses efforts to improve food safety. Location: National Press Club.

IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, briefs live from Iraq. Location: DoD Briefing Studio.

KOSOVO _ 9 a.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty holds a briefing with Nicholas Whyte of the International Crisis Group on the final Kosovo settlement. Location: 4th floor conference room, 1201 Connecticut Ave. NW.

YOUTUBE/MYSPACE _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. Panel discussion on the MySpace and YouTube phenomenon. Forum will also cover release of ``Person-to-Person-Person: Harnessing the Political Power of Social Networks'' publication. Location: Morton Audit., 805 21st NW, George Washington University. Notes: Participants include MySpace executive Jeff Berman, Chuck DeFeo of Townhall.com, blogger and syndicated columnist Michelle Malkin, others.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ 10 a.m. Homeland Security Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Officer Daniel Sutherland holds a meeting with American Arab, Muslim and South Asian communities and law enforcement regarding America's security. Location: National Press Club.

POW/MIAS _ 11 a.m. Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace host the ceremony for National POW/MIA Recognition Day. Rep. Rob Simmons will be the speaker. Location: Mall Entrance Parade Field, Pentagon.

JONATHAN ALTER _ 12 p.m. Jonathan Alter, senior editor, Newsweek Magazine, and author of ``The Defining Moment: FDR's 100 Days and the Triumph of Hope'' addresses National Press Club Newsmaker. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

BRAZIL _ 12:30 p.m. The Wilson Center for Scholars holds an afternoon conference on the upcoming presidential election in Brazil. Location: 6th floor Flom Auditorium, Reagan Trade Building.

RICE TRIP _ 12:45 p.m. Assistant Secretary of State Kristin Silverberg holds an on-the-record briefing on Secretary Rice's schedule and next week's UN General Assembly session. Location: State Department Briefing Room.

DETAINEES-TRIBUNALS _ 1 p.m. American Constitution Society forum on ``National Security, Civil Liberties and Tribunals for Detainees.'' With Eugene R. Fidell, President, National Institute of Military Justice; Deborah Pearlstein, Director, U.S. Law and Security Program, Human Rights First; others. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

ECONOMIC SECURITY _ 1 p.m. The Brookings Institution and The New Republic hold a forum on economic security in a changing world. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0063266

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, September 15, 2006 9:01 AM
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, September 15, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060915.pdf; dojclips060915.doc

From: Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com [mailto:Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com]
Sent: Friday, September 15, 2006 7:41 AM
To: Beck, Michael; Garst, Meghan; Hale, Laura K; Sampson, Kyle; Dickson, Kyle; Ames, Andrew; Schwartz, Arthur; Meadows, Bessie L; Roehrkasse, Brian; Magnuson, Cynthia; Talamona, Gina; Schreiber, Jayne; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Block, Jonathan; Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Walker, Shelia M; Scolinos, Tasia; Washington, Tracy T
Cc: cgilmore@bulletinnews.com; jmcintyre@bulletinnews.com; mgabor@bulletinnews.com; swalker@bulletinnews.com
Subject: Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, September 15, 2006

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Senate Panel Defies Bush On Terror (AP)....5
Strategy On Terror Suspects Splits GOP (USAT)....6
Republicans Defy Bush Over Detainees (WT)....7
An Unexpected Collision Over Detainees (NYT)....8
Senate Panel Rebuffs Bush On Anti-Terror Legislation (LAT)..9
Senate Panel Thwarts Bush Plan On 'War On Terror' Detainees (AFP-Y)....11
Senate Panel Defies Bush On Detainees (MCT)....12
Tribunals Bill Advances, Sets Stage For Battle Among Republicans (WSJ)....14
Senators Defy Bush On Terror Measure (WP)....15
Rebuff For Bush On Terror Trials In A Senate Test (NYT)....17
Gonzales Backs Detainee Interrogation Tactics (MCT)....18
Retired Federal Judges Oppose Bush (AP-Y)....19
Poll Finds Support For Iran Strike (WSJ)....19
A Defining Moment For America (WP)....20
Stampeding Congress (NYT)....21
No Wonder Some Seek Terrorism At The Movies (WSJ)....23
Federal Judge Refuses To Reinstate Key Padilla Terrorism Charge (FLSUNSEN/AP)....24
Judge Orders Government To Share Medical Records Of Terror Suspect Jose Padilla (FLSUNSEN)....25
'Alternative' CIA Tactics Complicate Padilla Case (CSM)....26
10 Things To Know About Guantanamo (WP)....28
U.S. Sends 2 Gitmo Detainees To Kuwait (AP)....30
Mosque Leaders' Trial Continues (CAPN9)....30

Homeland Response:

Senate OKs Legislation To Tighten Security At Seaports (USAT/AP)....31
Senate Unanimously Votes To Tighten Security Measures At Ports (WP/AP)....32
Senate Approves Bill To Tighten Port Security (MCT)....32
Chemical-plant Security Vexes Congress (CSM)....34
Suspended Muslim Safety Expert Sues DHS (AP)....35
Air Cargo Faces Tighter Screening (AP)....35
Chertoff: Fee Up In Air For Registered Traveler (USAT)....36
TSA To Review Proposed Registered Traveler Fee (WSJ)....37
Insurers Press For Terror-Backstop Renewal (WSJ)....37
Amazing Device Sucks Up Sludge -- And Tax Dollars (WP)...38

War News:

Bush To Meet With Musharraf And Karzai (AP)....38
Kerry Faults Bush's Afghanistan Strategy (AP)....39
Militants Regroup In Western Afghanistan (USAT)....40
Poland Commits New Troops To Nato Force (FT)....40
NATO's Afghan Test (WP)....41
9/11, Osama Reflection: Reverse Cut And Run? (USAT)....41
CIA Learned In '02 That Bin Laden Had No Iraq Ties, Report Says (WP)....42
U.S. Says Sectarian Killings Up In Iraq (AP)....43
Iraq Violence Continues (LAT)....44
A General's Candor On Iraq (WP)....45
Iraq Official Says Syrian Help Needed (AP)....45
In A Volatile Region Of Iraq, U.S. Military Takes Two Paths (WP)....46
Iraqis Feel Weight Of High Prices, Few Jobs (CSM)....48
Judge Tells Hussein, 'You Are Not A Dictator' (NYT)....50
'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein During Genocide Trial (WP)....51
'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein At Trial (LAT)51
The Right Troops In The Right Places (NYT)....53
World Bank Lists Failing Nations That Can Breed Global Terrorism (WP)....54
Terrorism, Here And There (WSJ)....55

DOJ:

Poetic Justice: DOJ Whistleblower On D.C. Ethics Committee (NLJ)....56

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutors Want Enron-linked Convictions Reinstated (AP) 57
Former Willbros Exec Pleads Guilty To Bribery (AP) 58
HP's Shares Rising Above The Fray (SFC) 58
Lerach Sues HP Directors, GC Over Records Scandal (LAW) 59
N.Y. AG's Office Objects To Grasso's Request For New Judge (LAW) 60
Hedge Margins Draw The Focus Of Fed Official (WSJ) 61
Billionaire In Mexico Settles Case With S.E.C. (NYT) 62
The SEC-Saw (WSJ) 62

Criminal Law:

Gonzales Deplores Web Predators (KCS) 63
Gonzales Asks For Stronger Penalties Against Online Sex Predators (AP) 64
US Attorney General Visits KC (WDAF) 65
GOP Officials Say Ney Will Offer Guilty Plea (USAT) 65
Ohio Congressman Is Said To Agree To Plead Guilty (NYT) 66
Ney To Plead Guilty In Scandal (WP) 67
Ohio Congressman To Plead Guilty To Criminal Charge In Corruption Probe, GOP Sources Say (AP) 67
Columnist Contradicts Leak Source (NYT) 68
What A Load Of Armitage! (WSJ) 69
Former Nev. Politician Pleads Guilty (WP/AP) 70
Russo's Wife To Plead Guilty (MR) 71
Prosecutors Have Plea Deal With Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife (AP) 72
Businessman Arrested On Extortion Charges (SFC) 72
Oakland Clothier Accused Of City Hall Extortion (MERCN/AP) 73
Oakland Clothier Arrested In Corruption Probe (BCNW) 73
Three Boston Police Officers Indicted As Result Of FBI Probe (AP) 74
2 Of 3 Indicted Cops Freed By Magistrate In Drug Smuggle Case (BOSH) 74
US Grand Jury Indicts 3 Boston Officers (BOS) 75
Former Chicago Patronage Chief Returns To Federal Grand Jury (AP) 76
Manhattan: Closing Arguments In Gotti Trial (NYT) 77
Gotti's Defense Attacked (NSDY) 77
Prosecutor Tells Jurors Not To Fall For Gotti's `charade' (NSDY/AP) 78
JUNIOR'S RETIREMENT 'CHARADE' (NYPOST) 78
Alleged Galante Ally Pleads Guilty In New York Case (AP) 79
Aryan Brotherhood Jury Deadlocks On Death Penalty Verdict (AP) 79
Banker Is Charged With Taking $6.1 Million (PHI) 80
N.J. Banker Charged With Stealing $6.2M (PHI) 81
Former Company President Admits Stock Fraud Plot (NSDY) 81
British Gambling Exec Resigns, Judge Rules He's Free To Leave NY (AP) 82
Sportingbet Chairman Dicks Resigns After Detention (Update4) (BLOOM) 83
Ex-Prosecutor's Bribery Trial Begins (FINDLAW/AP) 84
Guard Pleads Guilty In Contraband Case (AP-Y) 85
Feds Lower Boom On Alternative Money (USAT) 85
Bond Denied For Litchfield Man Accused Of Producing Child Porn (AP) 86
Elderly Women Plead Not Guilty In Los Angeles Hit-run Transient Deaths (FINDLAW/AP) 86
Former Ramsey Suspect Appears In California Court (USAT) 87

Civil Rights:

Justice Department Closes Investigation Into Teenager's Death (AP) 87
Missouri: Voter ID Law Is Struck Down (NYT/AP) 88
Judge Strikes Down Mo. Voter ID Law (AP-Y) 88
Pledge Challenger Newdow Claims Web Scribe Defamed Him (LAW) 88
Navy Chaplain Guilty Of Disobeying An Order (WP) 90
Jury Recommends Reprimand For Navy Chaplain Who Disobeyed Order By Appearing In Uniform (FINDLAW/AP) 90
Conservatives Say Religion Under Attack (AP-Y) 91

Antitrust:

Exelon Abandons PSEG Acquisition, Faults New Jersey (WSJ) 92
Exelon, PSEG End Merger Over Differences With NJ (MRKTWTCH) 92
Exelon, Public Service Cancel Sale Over State Hurdles (Update4) (BLOOM) 93
US Urges European Regulators To Lay Off Apple DRM (IDG) 94
Rent-A-Center Deal Gets Antitrust OK (AP) 95
Wright Strategy Plotted (DMN) 95
Lawyer Says FCC Ordered Study Destroyed (AP-Y) 96
EU Antitrust Chief Says Her Commission Is Investigating Microsoft Office (AP) 97
EU Antitrust Chief Eyes US-Style Private Damage Lawsuits (DOW) 98
Apollo Buys GE Unit For $3.8bn (FT) 98
Reshaping GE, Immelt Sells Unit (WSJ) 99

DOJ_NMG_0063269

Iamgold To Buy Cambior For $1.2 Billion In Stock (WSJ/DJN) 100

Environment/Indian Affairs:

In Gamble, Calif. Tries To Curb Greenhouse Gases (NYT) 100
US To Cut Funds For Two Renewable Energy Sources (CSM) 105
Interior Near 2 New Pacts In Oil Leases (NYT) 106
As Border Crackdown Intensifies, A Tribe Is Caught In The Crossfire (WP) 108

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Bring Charges Against Four (AP) 109
5 Of 12 Suspects In Massive Drug Ring Appear In Court (AP) 110
23 Charged In Drug Raid (CHIT) 110
Edgerton Case Gets Attention Of Feds (QCT) 111
'Dog The Bounty Hunter' Arrested (AP) 111
Bounty Hunter Arrested In '03 Case (NYT) 112

Immigration:

Nervous Employers Re-Examine Practices In Wake Of Immigration Raids (LAW) 113
2 Polish Nationals Plead Guilty In US To 'Leasing' Illegal Workers (FINDLAW/AP) 117
Congress Passes Major Security Measures (NYT) 118
House Passes Border Fence (WT) 119
House Approves U.S.-Mexican Border Fence (AP-Y) 120
House Votes To Boost Border Security; Broader Immigration Issues Remain (LAT) 121
House Passes Border-Fence Bill, Changes To Rules On Earmarks (WSJ) 122
House Votes To Build 700 Miles Of Fence Along The U.S.-Mexico Border (MCT) 123
Overstating Border Reform's Price (WP) 124
Immigrants Turn Utah Into Mini-melting Pot (USAT) 125

Tax:

Anti-Abortion Group Loses Tax Exemption (NYT) 128

Congress-Administration:

High Court To Provide Same-Day Argument Transcripts Online (LAW) 129
High Court To Post Same-Day Transcripts (WP) 130
House Passes New Ethics Rule (AP-Y) 131
House To Require Names On Pet Projects (NYT) 132
House Votes To Disclose Earmarks (WP) 132
House OKs Measure To Curb Pork Spending (WT) 133
House Takes A Cautious Step On Ethics (LAT) 134
2 Republicans In Senate Vow To Block F.D.A. Pick (NYT) .. 135
Government Recovers Stolen Computer (AP-Y) 136
Paulson Positions Treasury As Policy Quarterback (WSJ) ... 137
Proposal Would Make Retirement Benefits A Factor In Bidding (WP) 138
Lawmakers Seek To Loosen Up Banking Proposal (USAT) 139
Laura Bush Aiding Clinton Conference (AP-Y) 139
Democrats Meander In A New New Direction (WP) 140
Costs Will Outstrip Savings (USAT) 141
Sinking Secret Holds (WSJ) 142

Other News:

US Retail Sales Post Unexpected Rise (FT) 142
Retail-Sales Growth Eases To 0.2% (WSJ) 143
Retail Sales Take Wind Out Of Stocks' Sails (USAT/BLOOM) 144
Wall Street Dips On Fears Over Inflation (FT) 144
Stocks Slip As Natural Gas Hits Two-Year Low (WSJ) 145
Some Lawyers Ranked 'Super' Are Not The Least Bit Flattered (NYT) 146
Pennsylvania Judges Decide They, Alone, Will Get Raises (NYT) 147
Study Shows GOP Fundraising Edge Is Slipping (CQPOL) . 148
Fundraising Totals By The Numbers (CQPOL) 150
Swift Boat Ads Backer Funds New Group (AP-Y) 151
Fla. Gov Candidate Names Running Mate (AP-Y) 152
Senate Candidate Speaks Of Life, Faith (WP) 153
Let Reagan Be Reagan (WP) 154
Nationalizing Politics (WP) 154
Progress Or Regress? (NYT) 155
Everyday Low Wages (NYT) 156
New Jersey Switcheroo (WSJ) 157
U.S. And S. Korea To Push To Restart Nuclear Talks (WP) 158
Bush, Roh Hope To Restart Talks With Pyongyang (WSJ/AP) 159
N. Korea's Refusal To Talk Bolstered Allies, Bush Says (WT) 159
Iran President Softens Nuclear Tone (FT) 160
US: Fight For Sanctions On Iran Will Be Tough, Take Weeks (AFP) 161
Nuclear Agency For U.N. Faults Report On Iran By U.S. House (NYT) 161
IAEA: U.S. Report On Iran 'Dishonest' (AP) 162
Opposition: Iran Using Laser Enrichment (AP) 163
Chavez Vows Aid For Iran Against Attack (AP) 164
Bush's Message To Iran (WP) 164
The Tehran Calculus (WP) 165
Palestinian PM Accuses U.S. Of Meddling (AP) 166
Rights Group Accuses Hezbollah Of 'Indiscriminate' Killing (WP) 167

DOJ_NMG_0063270

Inaccurate Map Led To Fatal Strike On U.N. Post, Israel Says (NYT/AP) 168
U.S. Criticizes China Weapons Sales (AP-Y) 168
Ukraine Stalls NATO Bid To Build Public Support (WSJ) 169
Ukraine's Yanukovych Halts NATO Entry Talks (WP) 170
Leftist's Backers End Blockade In Mexico City (NYT) 171
Mexican Leftist Refuses To Back Down (USAT) 172
IMF Has No Crisis To Manage (WP) 173
Doing Business In Latin America (WSJ) 175
Russia Shaken By Killing Of Bank Official (WP) 176
Uganda Peace Hinges On Amnesty For Brutality (NYT) 177
Property Deeds OfficeMax Thwarts Families' Attempts To Tap Cuba Funds (WSJ) 179
Growing Pains Booming Municipalities Defy China's Effort To Cool Economy (WSJ) 181
The Energy Harvest (NYT) 184

DOJ_NMG_0063271

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senate Panel Defies Bush On Terror (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The Associated Press, September 15, 2006

A rebellious Senate committee defied President Bush on Thursday and approved terror-detainee legislation he has vowed to block, deepening Republican conflict over terrorism and national security in the middle of the election season.

Republican Sen. John Warner of Virginia, normally a Bush supporter, pushed the measure through his Armed Services Committee by a 15-9 vote, with Warner and three other GOP lawmakers joining Democrats. The vote set the stage for a showdown on the Senate floor as early as next week.

In an embarrassment to the White House, Colin Powell — Bush's first secretary of state — announced his opposition to his old boss' plan, saying it would hurt the country. Powell's successor, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, jumped to the president's defense in a letter of her own.

All this played out after Bush started his day by journeying to the Capitol to try nailing down support for his own version of the legislation — and by issuing a threat to the maverick Republicans.

"I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward with legal clarity," Bush said at the White House.

The president's measure would go further than the Senate package in allowing classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials, using coerced testimony and protecting CIA and other U.S. interrogators against prosecution for using methods that may violate the Geneva Conventions.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," Powell, a retired general who is also a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote in his letter.

Powell said Bush's bill, by redefining the kind of treatment the Geneva Conventions allow, "would add to those doubts. Furthermore, it would put our own troops at risk."

Firing back, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Powell was "confused" about the White House plan. Later, Snow said he probably shouldn't have used that word.

"I know that Colin Powell wants to beat the terrorists, too," he said.

The administration also produced its own letter from Rice. She wrote that narrowing the standards for detainee treatment as Bush has proposed "would add meaningful definition and clarification to vague terms in the treaties."

In addition, CIA Director Michael Hayden wrote a letter to his employees saying he has asked Congress "to help define our responsibilities so that we and the Department of Justice can judge the appropriateness of any procedures we would propose to use" while questioning terrorism suspects. He said Bush's bill did that.

In the committee vote, Warner was supported by GOP Sens. McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Susan Collins of Maine. Warner, McCain and Graham had been the most active senators opposing Bush's plan. The vote by the moderate Collins underscored that there might be broad enough GOP support to successfully take on Bush on the floor of the Republican-run Senate.

As the battle mushrooms, it threatens to undermine campaign season assertions by the administration that it has shown a steady hand on security matters and that Republicans should be trusted over Democrats on such issues.

Bush still has many congressional allies, including House and Senate leaders and conservatives, who want to align themselves with the president's tough stance on interrogation and prosecution. The House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday passed a bill that supports the administration's position by 52-8.

But that support is not universal. Rep. Steve Buyer, R-Ind., said he told Bush during the president's visit that he should heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have previously opposed some provisions of the president's plan.

DOJ_NMG_0063272

Buyer and other Republicans are expected to align themselves with McCain, who spent more than five years as a prisoner of war during Vietnam. Last year, he overcame Bush's objections to pass legislation banning cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of detainees.

Leaving his closed-door meeting with the House GOP caucus, Bush said he would "continue to work with members of the Congress to get good legislation." He complimented a House bill but did not mention the Senate version.

"I reminded them that the most important job of government is to protect the homeland," he said. Bush was accompanied by Vice President Dick Cheney and White House political adviser Karl Rove.

The White House also released a letter to lawmakers signed by the military's top uniformed lawyers. Saying they wanted to clarify past testimony on Capitol Hill in which they opposed the administration's plan, the lawyers wrote that they "do not object" to sections of Bush's proposal for the treatment of detainees.

Two congressional aides who favor McCain's plan said the military lawyers signed that letter after refusing to endorse an earlier one offered by the Pentagon's general counsel, William Haynes, that expressed more forceful support for Bush's plan.

The aides spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter publicly. Asked if Haynes had encouraged them to write the letter, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said, "Not that I'm aware of."

Another Bush bill would give legal status to the administration's warrantless wiretapping program. The Senate Judiciary Committee approved the bill on a party-line vote Wednesday, but it is stalled in the House amid opposition from Democrats and some Republicans concerned that the program violates civil liberties.

Strategy On Terror Suspects Splits GOP (USAT)

By David Jackson And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush is facing a Republican rebellion over a policy he says is crucial to the war on terrorism, as key members of his party lead the opposition to a White House plan for interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects.

Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican who supports the administration proposal, said Bush faces “an uphill battle” in the Senate. On Thursday, the Senate Armed Services Committee approved Chairman John Warner's rival plan on a bipartisan 15-9 vote. Among those speaking out against the Bush measure: the president's former secretary of State, Colin Powell.

Critics of the Bush proposal, including Warner, R-Va., and Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., contend that Bush's plan jeopardizes the nation's reputation by failing to guarantee fair trials for terror suspects. They also say captured U.S. troops could be subject to retaliation.

The White House says Warner's bill could effectively shut down important CIA interrogations. “In order to protect this country, we must be able to interrogate people who have information about future attacks,” Bush said at the White House. “I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward.”

A showdown looms next week. Republican House leaders have scheduled a vote on Bush's plan, which they support. White House spokeswoman Dana Perino acknowledged that the president's bill may fall short in the Senate. She said House and Senate negotiators may have to resolve the differences between the two bills.

McCain has been a strong supporter of Bush's anti-terrorism strategy. But he said the administration's proposed rules for interrogating suspects would essentially rewrite the 1949 Geneva Conventions and invite other countries to weaken the treaty's ban on humiliating, cruel and degrading treatment of prisoners.

In a letter released by McCain, Powell backed the GOP senators. “The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism,” wrote Powell, a retired general who also served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

McCain accused CIA Director Michael Hayden of pushing a policy designed to forgive possible agency abuses. “He's trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation,” he said.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield released a letter Hayden wrote to agency employees that argued otherwise. Hayden denied asking lawmakers to water down the Geneva Conventions. “I did not ask them to create a CIA (exception),” he wrote. “I am simply asking Congress to help define our responsibilities.”

DOJ_NMG_0063273

The Senate Armed Services vote came hours after Bush made a rare trip to Capitol Hill to tout his military tribunal plan before a friendly audience of House Republicans. Even there, he faced a challenge.

Rep. Steve Buyer, R-Ind., was a colonel in the Army Reserve who wrote legal guidelines for interrogators in the Persian Gulf War. Buyer said he challenged Bush to "listen to your legal commanders" during the closed-door session.

The White House must find a way to share classified evidence, at least with defense lawyers, that will be used against alleged terrorists, Buyer said. "There has to be a procedure by which we can have a proceeding that reflects our values and is viewed by the world as fair and just," he said.

Republicans Defy Bush Over Detainees (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

Defiant Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee bucked President Bush yesterday and approved a bill for detention and trial of foreign terrorism suspects that Mr. Bush says would compromise the war on terrorism.

The president insisted that he will not accept a bill that ties the CIA's hands or puts classified information at risk, and urged Congress to pass a proposal similar to what he submitted instead.

Led by Sen. John McCain of Arizona and committee Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia, four Republicans joined the panel's 11 Democrats to support a bill that gives terrorism detainees broader civil rights than Mr. Bush has proposed.

But most Senate Republicans, including the rest of the committee's members, support the administration's view that Mr. Warner's bill would limit intelligence gathering and expose classified information to terrorists. They have vowed to fight it out on the Senate floor.

Mr. Warner said he crafted the measure carefully to meet the concerns of the Supreme Court. The high court earlier this year struck down Mr. Bush's current setup for trying detainees held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"It would be a very serious blow to the credibility of the United States ... if legislation passed by the Congress and signed by the president failed to meet a second Supreme Court review," Mr. Warner said yesterday.

But Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican and committee member, called that argument a "boogeyman" and insisted he would try to amend the bill to be more in line with the White House approach.

The administration last week publicly acknowledged a classified CIA interrogation program, which, officials said, has produced information that helped thwart at least eight terrorist plots since 2001. But the Supreme Court ruling leaves that program on tenuous ground, and Mr. Bush says it would have to end if Congress doesn't approve new rules.

A Capitol Hill source said that after two weeks of fruitless negotiations with Mr. McCain, the White House has decided to instead have the fight in public and make its case directly.

The effort has kicked into high gear this week with CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden saying that without specific guidance, he would have to close down the interrogation program. The administration also released a letter from the military's top lawyers saying guidance would be welcome, and a letter from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying what the U.S. is doing makes sense.

The administration argues that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions has never been tested by the U.S. before, and provisions banning harsh treatment are vague. Mr. Bush wants a bill that lists exactly what is out of bounds.

Mr. Warner's bill allows accused terrorists more access to classified evidence against them during military tribunals, and also rejects Mr. Bush's definition of treatment of detainees.

The president visited with House Republicans yesterday to urge them to approve his approach, and House Republican leaders indicated they would. The House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday passed a version acceptable to the White House in a bipartisan 52-8 vote.

Later, Mr. Bush said he "will resist" any bill that the CIA says would tie its hands.

"If there's ambiguity, if there's any doubt in our professionals' minds that they can conduct their operations in a legal way, with support of the Congress, the program won't go forward and the American people will be in danger," he said.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said both sides want the same thing.

DOJ_NMG_0063274

"They got to figure out how to achieve it," he said.

Mr. Cornyn said the two camps probably can resolve the issue of how to handle classified information, but the sticking point is the Geneva Conventions issue.

Mr. McCain said the White House wants to redefine the conventions, and doing so would invite international criticism.

"If you change the interpretation of it, you are changing a treaty," he said, arguing that such a move could hurt U.S. agents by opening the door for other countries to interpret the treaty however they see fit.

"I believe then people would be turned over to the secret police," he said.

Former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, also a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote a letter this week saying that in trying to "redefine" part of the Geneva Conventions the administration was risking the "moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

But Mr. Snow said Mr. Powell was confused about what the administration is trying to achieve.

"The whole purpose of this is to make sure that we place our troops out of harm's way, and also the people who are doing the interrogations, by making clear what the standards are," he said.

An Unexpected Collision Over Detainees (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — President Bush and Congressional Republicans spent the last 10 days laying the foundation for a titanic pre-election struggle over national security, and now they have one. But the fight playing out this week on Capitol Hill is not what they had in mind.

Instead of drawing contrasts with Democrats, the president's call for creating military tribunals to try terror suspects — a key substantive and political component of his fall agenda — has erupted into a remarkably intense clash pitting some of the best-known warriors in the Republican Party against Mr. Bush and the Congressional leadership.

At issue are definitions of what is permissible in trials and interrogations that both sides view as central to the character of the nation, the way the United States is perceived abroad and the rules of the game for what Mr. Bush has said will be a multigenerational battle against Islamic terrorists.

Democrats have so far remained on the sidelines, sidestepping Republican efforts to draw them into a fight over Mr. Bush's leadership on national security heading toward the midterm election. Democrats are rapt spectators, however, shielded by the stern opposition to the president being expressed by three Republicans with impeccable credentials on military matters: Senators John McCain of Arizona, John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. The three were joined on Thursday by Colin L. Powell, formerly the secretary of state and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in challenging the administration's approach.

It is one of those rare Congressional moments when the policy is as monumental as the politics.

On one side are the Republican veterans of the uniformed services, arguing that the president's proposal would effectively gut the nearly 60-year-old Geneva Conventions, sending a dark signal to the rest of the world and leaving United States military without adequate protection against torture and mistreatment.

On the other are the Bush administration and Republican leaders of both the House and Senate who say new tools are urgently needed to pursue and interrogate terror suspects and to protect the covert operatives who play an increasingly important role in chasing them.

Republicans concede that the fight among themselves is a major political distraction, particularly given the credentials of the Republican opposition, led by Mr. McCain, the former prisoner of war in Vietnam who was tortured in captivity.

"It is a big problem," said Representative Ray LaHood of Illinois, a senior House Republican. "These guys have a lot of weight and a lot of standing. McCain is a tough guy to beat on this."

But Mr. Bush, who visited the Capitol on Thursday to rally House Republicans behind his approach, is also tough. He will no doubt do everything possible to get a deal, if not on the floor of the Senate then in conference between the House and the Senate. But the immediate result in political terms has been to create a battle among Republicans about core principles less than eight weeks before Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0063275

"This whole issue is going to send a signal about who America is in 2006," Mr. Graham said.

Brushing aside the objections of Mr. Bush and most of his Republican colleagues in Congress, Mr. Warner led the Senate Armed Services Committee to produce legislation on Thursday that would provide detainees with protections beyond those sought by Mr. Bush, setting up a collision with the House, where a measure approved by the administration is advancing.

House Republicans say the Senate plan is misguided and will hobble the American military. Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said it would lead to "the lawyer brigade" being attached to combat troops to counsel detainees.

Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York and chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, said: "I just think John McCain is wrong on this. If we capture bin Laden tomorrow and we have to hold his head under water to find out when the next attack is going to happen, we ought to be able to do it."

Mr. McCain's opponents acknowledge that, given his experiences, he is a powerful advocate on this subject, but that the shadow war against terrorists has new legal complexities.

"I have never led in combat, but I do have some experience with the law," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas and a former State Supreme Court justice who has jousted with Mr. McCain over the legislation.

There is no doubt that Mr. Cornyn and his fellow Republicans would much rather be dueling with the Democrats over this issue, which they see as their chief election-year advantage.

After their meeting with the president, House Republicans sought to play up their differences with House Democrats on the detainee legislation although the bill passed the Armed Services Committee on an overwhelmingly bipartisan vote.

Republicans will also continue try to continue to pound Democrats on other security measures, like legislation to authorize the administration's eavesdropping program. But the political power of that issue gets muddied as well because some House and Senate Republicans want to impose more restrictions on the program than the administration finds acceptable.

Recent polls continue to show Republicans with an advantage on security issues, but they are mixed as to whether the president's most recent push is raising his popularity. In addition, widespread public dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq is clouding election prospects for Republicans.

But with the focus on the treatment of detainees there is a potential benefit for Republicans since it does at least temporarily change the subject from Iraq.

Democrats say that no matter how bipartisan the opposition to the administration's tribunal plan, they expect that Republicans will try to blame Democrats for any delay. They note that House Republicans have taken to referring to bipartisan Senate legislation on immigration, a measure most House Republicans abhor, as the Reid-Kennedy bill, named for the Democrats Harry Reid of Nevada and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, despite the substantial participation of Mr. McCain.

"At the end of the day, they will forget John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner and say it is all about the Democrats holding up President Bush's plan to make American safer," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate.

But Mr. Durbin said, "We are not going to take it sitting down."

Senate Panel Rebuffs Bush On Anti-Terror Legislation (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's campaign for tougher legislation on terrorists suffered another blow today when Senate Republicans supported efforts to block his plan to reinterpret Geneva Convention restrictions on the interrogation of prisoners.

By a 15-9 vote, Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and three other Republicans joined Democrats in opposing the change.

The rejection of Bush's plan could create a dramatic clash, particularly among Republicans campaigning for reelection as being strong on security issues, when the full Senate votes next week.

DOJ_NMG_0063276

Today's vote came several hours after Colin Powell, the secretary of State in Bush's first term, spelled out his position in a letter to Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," Powell said. "To redefine [a portion of the Geneva Convention] would add to those doubts."

More than that, he said, it could lead to the mistreatment of American troops captured in Iraq and elsewhere during the war on terrorism.

Powell's letter came as the Senate Armed Services Committee met in closed session to consider Bush's proposal. Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Susan Collins (R-Me.) joined Warner and McCain and all the Democrats on the committee in voting against the proposal.

Bush wants the authorization before the trials begin for 14 high-profile terrorists who have been taken to the detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, from CIA prisons worldwide.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the military tribunals that were set up for prosecuting terror suspects needed congressional authorization. Bush does not want the new tribunals to be hamstrung by what the administration describes as the vague protections that the Geneva Convention, adopted shortly after World War II, offers to prisoners of war.

Before the Armed Services Committee deliberated, Bush paid a rare visit to Capitol Hill to try to shore up support for two foundering anti-terrorism measures and the Geneva Convention proposal. He also made another trip to allow the continuation of the program of eavesdropping on Americans' international phone calls without warrants.

On Wednesday, a divided Senate Judiciary Committee muddied the outlook for an issue that Republicans consider key to the midterm elections when it approved widely divergent bills aimed at overhauling domestic eavesdropping laws.

The committee endorsed a White House-backed measure that would give President Bush broad authority for his warrantless wiretapping program. It also approved legislation by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would largely preserve a 1978 law governing domestic spying while making few provisions for new executive powers.

While one lawmaker decried the Senate approach as "totally contradictory," the House Judiciary Committee abruptly canceled a vote on its own version of the surveillance reform law amid signs of dissension among Republicans there.

The White House said it was confident that lawmakers ultimately would enact the measures Bush was promoting. But the growing disharmony over the president's tribunal plan drew warning shots Wednesday from some administration officials.

In a conference call with reporters, John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, warned that if an alternate version of the tribunal bill proposed by McCain passed, the CIA would be forced to shut down its interrogation program.

"If it goes forward as proposed, this will not allow for the CIA high-value terrorist detention program to go forward," Negroponte said.

The Judiciary Committee's eavesdropping vote was a rare rebuke for an administration that has tested the limits of executive power since Sept. 11.

The panel's eight Democrats were joined by two Republicans — Graham and the committee's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — in approving the Feinstein measure.

Specter has been the driving force behind the White House surveillance bill, which he brokered with Vice President Dick Cheney over the summer. But he said he voted for both bills — he had previously been a sponsor of the Feinstein legislation — because each had important attributes.

Some members of the panel, however, said the committee was passing the buck by sending multiple and conflicting legislation to the floor. A central premise of the Feinstein legislation was "totally contradictory to legislation we just passed," said Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.). "What kind of message does that send to our colleagues?"

Others said that the panel's action showed a lack of understanding of the issues at hand.

By moving along bills "that are flatly contradictory, they are saying that they don't really understand what they are doing," said James X. Dempsey, policy director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, a Washington-based advocacy group. "Throwing the issue open to floor debate in a partisan atmosphere is probably the worst possible way of resolving complex issues at the intersection of technology, national security and constitutional doctrine."

DOJ_NMG_0063277

Under the domestic surveillance program, the National Security Agency has intercepted communications between suspected terrorists abroad and people in the United States. It The program has been a flashpoint in the post-Sept. 11 debate over liberty and security since being divulged in media reports in December.

The administration has acknowledged that in conducting the program, it did not obtain warrants from the court established by Congress under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, in 1978 to monitor all domestic surveillance in terrorism and espionage cases. The president, the administration said, had the power to order the monitoring without going through those channels.

The Specter bill incorporates that view.

But Feinstein's bill affirms what she and others say was the original intent of the 1978 law, and makes it clear that the FISA court is the exclusive authority for approving such requests.

Whereas the administration has expressed concern that the FISA court process is too cumbersome in an age of cell phones and Internet-savvy terrorists, Feinstein's solution would focus on expanding current emergency provisions in the law.

The legislation would extend — from the current 72 hours to seven days — the time allowed for emergency surveillance before a warrant application must be submitted to the FISA court. It also would augment the 15-day wartime exception for wiretapping without court approval to include incidents of congressional authorization for the use of force or a national emergency created by a terrorist attack.

"I am a happy camper, at this point," Feinstein told reporters after the vote. "I think we can get Republicans. We'll see."

Republicans view national security as their greatest political strength in their battle to keep control of Congress in the November midterm elections. And on Wednesday, the House Armed Services Committee approved a tribunal measure that closely tracked the administration's proposal.

"I can think of no better way to honor the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 than by establishing a system to prosecute the terrorists who, on that day, murdered thousands of innocent civilians, and who continue to seek to kill Americans both on and off the battlefield," said Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), the committee's chairman.

The administration's proposal considered by the Armed Services Committee would, among other things, redefine Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which establishes a baseline level of treatment for all combatants. Administration officials have said the changes are necessary to protect interrogators from prosecution or civil suits.

"This is an attempt not to alter Geneva, nor to avoid the purposes of Geneva, but rather to give it the kind of clarity we felt [was] required," Negroponte said Wednesday. "We feel there are parts of Common Article 3 under Geneva that are vague."

That vagueness, Negroponte said, meant that CIA interrogators could not be certain they were behaving in a lawful manner.

But McCain and others have said that the changes also could have the effect of putting U.S. troops at risk.

"The overwhelming majority of retired military people are weighing in on this issue and saying, 'Don't amend Common Article 3,'" the Arizona lawmaker said Wednesday.

"How we interpret Common Article 3, and any effort to undercut its meaning, will be taken into account by our enemies in future conflicts," McCain added. "We are concerned about the plight of American servicemen and women who may be captured in future conflicts."

Senate Panel Thwarts Bush Plan On 'War On Terror' Detainees (AFP-Y)

By Stephanie Griffith

AFP, September 15, 2006

A US Senate panel rejected President George W. Bush's plan to relax standards on the treatment of "war on terror" suspects, instead backing a substitute bill offering greater rights protections to foreign detainees.

In a stinging rebuke to the US president, the Senate Armed Services Committee voted 15 to nine in favor of a bill drafted by Republican chairman John Warner.

The outlines of the president's plan, which would allow tougher questioning of detainees while protecting US interrogators from being prosecuted for war crimes, were approved Wednesday by a US House of Representatives panel.

DOJ_NMG_0063278

Bush came to Capitol Hill Thursday to drum up additional support for his legislation, which he said would "give us the tools and wherewithal to protect this country."

But his appeals failed to sway Democrats and a handful of key Republicans in the Senate Armed Services Committee, who instead were convinced by Warner's arguments that the president's bill could endanger future US prisoners of war and hurt America's standing in the world.

The Senate vote sets up difficult negotiations with House lawmakers and Bush administration officials over their differing versions, but McCain said an accord is within reach.

"I think we see a compromise there so that we could prevent national security from being compromised, but yet still allow the defendant to be able to see some of the evidence against him," he said, speaking on CNN.

"What we are seeking is to make sure that the Geneva Conventions covering these circumstances are not changed, because if we amend the Geneva Conventions, then other nations will to their liking," which he said "could put American lives at risk."

The administration plan would redefine which acts constitute war crimes, after the Supreme Court ruled in June that his existing court system established to prosecute terrorism suspects was illegal and violated the international Geneva Conventions.

Bush praised the House Armed Services Committee for having passed his bill, which he called "a very important piece of legislation in a bipartisan fashion that will give us the tools and wherewithal to protect this country," he said.

"We have proposed legislation that will enable the Central Intelligence Agency to be able to conduct a program to get information from high-value detainees in a lawful way," Bush said at a joint news conference later Thursday with South Korean President Roh Moo-Hyun.

"It is very important for the American people to understand that in order to protect this country we must be able to interrogate people who have information about future attacks," Bush said.

"I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward with legal clarity."

Asked later for White House reaction to the Senate defeat, Bush spokesman Tony Snow said the remarks from the news conference with Roh "remain valid."

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a letter delivered to Warner's committee Thursday, called the administration bill a "reasonable, good faith interpretation" that does attempt to take human rights concerns into account.

But the president's proposals have been strongly opposed by three powerful Republican senators -- Warner, Lindsey Graham and John McCain-- who insist there must be no erosion in US compliance with international law governing the treatment of war detainees.

At a press conference Wednesday, Graham -- who in addition to being a US senator is also a military lawyer -- denounced the White House proposal.

"It started with Abu Ghraib," he said, referring to the notorious Iraqi prison where US abuses were found.

"Are we going to start being the first country in the world that changes the Geneva Conventions so the secret police programs of those nations will be OK?"

The trio got the support of an influential ally, former US secretary of state Colin Powell.

Powell sent a letter to McCain on Wednesday condemning the administration's plan to change rules governing detainee treatment, which are covered under Article Three of the Geneva Conventions.

"I do not support such a step and believe it would be inconsistent with the McCain amendment on torture, which I supported last year," Powell wrote, in a letter made public by McCain Thursday.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism. To redefine Common Article Three would add to those doubts," wrote Powell, who is also ex-chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

But Bush dismissed Powell's remarks, saying "there's all kinds of letters coming out," and pointed out that a group of military lawyers sent a letter to the House and Senate Armed Services panels supporting the administration plan.

Senate Panel Defies Bush On Detainees (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Margaret Talev

DOJ_NMG_0063279

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Ignoring threats and warnings from President Bush, a defiant Senate committee approved legislation Thursday that would ban abusive CIA interrogations and make it easier for terrorist suspects to defend themselves at trial.

The Republican-led Senate Armed Services Committee voted 15-9 to send the legislation to the full Senate. Four Republicans, including Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the committee's chairman, backed the bill over Bush's objections, as did the panel's 11 Democrats.

The split in Republican ranks widened as former Secretary of State Colin Powell joined the dissidents against his former boss.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," Powell wrote in a letter to Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who has teamed up with Warner and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in opposing Bush. Powell is former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. McCain was a prisoner of war in Vietnam. Warner is a former secretary of the Navy. Graham is a judge in the Air Force reserves.

Bush made a rare visit to the Capitol to lobby House Republicans for his approach and declared that "the American people will be in danger" if lawmakers continue to defy him.

Bush said CIA interrogators should have wide latitude when questioning terrorists, as long as they don't engage in torture. The Senate bill would ban abusive techniques that the Bush administration doesn't consider torture, such as "water-boarding," which simulates drowning.

"In order to protect this country, we must be able to interrogate people who have information about terrorist attacks," Bush told reporters after his closed-door visit with House Republicans. "I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward with legal clarity."

Powell endorsed efforts by three Senate Republicans to make sure that suspected terrorists receive basic protections provided by the Geneva Conventions, an international agreement governing the treatment of prisoners of war. The basic protections, spelled out in a provision known as Common Article 3, prohibit "outrages upon personal dignity," including "humiliating and degrading treatment."

Powell agreed with other retired senior military officers who wrote Warner contending that Bush's approach undermines support for the war on terrorism and encourages abusive treatment against captured Americans.

The legislation under debate would revamp the ground rules for dealing with terrorist suspects, from interrogation to detention to trial before military tribunals. Some of the most controversial issues involve the treatment of detainees in secret CIA prisons.

The legislation also would change the rules of evidence for suspected terrorists facing trial before military tribunals. The Senate committee bill would make it easier for defendants to see the evidence against them and would tighten restrictions on the use of hearsay evidence.

Terrorist suspects would have fewer legal rights than Americans in civilian courts, but would have more than what Bush wants to give them.

Although the military has banned a long list of abusive interrogation tactics, the prohibitions don't apply to the CIA. Bush wants Congress to give CIA interrogators wide latitude while protecting them from possible later prosecution for actions that might be considered war crimes.

The issue took on new urgency last June when the Supreme Court ruled that terrorist suspects are entitled to basic protections under the Geneva Conventions.

"If there's not clarity, if there's ambiguity, if there's any doubt in our professionals' minds that they can conduct their operations in a legal way, with support of the Congress, the program won't go forward and the American people will be in danger," Bush said.

Bush brushed off Powell's opposition, but White House spokesman Tony Snow didn't conceal the annoyance that his defection caused within the president's inner circle. Snow said Powell was "confused" about Bush's goals and suggested that the former secretary of state should have contacted the White House for clarification before writing his letter.

Snow insisted that Bush merely wants to clarify the standards of conduct under the Geneva Conventions, not water down the basic protections provided to captives.

McCain, who was tortured as a war prisoner in Vietnam, took issue with Snow's interpretation.

"Clarify, modify, I mean please," he said with exasperation. "You are changing a treaty which no other nation on Earth has changed for the first time in 57 years."

The Arizona Republican also accused CIA Director Michael Hayden of trying to shield his agency from scrutiny under the guise of national security.

"General Hayden wants to change the Geneva Conventions not to protect his people," McCain said after the committee vote. "He wants to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation."

The White House sought to counter Powell's opposition by producing a letter from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice supporting Bush. The White House also released another letter of support from five top military lawyers representing the armed services.

Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee reacted skeptically to the military lawyers' letter, suggesting that it didn't fully reflect the views of the lawyers who signed it.

"There's more to it," said Graham, who contacted the military lawyers after reading their joint letter. "The concerns I've been expressing for weeks, they share. ...That needs to come out, too. You can't use the letter in a vacuum."

A person close to the military lawyers, who insisted on anonymity because he was unauthorized to challenge the White House, confirmed Graham's account.

"It (the lawyers' letter) doesn't say they are recommending that the president's legislation pass," this person said. "It's just saying they don't object. I believe that if we were asked our preference, we would say we prefer the bill that Senators McCain, Warner and Graham have put forward."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he would decide next week whether he would permit a vote on the dissidents' bill or substitute a White House-backed alternative. Lawmakers are under pressure to finish the legislation before their planned Oct. 6 recess for the fall election season. The Republican infighting is undermining Bush's effort to portray Democrats as soft on national security heading into the elections.

Tribunals Bill Advances, Sets Stage For Battle Among Republicans (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Over President Bush's opposition, a plan to prosecute enemy combatants advanced in the Senate with bipartisan support, raising the prospect of a messy floor battle among Republicans heading into the midterm elections.

The Senate Armed Services Committee approved the proposal on a 15-9 vote, with all the panel's Democrats and four of its Republicans in support. Most Republicans on the committee voted against it, however, saying they preferred Mr. Bush's approach. The debate likely will continue on the Senate floor next week.

Republicans had hoped the vote would be a chance to point out differences with Democrats over national-security issues, but, in fact, it won't be so clear-cut. Democrats spoke little, but tried to counter Republican attempts to paint them as obstructionists. "We must adopt a bill. That's something that should be all our goals," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's senior Democrat.

Unlike Mr. Bush's plan, the Senate bill allows accused combatants to see classified evidence being used against them and permits evidence obtained using coercion only if a judge determines it illuminates the facts of the case. Both bills prohibit cruel treatment, such as torture. The administration plan bars the accused from invoking the Geneva Conventions as a source of rights in court, while the Senate bill limits the use of the treaty only in civil actions, such as lawsuits for damages against an interrogator.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush visited House Republicans to rally their support for his national-security priorities and to thank them for making strides on his military-tribunals plan, which a House panel approved Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0063281

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Bush won't support the Senate plan, which the administration contends would end the Central Intelligence Agency's program to collect information from captured al Qaeda leaders. "The president will not accept something that shuts the program down," Mr. Snow said.

In the House, some Republicans are concerned about the White House approach, just as some have objected to another administration priority -- getting broader authority to conduct warrantless surveillance. During the closed-door meeting, Rep. Steve Buyer of Indiana, a former military lawyer, cited an issue top uniformed lawyers raised: Mr. Bush's plan would permit the use of classified evidence, but doesn't require it be shared with the accused. "I said, 'You listen to your commanders in the field. Please listen to your legal commanders,'" Mr. Buyer said in an interview.

The Senate bill wouldn't allow use of classified evidence unless it can be shared with the accused. But for the Senate bill's sponsors -- Sens. John Warner (R., Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) -- the most intractable difference has been the administration's proposal to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions. The sponsors said they worry the U.S. would lose credibility when trying to argue for the safety or release of troops taken prisoner in future conflicts.

CIA Director Michael Hayden wrote in a memo to his staff that in meetings with Congress, "I did not ask them to back away from our nation's commitment to Geneva." But Common Article Three, the relevant provision, is "general and vague," he said. Mr. Hayden said Congress should "help define our responsibilities" so the CIA "can judge the appropriateness of any procedures" it might use.

Former Secretary of State Colin Powell wrote to Mr. McCain Wednesday, supporting the senator's position. Supporters of the administration's position circulated their own letter, sent to Congress by top military lawyers. The letter said they "do not object" to Mr. Bush's proposal on the Geneva Conventions.

Senators Defy Bush On Terror Measure (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

A Senate committee rebuffed the personal entreaties of President Bush yesterday, rejecting his proposed strategies for interrogating and trying enemy combatants and approving alternative legislation that he has strenuously opposed.

The bipartisan vote sets up a legislative showdown on an issue that GOP strategists had hoped would unite their party and serve as a cudgel against Democrats in the Nov. 7 elections. Instead, Bush and congressional Republican leaders are at loggerheads with a dissident group led by Sen. John McCain (R), who says the president's approach would jeopardize the safety of U.S. troops and intelligence operatives.

Despite heavy lobbying by Bush, who visited the Capitol yesterday, and Vice President Cheney, who was there Tuesday, McCain and his allies held fast. Even former secretary of state Colin L. Powell weighed in on McCain's side.

Moments after the Armed Services Committee voted 15 to 9 to endorse McCain's alternative bill, the Arizona senator lashed out at CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, who had also lobbied lawmakers personally.

McCain told reporters that Hayden wants Congress to give the CIA a virtually free hand to treat detainees as it wishes so that he and his agents will be immunized against accusations of unlawful conduct. "He's trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation," McCain said. The senator noted that other nations would be more likely to abuse U.S. captives if Americans appeared to sanction such conduct.

A CIA spokesman said Hayden "wants to protect the people who work for him" and who take risks to "help keep all Americans safe."

The committee action puts McCain and his allies on a collision course with the administration, whose supporters hope to change the bill in the full Senate, and with the House, which is expected to approve the president's bill next week.

With virtually all Senate Democrats likely to back McCain, he appears to have enough Republican support -- for now, at least -- to fend off amendments on the Senate floor and to block passage of the House version if it emerges from a conference committee.

DOJ_NMG_0063282

Congress is scheduled to adjourn in two weeks, and lawmakers said they will be hard pressed to resolve the matter before the elections.

The disagreement centers mainly on how to square the CIA's techniques with the Geneva Conventions, which say wartime detainees must be "treated humanely." The administration bill says the United States complies with the conventions as long as interrogators abide by a 2005 law barring "cruel, inhuman, or degrading" treatment of captives.

McCain and his chief Republican allies on the Senate committee, Chairman John W. Warner (Va.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), say that this requirement is too narrow and that the United States should not try to limit its obligations under the Geneva Conventions. Instead, they want CIA officers to abide by the common understanding of the treaty's meaning, including a ban on "outrages upon personal dignity."

Bush's bill would also allow alleged enemy combatants to be convicted by military commissions relying on classified information not shared with the suspects. The McCain-backed measure would make the exclusion of classified information more difficult, and it states in general terms that defendants have the right to examine and respond to any evidence directly related to guilt or innocence.

Joining McCain, Warner and Graham in voting for their bill yesterday were Republican Sen. Susan Collins of Maine and all of the committee's Democrats.

The dispute has fractured the GOP establishment. Powell and numerous retired military officers wrote letters supporting McCain's position, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other administration officials weighed in on Bush's behalf. The president made a rare visit to Capitol Hill yesterday to rally House Republicans and thank the House Armed Services Committee for overwhelmingly approving legislation that mirrored his position.

"The most important job of government is to protect the homeland, and yesterday they advanced an important piece of legislation to do just that," Bush told reporters. "I'll continue to work with members of the Congress to get good legislation so we can do our duty."

White House officials released a letter from senior Pentagon uniformed lawyers, who said they "do not object" to two key sections of the administration-backed bill that would reinterpret U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions and protect U.S. intelligence agents from war crimes prosecutions. They then summoned senators from the Armed Services and intelligence committees to an afternoon meeting with Rice and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. Seven attended, sources said.

The Pentagon letter immediately generated controversy. Senior judge advocates general had publicly questioned many aspects of the administration's position, especially any reinterpreting of the Geneva Conventions. The White House and GOP lawmakers seized on what appeared to be a change of heart to say that they now have military lawyers on their side.

But the letter was signed only after an extraordinary round of negotiations Wednesday between the judge advocates and William J. Haynes II, the Defense Department's general counsel, according to Republican opponents of Bush's proposal. The military lawyers refused to sign a letter of endorsement. But after hours of cajoling, they assented to write that they "do not object," according to three Senate GOP sources who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were divulging private negotiations.

Graham, a former Air Force judge advocate general, promised to summon the lawyers to a committee hearing and to ask for an explanation of the circumstances surrounding the letter.

One of the military lawyers, Air Force Maj. Gen. Charles J. Dunlap Jr., reiterated yesterday that he still has reservations about the administration's proposal, just not in the areas discussed in the letter. He said he was not forced to sign.

"I made my several personal objections to the administration's proposal clear in my [House] testimony," Dunlap said. "This matter was not among them."

White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters yesterday that Bush "will not accept something that prevents the [CIA detention] program from going forward." At a feisty briefing, Snow said critics have misconstrued the administration's intent, which he said is to define the Geneva Conventions' ban on cruel and inhumane treatment, not to undermine it.

"Somehow I think there's this construct in people's minds that we want to restore the rack and start getting people screaming, having their bones crunching," Snow said. "And that's not at all what this is about."

He said Powell did not discuss the issue with the White House before releasing his letter.

"They don't understand what we're trying to do here," he said of Powell and retired Army Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., who wrote a similar letter. Asked if Powell is "confused," Snow said, "Yes."

McCain, who was tortured as a Vietnam War prisoner, dismissed similar comments in the committee session, saying Powell knew exactly what he was doing.

Rebuff For Bush On Terror Trials In A Senate Test (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The Senate Armed Services Committee defied President Bush on Thursday, with four Republicans joining Democrats in approving a plan for the trial and interrogation of terrorism suspects that the White House has rejected as unacceptable.

The Republican rebellion was led by Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the committee chairman, with backing from Senators John McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Susan Collins of Maine.

The White House had said their legislation would leave the United States no option but to shut down a C.I.A. program to interrogate high-level terrorism suspects.

The vote came on a frantic day of Republican infighting and despite an all-out effort by the White House to win support for its own approach, which provides far fewer protections for detainees.

Mr. Bush traveled to Capitol Hill with Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday morning. The administration also released a brief letter in which the top lawyers for the military branches said they found no legal objection to the White House proposal to redefine a key provision of the Geneva Conventions.

But Colin L. Powell, Mr. Bush's former secretary of state, sided with the senators, saying in a letter that the president's plan to redefine the Geneva Conventions would encourage the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," and "put our own troops at risk."

Mr. Powell's statement amounted to a rare public breach with the White House he served, but reflected his strong opposition while in office to the administration's assertions, beginning shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, that the war against Al Qaeda should not be bound by the Geneva Conventions.

The White House made clear that it would fight on despite the Republican rebellion, with Mr. Bush saying he would "resist any bill'' that did not provide a legal basis for the C.I.A. to continue to employ what he has called "alternative interrogation practices'' for terrorism suspects.

The main dispute between the White House and the Senate Republicans revolves around a provision known as Common Article 3, which prohibits inhumane treatment of combatants seized in wartime. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the C.I.A. director, has argued that the article's prohibition against "outrages upon personal dignity" must be clarified so that troops and C.I.A. personnel know what is permissible in the interrogation of terrorism suspects.

But Senators Warner, McCain and Graham say the Bush proposal would send a signal that the United States has abandoned its commitment to human rights, and invite other nations to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions as they see fit, eliminating protections for American troops seized in future conflicts.

The senators also dismissed the letter from the military lawyers, saying they had questions about whether it amounted to an authentic endorsement of the White House proposal. They said they put more weight on extensive public testimony in which the lawyers raised doubts about the Bush plan.

Some military officials briefed on the military lawyers' position also disputed the notion that the lawyers had reversed course. They said the lawyers agreed to sign a letter at a meeting on Wednesday after discussing the language over several hours.

The lawyers would agree only to say that they could not find anything illegal about the specific issue of amending Common Article 3, the defense officials said, but still do not endorse several points in the administration's approach.

The senators say their bill will protect the C.I.A. by refining the war crimes act, which criminalizes violations of Common Article 3, to specifically enumerate what violations constitute war crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0063284

"What General Hayden wants us to do is immunize him not from liability but from criticism," Mr. McCain said after the vote, "because if one of his techniques is made public and he gets criticized, then he can say, 'Well, Congress told me to do it.' He's trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation."

The other chief dispute concerns the evidence admitted at trial. The Bush plan would allow hearsay and evidence obtained by coercion if it is considered reliable, while the Senate proposal would exclude any testimony obtained by "cruel inhuman, or degrading treatment."

The White House would bar the suspect from seeing classified evidence shown to the jury weighing his case; the senators say that this amounts to a secret trial, and that the suspect must be allowed to see anything the jury sees. They offered a compromise under which a judge would substitute a declassified summary of the evidence.

The committee vote was 15 to 9, with all Democrats joining the four Republicans. The measure now goes to the Senate floor, where Senators Warner, Graham and McCain believe they have a majority made up of Democrats and as many as a half-dozen other Republicans.

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, warned the administration against taking on Mr. McCain, a former prisoner of war.

"They're trying to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions,'' Mr. Levin said, "but the best expert on that is somebody who has very personal experience with those who violate Geneva, and that's Senator McCain."

The situation in the House is very different, with that chamber on track to approve the measure backed by the White House.

"We'll do what the president wants," said Representative Duncan Hunter of California, the Republican who is chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

The White House and Republicans on either side of the issue maneuvered furiously for advantage all day.

As the Senate Armed Services Committee met to vote on its alternative to the president's legislation, an anonymous Republican invoked a Senate rule to stop it from meeting, forcing Mr. Warner to go to the Senate floor to ask that the hold be lifted. He then praised the Democrats for being "totally cooperative" on the issue, a pointed rebuke to members of his own party who have been pushing the White House view. And he prevailed upon Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican leader, to persuade the senator calling for the hold to lift it.

The White House must now decide whether to press its allies in the Senate to amend the bill on the floor, or to step back and wait until the bill passes and the House and Senate work out differences in conference.

The bill may face amendment in any case. Some Democrats object to a provision that would block detainees from challenging their detention in court. More than two dozen retired federal judges sent a letter to Congress arguing that such a provision would lead to unlawful permanent detention, and defy Supreme Court precedent.

Gonzales Backs Detainee Interrogation Tactics (MCT)

By Scott Canon, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - As Congress dealt a rebuke Thursday to President Bush's national security agenda, his attorney general defended the administration's efforts to deal with captured terror suspects.

Of critics concerned about international treaties or freedoms protected by the U.S. Constitution, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said they misunderstand the legalities - some never clearly defined - of dealing with an unconventional foe that plays by no rules.

Judicial rejections of some administration policies have muddied the legal landscape and made it unclear how the government can detain, interrogate and prosecute terror suspects, he said.

"We do need some clarity," Gonzales told the editorial board of The Kansas City Star.

A U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June held that the Bush administration's military tribunals to try terror detainees violated U.S. law and the Geneva Conventions. Gonzales said that that decision and continuing legal challenges have created confusion about what the government can and can't do. The court said that using military tribunals were illegal because they don't provide safeguards that civilian or military courts require.

DOJ_NMG_0063285

Now Congress is considering competing measures. A proposal put forward by Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina would set some standards governing treatment of detainees that would be consistent with international law. That bill was approved Thursday in committee. Bush's proposal is expected to emerge from the House next week.

Gonzales said the U.S. courts and Congress have yet to interpret the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which sets a standard of treatment for prisoners of war. He voiced concern that that an adverse ruling could damage efforts to interrogate "terrorists who do not fight by the standards of war." And he suggested that rejection of an administration bill sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, giving interrogators more leeway might hurt efforts to fight terrorism.

"Congress may decide we don't want to gather any more evidence," the attorney general said.

He said that "just like in every other war," the American people will have to trust the government to protect the rights of those in custody while pursuing justice in secret. Pressed on how long extraordinary measures - for instance, the imprisonment of suspects without the filing of charges_might continue, he said they would last at least until the pursuit of al-Qaida and its accomplices has come to an end.

"First of all this is a real war," he said, drawing a distinction between the war on terror and "the war on drugs or the war on poverty or something like that. It's like the Cold War. . . . At some point this conflict is going to be over. But today it is not over."

Pressed about interrogation techniques that have brought the administration criticism from human-rights groups - like waterboarding, which simulates drowning - Gonzales would neither confirm nor deny the use of such methods, which some people call torture.

"I don't talk about specific methods of questioning" because doing so would prepare suspects to resist them, he said.

He said protections are in place for enemy combatants held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Retired Federal Judges Oppose Bush (AP-Y)

AP, September 14, 2006

Nine retired federal judges accused the Bush administration and Congress of trying to deprive detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, of the most basic legal right.

Legislation under debate on Capitol Hill would strip federal courts of the power to hear detainees' challenges of their treatment and indefinite detention at the Guantanamo Bay.

"Depriving the courts of habeas jurisdiction will jeopardize the judiciary's ability to ensure that executive detentions are not grounded on torture or other abuse," the nine wrote Thursday in a letter to Congress.

Congress and the Bush administration would be skating "on thin constitutional ice" in depriving courts of their power to hear Guantanamo detainees, the letter added.

The retired judges said federal courts have long balanced the rights of defendants against the need to protect classified information vital to the nation's security.

Most of the attention in the debate over detainee rights at Guantanamo Bay has focused on how to conduct military commission trials that meet constitutional standards. Plans call for trying a few detainees, while the remainder, more than 450 in all, remain in indefinite detention.

By focusing on military commissions, the White House and Congress "have chosen to address the tail rather than the dog, and the result is that the Constitution is getting bitten," Eric M. Freedman said in an interview. He is a Hofstra University professor of constitutional law and a consultant to the legal team representing the Guantanamo detainees.

The nine retirees who signed the letter are appeals court judges John Gibbons, Shirley Hufstedler, Nathaniel Jones, Timothy Lewis, William Norris, George Pratt, Lee Sarokin, Patricia Wald and U.S. District Judge William Sessions.

Poll Finds Support For Iran Strike (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Voters talk tough on Iran's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0063286

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1, 54% say U.S. should strike militarily if necessary to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Support reaches 62% if U.S. joins international coalition.

Military officials warn a successful strike might only set back Iran's program, not halt it, and prompt Iranian retaliation in Iraq. But "even people who are for troop withdrawals" from Iraq back military action through a coalition, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts Journal/NBC survey with Republican Bill McInturff.

Though Independents and Republicans would back unilateral strike, Democrats are opposed.

Democratic leaders remain elusive foils for Republican barbs.

Seven in 10 voters don't know top Senate Democrat Reid or have no strong feelings about him; six in 10 say the same of House leader Pelosi, who Republican strategists call out of touch with mainstream. House Speaker Hastert is similarly anonymous.

IN THE POLLS

2 • WSJ/NBC News poll3

• Bush's approval ratings4

Senate Majority Leader and 2008 hopeful Frist has better name recognition but split ratings, 21% positive and 23% negative. Voters cite deficit and Iraq policy as biggest fears if Republicans keep control of Congress, gridlock and premature Iraq withdrawal if Democrats take over.

Voters want Wal-Mart to face tougher government oversight.

After criticism from unions and liberal activists, 52% say companies like Wal-Mart "should be reviewed and regulated more" over adequacy of health and pension benefits. That includes majorities of women, Southerners, and rural voters; even 41% of conservatives agree.

By 50% to 45%, voters earning more than $75,000 a year say companies should set their own standards. The Midwest is most sympathetic to that view. Two-thirds of all voters say they've patronized the retailer in the last month.

Overall, Wal-Mart is rated positively by 45%-31%, though Target enjoys stronger image at 51%-10%.

DEMOCRATIC COMRADES: Kerry taps list of three million donors to boost fellow veteran-politicians. An email appeal yields more than $200,000 in 72 hours for Congressional candidates in New York, Pennsylvania and California. By 77%-17%, voters who backed Kerry two years ago favor reducing troops in Iraq.

DIPLOMAT IN CHIEF? Bush and Rice visit U.N. next week to prod allies for sanctions on Iran. Some 31% of voters rate Bush highly as "a world leader," down from 36% a year ago and 49% before the Iraq war.

TAX TACTIC: Republicans weigh new gambit for cutting estate taxes. They might add measure to government funding resolution before leaving Washington for October campaigning. Among voters earning $30,000 or less, just one-third approve Bush's handling of the economy and back Republicans for Congress.

NOT COMPLAINING: Despite controversy over imprisonment and interrogation of detainees, 54% of voters credit Bush administration with "the right course," while only 34% say administration has "gone too far." But by 51%-41%, voters oppose terror trials where suspects couldn't attend or view evidence.

Voters fault corporations, more than Washington, for widening income inequality.

Three in ten blame "excessive salaries and bonuses" for gap between highest-income workers and others. Another 26% say overseas competition, twice the 12% who cite Bush administration and Congress.

Tracking Democratic rhetoric, voters show increasing concern about the gap; one in four call it America's biggest economic problem, virtually matching the share who say energy costs. In international economic speech, Treasury Secretary Paulson says narrowing disparities is "the responsibility of all nations."

By 47%-36%, voters rate Bush poorly for "being compassionate enough to understand average people."

MINOR MEMOS: State whips Pentagon in battle of bureaucratic chiefs; Rice's positive rating rises to 55% from 48% in May 2004, while Rumsfeld's falls to 31% from 39%. Cheney's 50% negative rating exceeds that of both administration colleagues.

A Defining Moment For America (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063287

PRESIDENT BUSH rarely visits Congress. So it was a measure of his painfully skewed priorities that Mr. Bush made the unaccustomed trip yesterday to seek legislative permission for the CIA to make people disappear into secret prisons and have information extracted from them by means he dare not describe publicly.

Of course, Mr. Bush didn't come out and say he's lobbying for torture. Instead he refers to "an alternative set of procedures" for interrogation. But the administration no longer conceals what it wants. It wants authorization for the CIA to hide detainees in overseas prisons where even the International Committee of the Red Cross won't have access. It wants permission to interrogate those detainees with abusive practices that in the past have included induced hypothermia and "waterboarding," or simulated drowning. And it wants the right to try such detainees, and perhaps sentence them to death, on the basis of evidence that the defendants cannot see and that may have been extracted during those abusive interrogation sessions.

There's no question that the United States is facing a dangerous foe that uses the foulest of methods. But a wide array of generals and others who should know argue that it is neither prudent nor useful for the United States to compromise its own values in response. "I continue to read and hear that we are facing a 'different enemy' in the war on terror," retired Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote in a letter to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) this week. "No matter how true that may be, inhumanity and cruelty are not new to warfare nor to enemies we have faced in the past. . . . Through those years, we held to our own values. We should continue to do so."

Another former chairman of the Joint Chiefs, and one more intimately familiar with the war on terrorism, also weighed in this week: "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," former general and secretary of state Colin L. Powell wrote to McCain. "To redefine Common Article 3 would add to those doubts."

Mr. Powell was referring to an article of the Geneva Conventions that prohibits cruel and degrading treatment of detainees. Mr. Bush, with support from most Republican congressional leaders, wants to redefine American obligations under the treaty. Three Republican senators -- John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee; Lindsey O. Graham of South Carolina; and Mr. McCain -- are bravely promoting an alternative measure that would allow terrorists to be questioned and tried without breaking faith with traditional U.S. values. The Armed Services Committee approved their bill yesterday and sent it to the Senate floor.

The doubts of which Mr. Powell spoke are impeding the U.S. war effort. A president who lobbies for torture feeds those doubts even if, as we hope, Congress denies him his request.

Stampeding Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

We'll find out in November how well the White House's be-very-afraid campaign has been working with voters. We already know how it's working in Congress. Stampeded by the fear of looking weak on terrorism, lawmakers are rushing to pass a bill demanded by the president that would have minimal impact on antiterrorist operations but could cause profound damage to justice and the American way.

Yesterday, the president himself went to Capitol Hill to lobby for his bill, which would give Congressional approval to the same sort of ad hoc military commissions that Mr. Bush created on his own authority after 9/11 and that the Supreme Court has already ruled unconstitutional. It would permit the use of coerced evidence, secret hearings and other horrific violations of American justice.

Legal experts within the military have been deeply opposed to the president's plan from the beginning, and have formed one of the most influential bulwarks against the administration's attempt to rewrite the rules to make its recent behavior retroactively legal. This week, the White House sank so low as to strong-arm the chief prosecutors for the four armed services into writing a letter to the House that seemed to endorse the president's position on two key issues. Congressional officials say those officers later told lawmakers that they did not want to sign the letter, which contradicts everything the prosecutors, dozens of their colleagues, former top commanders of the military and a series of federal judges have said in public.

The idea that the nation's chief executive is pressing so hard to undermine basic standards of justice is shocking. And any argument that these extreme methods would be used only against the most dangerous of international terrorists has been destroyed by the handling of hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, many of whom appear to have been scooped up in Afghanistan years ago with little attempt to verify any connection to terrorism, and now are in danger of lingering behind bars forever without a day in court.

DOJ_NMG_0063288

To lend his lobbying an utterly false sense of urgency, President Bush announced last week that he had taken 14 dangerous terrorists from the secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons where he had been holding them for years and sent them to Guantánamo to stand trial. But none of the prisoners is going anywhere, and the current high-pressure timetable is related only to the election calendar.

The Geneva Conventions

One section of the administration bill would put American soldiers in grave jeopardy by rewriting the Geneva Conventions, condoning the practice of hiding prisoners in secret cells, and permitting the continued use of interrogation methods that violate the Geneva Conventions at the C.I.A. prisons.

Mr. Bush has made it clear that he plans to continue operating the C.I.A. camps. And he wants Congress to collaborate by exempting the United States from a provision in the Geneva Conventions that prohibits "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment." Mr. Bush says this wording is too vague, but that's a dodge. What he really wants is Congressional authority to go on doing things to prisoners in C.I.A. jails that are clear violations of international rules.

He also wants Congress to rewrite the War Crimes Act, which makes it a crime to violate the Geneva Conventions. The administration's goal here is to avoid having C.I.A. interrogators, private contractors or the men who gave them their orders called to account for the immoral way the administration has run its terrorist detention centers.

The opposition to these provisions by legal scholars, military lawyers and a host of former top commanders of the armed forces has been overwhelming. In recent days, two former chairmen of the joint chiefs of staff, Colin L. Powell, and John W. Vessey, wrote to Senator John McCain urging him to go on fighting the White House. "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," General Powell wrote.

More than two dozen former military leaders and top Pentagon officials, from both parties, wrote to Senator John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, expressing "profound concern" about undermining the Geneva Conventions. Their objections involve a simple equation: The Conventions protect captured American soldiers. If America mistreats its prisoners, American soldiers are in danger of the same, or worse.

Defining the Enemy

Senators Warner, McCain and Lindsey Graham have formed a principled spine of resistance against their party's attempt to steamroller the White House legislation through Congress. But their own bill — the only competing proposal to emerge so far — shares some big problems with the president's. One is its scope. Both bills draw the definition of "unlawful enemy combatant" so broadly that it could cover almost anyone that a particular administration decides is a threat, remove him from the judicial system and subject him to a military trial.

The law should cover actual terrorists and those who engage in hostilities against American forces outside an army or organized resistance group. But the White House bill also includes anyone who gives "material support" to a terrorist group or anyone affiliated with a terrorist group. Legal experts fear this definition could cover people who, for example, contribute to charities without knowing they support terrorist groups, or that are not identified as terrorist fronts until later. It could be used to arrest a legal resident of the United States and put him before a military commission.

It also could be used to capture foreign citizens in their native countries, or anywhere else, a concern that America's allies have raised repeatedly. This is not just a theoretical problem. This sort of thing has already happened.

Stripping the Courts of Power

The White House wants to strip the federal courts of any power to review the detentions of the prisoners in Guantánamo Bay. This provision has no real bearing on the handful of genuine terrorists who were recently shipped there from abroad. Their cases are likely to be brought before military commissions, whose judgments could be appealed to higher courts, including the Supreme Court. But it has a profound impact on the hundreds of others at Guantánamo Bay. Many of them, perhaps the majority, committed minor offenses, if any. The administration has no intention of trying them, and wants to prevent them from appealing for help in court.

DOJ_NMG_0063289

This week, nine current and former federal judges, including a former F.B.I. director appointed by Ronald Reagan, begged Congress not to give in to White House pressure on this point. “For 200 years, the federal judiciary has maintained Chief Justice Marshall’s solemn admonition that ours is a government of laws, and not of men,” their letter said. “The proposed legislation imperils this proud history.”

•

The nation is in this hideous mess because Mr. Bush ignored the advice of people like this when he tried to set up prison camps beyond the reach of the law. It’s hard to believe their warnings will be ignored again, but the signs are ominous. Last week, the military’s top lawyers told the House Armed Services Committee that they strongly opposed the rules of evidence and other due-process clauses in the White House’s bill. The committee just went ahead and passed it anyway. Only eight of the 28 Democratic members had the courage to vote “no.”

Bill Frist, the majority leader, has already introduced the horrible White House bill on the Senate floor. Senators Warner, McCain and Graham have come up with a serious alternative, and they deserve enormous credit for standing up to Mr. Bush’s fearmongering — something many Democrats seem too frightened to do. (It was good to see the Senate Armed Services Committee Democrats join them in rejecting the president’s bill yesterday.)

But their bill still has serious shortcomings, and should not be rushed through Congress in the current atmosphere, which has very little to do with stopping terrorists and everything to do with winning seats in November.

There is no urgency. Mr. Bush could have tried the 14 new inmates of Guantánamo Bay at any time if he had just done it legally. It’s hard to imagine that anyone in the White House is really worried about a swift resolution of their cases. Many members of Congress who succumb to the strong-arming will know, in their hearts, that they were doing the wrong thing out of fear for their political futures. Perhaps the voters will not judge them harshly this fall. But history will.

No Wonder Some Seek Terrorism At The Movies (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

"An event of this consequence is very hard to understand." The event former Congressman Lee Hamilton was describing earlier this week is September 11, 2001. But of course September 11 itself is not hard to understand. They came, they killed.

For many people this is sufficient understanding of 9/11. They believe the job now is simple: Resist and stop more of their killing. However, unlike the proponents of apocalyptic Islam, most normal people in time seek a degree of understanding, even of an enemy who fights by the rules of pre-civilization. Mr. Hamilton, the vice chairman of the 9/11 Commission, was commenting on ABC's now-controversial movie, "The Path to 9/11." The hard-to-understand path to which Mr. Hamilton alluded is obviously not a single event but the origins and organization of the Islamic terrorist movement that began years back and besets the U.S. and the world today.

One can only agree with Mr. Hamilton. The war on terror is more complex, nuanced and indeed more interesting than the general public has been given to believe.

For instance, one oft-cited benchmark of its progress is the status of Osama bin Laden. That he is presumably still alive and at large is taken to mean that President Bush's offensive against the post-9/11 terrorists has "failed," as John Kerry noted this week on the eve of September 11. The Bush administration, Mr. Kerry told CNN, "failed to capture and kill Osama bin Laden when they had him in the mountains of Tora Bora. And that's why we are more threatened today with an al Qaeda that has reconstituted itself in some 65 countries."

This is the Alien vs. Predator model of fighting terror. Bin Laden himself has picked up on the tendency of our political culture to reduce complexity to melodrama. For 9/11, al Qaeda released a propaganda documentary on al-Jazeera this week, depicting masked men training, while Bin Laden walks among them. The New York Times described bin Laden in the 9/11 tape as "looking almost regal."

As to the war in Iraq, daily readers of first-line Internet news services such as Yahoo News know that this event has been reduced simply to body-count headlines. Yahoo News's homepage at mid-day Wednesday: "Bombings, mortar attacks kill 39 in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0063290

If this is the available public context, then serious people have to assemble an understanding of terror as best they can. It isn't easy. In his comment on the ABC movie, Lee Hamilton said that "news and entertainment are getting dangerously intertwined." But given the alternative, it makes sense to me if people seek a better sense of the obsessions and compulsions inside Islamic terrorism in movies such as "United 93" or ABC's remarkable "The Path to 9/11."

The narcissistic whining of the Clinton coterie over how they're reflected in "The Path to 9/11" was an irrelevant diversion from its real value. The word "Clinton" isn't heard in the film's first 90 minutes, which recreates with startling realism the thunderous basement bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993, an explosion stunning to many of us seated at our desks at the Journal's offices across the street that day.

Screenwriter Cyrus Nowrasteh and director David L. Cunningham deserve thanks not obloquy for trying to give us a palpable feel for the terrorist's terrain -- Pakistan, Afghanistan, Brooklyn -- the world of Ramzi Yousef, the 1993 bomber, and his uncle Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, or "KSM," identified in the 9/11 Commission Report as the main architect of September 11 and some 3,000 deaths.

KSM is one of the 14 al Qaeda captives whom President Bush revealed last week had been transferred from secret CIA prisons to Guantanamo to await trial. Congress, in the wake of the Hamdan decision, is now arguing over which panoply of legal rights given to accused U.S. soldiers at court martial will be extended to these prisoners if tried by a military commission.

Read through the 14 Guantanamo detainee biographies posted on the White House Web site, and one gets a rare feel for the events that distinguish the lives of these individuals from the daily goals of everyone else in the world -- lives simply dedicated to the mass murder of innocents, and not just in lower Manhattan. Indeed, the narrator of Bin Laden's 9/11 tape conveys their milieu: "Planning for September 11 did not take place behind computer monitors or radar screens . . . but was surrounded with divine protection in an atmosphere brimming with brotherliness . . . and love for sacrificing life."

Here are some of the brothers, now at Guantanamo. Hambali: Indonesian. Learned radical Islam in Malaysia. Co-planned Bali resort bombing (200 killed); financed Jakarta Marriott bombing; tried to assassinate Philippine ambassador; involved in bombing 30 Indonesian churches on Christmas eve. Ahmed Khalfan Ghailani: Tanzanian-born forger. Complicit in 1998 East Africa embassy bombings (well-depicted in "The Path to 9/11"). He was also Osama's cook. Mohammed Nazir Bin Lep, aka, Lillie: Architecture degree, Polytechnic University Malaysia; later studied bombmaking with Dr. Azahari bin Husin (deceased). Hoped to achieve martyrdom in post-9/11 attack on Los Angeles. Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri. Planned 2002 bombing of USS Cole. Involved in planned attacks in Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Qatar, the Strait of Hormuz, the Strait of Gibraltar and Port of Dubai.

Read all 14 of these histories devoted to "sacrificing life" to put in context the denunciations of warrantless wiretaps and the Swift financial monitoring program.

These and the others await the divine protections of American law that Senators Warner and Graham wish to give them. Republicans are also arguing among themselves over the degree of access to classified intelligence this group should receive at trial. Democrats, other than saying they'll support the more liberal version, are contributing almost nothing to the new system. If a Democrat wins the White House in 2008, we may assume she or he will receive, as payback, a similar level of limp support from the GOP in the same war on terror.

Say this for the Guantanamo 14: They have unity of purpose. Long term, our disunity could prove to be a big advantage to them.

Federal Judge Refuses To Reinstate Key Padilla Terrorism Charge (FLSUNSEN/AP)

By Curt Anderson, The Associated Press

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 15, 2006

MIAMI -- A federal judge refused Thursday to reinstate a key terrorism charge in the case against alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla and two other defendants, raising the possibility of delays in their trial if prosecutors appeal the ruling.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke ruled in August that a charge of conspiracy to ``murder, kidnap and maim" people overseas must be dismissed because it duplicated other charges in the same indictment. Cooke said at a hearing Thursday that she stands by that decision.

DOJ_NMG_0063291

``I do not think I am in error in this case," Cooke said. ``These are so similar that a reasonable jury could be confused." The dismissed charge is important because it is the only one in the indictment that carries a potential life sentence.

Padilla and the others remain charged with two terrorism material support counts, but a life sentence is only possible if prosecutors can prove that support conspiracy led directly to someone's death.

Prosecutors are likely to ask the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to review Cooke's decision, which could delay the planned Jan. 22 trial date. Cooke asked prosecutors to expedite any appeal in an effort to stay on schedule.

Padilla, a 35-year-old former Chicago gang member and convert to Islam, is charged along with his co-defendants with being part of a North American support cell for violent Muslim extremists worldwide. Padilla was arrested in 2002 and held for 3½ years as an enemy combatant, initially for what U.S. officials called a plot to detonate a radioactive ``dirty bomb" inside the United States.

He was added late last year to an existing Miami terrorism case amid a high-level legal battle over whether President Bush had constitutional authority to hold him without charge during wartime. The Miami indictment does not mention the ``dirty bomb" allegations, claiming only charging that Padilla was an al-Qaida recruit and attended a training camp in Afghanistan.

On the dismissed conspiracy charge, prosecutors argued that it did not duplicate a second, material-support conspiracy charge in the indictment against Padilla and co-defendants Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi. Even if it did, prosecutors said the time to deal with that issue was at sentencing, if they are convicted.

``All the court has to do is not punish the defendants twice," assistant U.S. attorney Brian Frazier said.

But defense lawyers disagreed, saying that multiple charges have psychological impact on jurors by making a defendant appear more guilty. And, they said, jurors presented with long indictments sometimes will choose to compromise by acquitting on some charges and convicting on others.

``That creates, in the minds of the jury, a bias," said Jeanne Baker, one of Hassoun's attorneys.

In siding with the defense, Cooke found that prosecuting all three terrorism charges would violate the Constitution's ban against double jeopardy, or forcing a defendant to face the same charges twice.

In other rulings, Cooke:

--Ordered the government to turn over medical records from Padilla's military custody. Defense lawyers want to see if Padilla was given any drugs that might raise questions about his competency or whether there was any misconduct committed by interrogators.

--Refused a defense request for a list of people who attended an al-Qaida camp at the same time Padilla allegedly did in 2000. The judge said that information was exempt from disclosure because it was internal investigative material.

--Rejected for similar reasons a defense request for identities of others who filled out al-Qaida applications that were found along with one prosecutors say was Padilla's in a binder in Afghanistan. Prosecutors intend to call as a witness a member of the so-called ``Lackawanna Six" cell in upstate New York to testify that he filled out a similar form.

--Allowed Hassoun's wife to testify via video hookup from Beirut, Lebanon, about the actions FBI agents took before searching their home in suburban Sunrise in 2002. Defense lawyers say she fears arrest if she and her three children return to the U.S. Hassoun, who is allegedly Padilla's recruiter, claims the FBI search was illegal and that evidence seized should be thrown out.

Judge Orders Government To Share Medical Records Of Terror Suspect Jose Padilla (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 15, 2006

A federal judge in Miami ordered prosecutors Thursday to turn over medical records for accused al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla, a move that could reveal details of his treatment during 31/2 years in military custody.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke included in her ruling all records relating to physical and mental evaluations of Padilla or medication taken by or administered to Padilla while held as an enemy combatant in a South Carolina Navy brig.

Defense attorneys said they intend to use the records to argue the government engaged in unconstitutional conduct by interrogating the former Broward County resident and imprisoning him for years without giving him access to some legal rights.

"The government's interrogation strategies and isolation techniques with regard to Mr. Padilla during his incarceration at the Brig are at the outer limits of civilized propriety," the attorneys stated in a court brief. "The government should not be able to shield themselves from disclosure."

After a brief but feisty exchange, Cooke rejected government arguments that the sensitive records have no relevance to the criminal charges against Padilla. She also dismissed admonitions in the government's legal briefs that the matter should be left to the discretion of the executive branch because of profound national security concerns related to Padilla's detention.

"These are his records," she said.

"No, these are the government's records, your honor," retorted attorney John Drennan of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Padilla, 35, was arrested in May 2002 at O'Hare International Airport and later transferred to military custody on suspicion he intended to carry out a terror attack on U.S. soil.

His treatment sparked one of the biggest controversies in the Bush administration's war on terror. Critics charged the president had abused his power by locking up Padilla, who is a U.S. citizen, without charges.

In 2005, as the U.S. Supreme Court considered taking up a case challenging Padilla's detention, the government switched course, adding him to an ongoing criminal case in Miami. He is charged with participating in a North American terror cell and traveling to the Middle East to receive military training.

It is not clear precisely what the medical records could reveal about Padilla's treatment or whether their contents will be made public.

Padilla's attorneys said they would look for information related to "whether the government engaged in outrageous misconduct," including evidence related to "the government's employment of psychological pressure through conditions of confinement and interrogation."

Prosecutors called Padilla's request "a thinly veiled fishing expedition" for records that "have nothing to say about whether Padilla committed the offenses charged in the indictment."

Miami criminal defense lawyer David O. Markus said the government's position "doesn't pass the smell test."

"The real question is not why Padilla would want his own records, but what is the government afraid of?" Markus said.

Cooke denied a separate request from defense attorneys Thursday for evidence related to accusations that Padilla attended an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. She also stood by her August ruling dismissing one of the main charges against Padilla and his co-defendants because it duplicated allegations in other counts.

The U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment on whether the rulings would be appealed.

'Alternative' CIA Tactics Complicate Padilla Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

When alleged Al Qaeda sympathizer Jose Padilla landed in Chicago in May 2002, he was met by federal agents armed with a warrant authorizing them to take him into custody.

To obtain their warrant, the agents told a federal judge that two weeks earlier a confidential source had revealed that Mr. Padilla was plotting to build and detonate a radiological "dirty" bomb in the United States.

What the agents did not tell the judge is that their "confidential source" was not speaking voluntarily. His information had been obtained in controversial interrogation sessions at a secret Central Intelligence Agency prison overseas.

The confidential source was a man named Zayn Abu Zubaydah, the same individual identified last week by President Bush as the first Al Qaeda suspect subjected to harsh interrogation tactics by US officials.

"We knew that Zubaydah had more information that could save innocent lives, but he stopped talking," the president said in a speech on Sept. 6. "So the CIA used an alternative set of procedures."

In 2002, the agency's pressing goal was intelligence-gathering to disrupt possible terror attacks rather than a law-enforcement operation to gather evidence that might be used against American citizens in American courts. But now, four years later, the information from those harsh interrogation sessions conducted by or at the behest of the CIA is playing an important role in government efforts to convict Padilla in a terror conspiracy case in Miami.

DOJ_NMG_0063293

The case is emerging as a major test of whether such intelligence information is admissible in US courts. And it highlights the difficult debate over military commissions currently under way in Congress, which is wrestling with how best to protect national security while also preserving America's tradition of due process and fair trials.

In a series of pretrial motions, Padilla's lawyers argue that information from Mr. Abu Zubaydah and another confidential source used to justify the May 2002 warrant was the product of torture. They say information obtained through torture cannot be used in court and that any evidence seized from Padilla during his Chicago arrest must be excluded from use at his trial. Padilla fails in bid to exclude evidence

Last week, one day before Mr. Bush publicly acknowledged the secret CIA prisons and interrogations, a federal magistrate judge in Miami rejected Padilla's arguments.

US Magistrate Judge Stephen Brown ruled that defense attorneys had failed to offer enough proof concerning the identity and treatment of the confidential sources the government used to justify the warrant.

In addition, Judge Brown ruled that even if the information the confidential sources provided was the product of torture, defense lawyers had presented no evidence that the FBI agent who prepared the warrant application was aware that they had been tortured. Short of a deliberate effort by that agent to intentionally mislead the court, the defense motion must be denied, the magistrate judge ruled.

Padilla's lawyer, Andrew Patel, says the decision is being appealed to US District Judge Marcia Cooke, the trial judge in the Padilla case. He declined any further comment on the case.

In an earlier brief, Mr. Patel wrote: "The government's claim of ignorance appears either to be incredible or the product of conscious avoidance."

In his speech, Bush justified the harsh tactics as essential to prevent terror attacks. But he also asked Congress to formulate special rules so that Abu Zubaydah and 13 other individuals could be tried by military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, despite their harsh treatment while in CIA custody.

The special provisions are necessary, in part, because the US criminal justice system excludes coerced statements as too unreliable to present in court. There is also a blanket ban on information obtained through torture.

Bush insists that torture was not used in the CIA operations. But he declined to identify the specific interrogation practices.

Legal experts say that procedures such as simulated drowning, induced hypothermia, and noise bombardment are highly coercive and can lead subjects to say whatever they think will help stop the harsh treatment. Human rights experts say these kinds of techniques can amount to torture. Congress debates coercive tactics

The president's public disclosure has prompted a debate in Congress over whether to endorse the CIA's "alternative" interrogation tactics. But Bush is also asking lawmakers to grant retroactive legal immunity to US interrogators who engaged in or were present during these practices. The request is being made despite the president's assurance that they are legal and do not amount to torture.

The government has never acknowledged the identities of the two sources used for the 2002 warrant. Defense lawyers and other analysts identified them by cross-referencing the unique information the sources provided to the government with public sources and documents that matched the same information. In addition to Abu Zubaydah, defense lawyers say the second source used to obtain the Padilla warrant was an Ethiopian named Binyam Mohammed.

Mr. Mohammed is one of 10 individuals being held at Guantánamo Bay who had been facing war-crimes conspiracy charges before the military commission process was struck down by the Supreme Court. Because of those charges, he has been afforded access to a lawyer.

According to an affidavit signed by Patel, Mohammed was being held in Pakistan at the time the Padilla warrant application was prepared. US agents wanted incriminating information about Padilla. The affidavit says Mohammed was hung on a wall with a leather strap around his wrists for a week by his Pakistani jailers. He was beaten with a leather strap, and was questioned with a loaded gun pressing into his chest, the affidavit says.

DOJ_NMG_0063294

It says he was questioned by four individuals who identified themselves as agents of the FBI. The affidavit adds that Mohammed says he is sure that if he sees them again or sees their photos he will be able to identify them.

Mohammed has told lawyers that US agents were not happy with his level of cooperation against Padilla and sent him from Pakistan to Morocco. There, according to an Amnesty International report, Moroccan interrogators used a razor blade to make 20 to 30 small cuts on his genitals. This was done once a month for 18 months, the report says. Eventually, Mohammed was sent to Afghanistan and then Guantánamo.

The specific issue in the Padilla case is whether federal prosecutors in Miami can use evidence seized from Padilla at the Chicago airport and use statements Padilla made during nearly eight hours of questioning by customs, immigration, and FBI agents before he was given Miranda warnings and placed under arrest.

After arresting Padilla, agents found the names and telephone numbers of individuals the government says were Padilla's Al Qaeda recruiter and his sponsor. They found the e-mail address of Ammar al-Baluchi, a key aide to Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 terror attacks. And they discovered a cellphone that had allegedly been provided to Padilla by Al Qaeda officials.

In addition, they confiscated $10,526 in cash, most of which they allege had been provided to Padilla by Al Qaeda leaders in Pakistan a month earlier. During questioning, agents say Padilla told them that he received the money in an envelope from an individual in Pakistan, but then said it was money he had earned.

Such evidence could play a critical role in Padilla's terror conspiracy trial, set to begin in January. Judge Cooke has already criticized the government's case as being "very light on facts." She has dismissed the most serious conspiracy count in the indictment. Evidence: 220 tapped conversations

The bulk of the evidence against Padilla's alleged coconspirators is 220 intercepted conversations. But there are only 28 instances where Padilla speaks or is allegedly mentioned, according to court documents. And none of the 28 conversations directly implicates Padilla in any acts of violence, his lawyers say.

In contrast to the skimpy evidence in the Miami criminal case, the government has assembled a mountain of intelligence information about Padilla's alleged actions and cooperation with Al Qaeda. But virtually all of it was obtained from interrogations during his 3-1/2 years in military detention as a presidentially designated enemy combatant, or through the harsh interrogation of other enemy combatants overseas. As such, it is generally ineligible for use in the criminal court system.

The 2002 warrant issue is important, legal analysts say, because it could lead to wider use in American courts of the fruits of harsh interrogations overseas. And it highlights the difficulty of blending proactive intelligence operations with law-enforcement efforts, these analysts say. Zayn Abu Zubaydah

He's a Palestinian, born in Saudi Arabia, and the first significant member of Al Qaeda captured - in March 2002 in Pakistan. Intelligence officials say he:

• Headed the reorganization of Al Qaeda in Pakistan, as well as planned attacks on US interests.

• Had connections to a plan to blow up the US Embassy in Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia-Herzegovina, as well as a planned attack on the American embassy in Paris.

• Is thought to have briefed Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber, who was arrested on board a flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001

• Is a master of disguise who used at least 37 aliases

• Is the first Al Qaeda suspect subjected to harsh interrogation, according to President Bush in a speech Sept. 6. He was interrogated in Thailand and initially questioned by the FBI, which gave him some humanitarian aid. A CIA team was later sent in. It apparently forced him to strip and stand in a cold room and subjected him to loud music.

Source: Various news reports

10 Things To Know About Guantanamo (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063295

The Pentagon successfully avoided being on David Letterman's Top Ten list for many years. So this week Secretary Donald Rumsfeld 's speechwriters tried to help, sending out "Ten Facts About Guantanamo" to highlight what a nice place it is.

The first fact notes that the inmates include some truly nasty terrorist trainers and bombmakers. The second says "More money is spent on meals for detainees than" on U.S. troops stationed there. "The average weight gain per detainee is 20 pounds."

"The Muslim call to prayer sounds five times a day," we are told, and arrows point "toward the holy city of Mecca."

The prisoners receive free medical, dental and psychiatric care, and in 2005 "there were 35 teeth cleanings." The other 400 or so housed there will have to wait awhile.

Fact No. 5 notes that the Red Cross visits "every few months" and that there's regular contact between the terrorism suspects and their families.

"Recreation activities include basketball, volleyball, soccer, ping-pong and board games," according to Fact No. 6. "High-top sneakers are provided."

We are told that upon release, everyone gets "a Koran, a jean jacket, a white T-shirt, a pair of blue jeans, high-top sneakers" -- a second pair -- "a gym bag of toiletries" (remember not to try to take the liquids onboard), and "a pillow and blanket for the flight home."

Fact No. 8, probably one of the most important, notes that, contrary to what you might have heard, the prisoners actually really want to be in Guantanamo. "The mother of a detainee stated: 'Of course they wanted to stay there. . . . They had human rights and good living standards there. They had dentists and good meals -- everything they wanted.' " Turns out, this quote from a March 2004 edition of the London Times was a Russian mother comparing Guantanamo with Russian jails.

There was "Arabic language TV," a large library with books in 13 languages. "The most requested book is 'Harry Potter,' " we're told.

And Fact No. 10. "In 2005, Amnesty International stated that 'the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay has become the gulag of our times.' "

This last fact was intended as a shot at Amnesty for comparing a veritable five-star hotel with the infamous Soviet labor camps. After all, the commies never gave away high-tops.

We're told some Pentagon folks balked at putting the list up on the Pentagon Web site, but an updated version -- minus the Russian mother quote -- is up there now at http://www.defenselink.mil/home/dodupdate .

Matt Latimer , director of the Pentagon writers group, who put together the list, said, "We welcome the chance to let people know there's more than one side to the story in Guantanamo." Latimer said, "We've gotten a lot of kudos from people who are glad we are at last . . . defending the facility."In the Scary Old Land of Oz

Most books on the Iraq war tend to be grim reads -- unrelenting, head-shaking, disastrous military decisions, one page after another.

But a new book by our colleague and former Post Baghdad bureau chief Rajiv Chandrasekaran offers tales of U.S. ineptitude in Iraq that are so wondrously mind-boggling that some sections are laugh-out-loud funny.

Of course it's gallows humor, since the book, "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," chronicles life inside the heavily fortified U.S. enclave, the Green Zone, during the first year of the oft-chaotic U.S. reconstruction program.

It's an account of how clueless but politically connected munchkins end up in important positions in the Coalition Provisional Authority while knowledgeable veterans are frozen out. As a handwritten sign in a British housing compound bar admonished: "Yee-haw is not a foreign policy."

There are scenes of visiting U.S. officials who invariably find extraordinary progress amid obvious disaster.

Thus Tommy Thompson , former secretary of health and human services, pops in to visit a Green Zone hospital and says the military-run facility -- which served mostly Americans -- shows how the United States had begun to "reestablish Iraq as a center of excellence for medical protection and medical care."

But, Chandrasekaran notes, "none of that excellence was evident outside the Emerald City." It was only a five-minute drive from the make-believe land of Oz to the huge Yarmouk Hospital. "It was, quite simply, a disaster," he writes as he describes the horrific conditions there.Oh, You Know, One of Those Middle States

DOJ_NMG_0063296

Outgoing D.C. Mayor Tony Williams , at his weekly news briefing Wednesday, talked about meeting with House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner to talk about getting voting representation in Congress.

Williams went on about how Sensenbrenner is from Illinois, and how that's a great state, always supportive of civil rights, home of Abraham Lincoln , our greatest president and so on.

At the end, one reporter asked: But isn't Sensenbrenner from Wisconsin?

Well, whatever, Williams said, it's a "core American value" were talking about.

U.S. Sends 2 Gitmo Detainees To Kuwait (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

Two Kuwaitis released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay returned on Friday to their homeland, where their lawyer said they would face trials on terrorism-related charges.

The U.S. military said an administrative review board had recommended the two men be transferred back to Kuwait from the prison in southeastern Cuba, where the U.S. now holds about 455 men on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Two two men, Omar Rajab Amin, 41, and Abdullah Kamel al-Kundari, 32, who had been held at Guantanamo for four years, arrived at an airport in Kuwait early Friday, said Khaled al-Odah, who heads the Kuwaiti Family Committee, an advocacy group for men held at the prison.

They were taken to a hospital for a medical examination and to meet with their families.

"They are very skinny and exhausted, but they looked OK," al-Odah said. "They are very happy, but worried at the same time."

Both men had been held at Guantanamo since January 2002, but had not been charged with any crimes. The military said that they had ties to charities with links to terror groups and that their names had been found on the hard drive of a computer seized from a suspected al-Qaida member, according to their attorney, David Cynamon, and military documents.

Cynamon said the two men had only traveled to Afghanistan to help refugees from the country's civil war and have no connection to any terror groups.

The lawyer predicted they would be cleared by the courts in their country — as were five other Kuwaitis previously released from Guantanamo.

Another Kuwaiti released from Guantanamo was acquitted of terror-related charges, but an appeals tribunal overturned the acquittal and sentenced him to five years in prison.

Al-Kundari was a former member of Kuwait's national volleyball team who before his arrest worked as an engineer for the Ministry of Water and Electricity, according to U.S. documents previously released to The Associated Press.

He told a military panel that he considered al-Qaida a "vicious" terrorist group, according to transcripts.

Amin, who attended college in Nebraska, was accused by the military of being a terrorist financier, which he denied. He told the panel he had never fought against U.S. forces and only wanted to return home to be with his family, according to the transcripts.

The U.S. said authorities have determined that about 130 of the remaining prisoners at Guantanamo are eligible for release or transfer but the timing will depend on negotiations with their home countries.

Mosque Leaders' Trial Continues (CAPN9)

By By: Steve Ference

Capital News 9, September 15, 2006

The trial of two Albany men accused of supporting terrorism continued on Thursday. Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain are accused of being involved in a plot to buy a surface-to-air missile. They were arrested in an FBI sting in 2004.

On Thursday, jurors saw lengthy video clips showing Mohammed Hossain speaking with an FBI informant named Malik posing as a Pakistani businessman. In the video, Malik showed Hossain a surface-to-air missile and began discussing how Malik would pay Hossain to launder $50,000 to import the fake missile to a terrorist group. But the question is, did Hossain fully understand the transaction and the situation he was put in?

DOJ_NMG_0063297

Federal prosecutors didn't waste time getting to the crux of their case against two suspected terrorists. Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref are on trial for supporting terrorism, stemming from a 2004 sting operation. They were back in court Thursday, as was our Steve Ference.

In a 2001 meeting, Malik showed Hossain the missile system and asked, "Do you know what this is?" Hossain said, "No." Malik said, "This is for destroying airplanes. This is sensor heat, you know?" He added, "We get $50,000 for these." Hossain said, "Hmm, good money can be made from this."

Later, in February 2003, Malik asked, "Have you heard of [a particular terrorist group]?" Hossain said yes, although it turns out he thought that was a music group, not a terrorist group.

Later that year, Hossain told Malik, "Non-believers will gradually convert to Islam, sir. There is no need for us to kill."

Later, a Kurd who had survived a gas attack in Saddam Hussein's Iraq testified that he was familiar with an organization called the IMK, a political group in Iraq that he pointed out Aref had once been a member of.

This could be problematic for Aref because one of the charges is that he lied on an immigration document by writing "none" instead of indicating he had ties to the group. But the defense is expected to argue it wasn't Aref's handwriting so he shouldn't be found guilty of this lesser charge.

There was also some drama in the courtroom Thursday. Aref jumped up out of his seat smiling and waving hello to the witness who identified him as being part of that political group -- an obvious cultural divide between those who are conducting the trial and the defendants.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senate OKs Legislation To Tighten Security At Seaports (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted without dissent Thursday to tighten security at U.S. seaports by scanning nearly all incoming cargo for nuclear weapons or "dirty bombs."

The bill, approved 98-0 in a pre-election push on national defense, would increase safeguards on the rail systems that pick up cargo from ports and authorize 1,000 new agents to screen containers coming off ships.

The legislation does not go as far as some Democrats demanded in requiring inspections for all U.S.-bound cargo before it leaves foreign ports. Almost 11 million containers are shipped annually to the USA.

The Senate plan, which authorizes spending $835 million next year, "works toward a goal of getting to 100% screening" of cargo leaving foreign ports, said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., one of the authors of the bill.

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, said the measure, similar to one the House approved in May, was "the most comprehensive approach to border security we have taken."

The Senate bill requires inspections of suspicious high-risk cargo at foreign ports. It also sets up a pilot program to scan for nuclear or "dirty bomb" materials in all U.S.-bound containers at three to-be-determined foreign ports. The trial would help determine whether mandatory inspections would bottle up commerce and drive up costs.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said that could be too late to prevent massive explosions at U.S. ports or in harbors outside large cities.

"We don't want to be in a situation where we say, 'What if? What if we had done more?' " Schumer said.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., responded, "This is about the practicality of making sure that we have something that works."

Noting the politics of the issue, Coleman added: "The election season is upon us. It's getting very close. … Let us step away from the sloganeering."

Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Homeland Security Department, has said that nuclear weapons are a grave threat. Such weapons create gigantic fireballs fed by nuclear chain reactions.

DOJ_NMG_0063298

"Dirty bombs," in contrast, would use conventional explosives to scatter radioactive material. This kind of blast probably would not cause many deaths, but the fear of contamination could cause panic while any land or buildings hit with radioactive particles might be unusable for years.

James Jay Carafano, homeland security fellow at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the Senate plan largely ignores security gaps such as the threat from small boats that could detonate explosives next to larger ships, as happened in the 2000 attack on the USS Cole in Yemen that killed 17 Americans.

The legislation would make available $400 million for security grants and expedite incoming cargo from previously approved manufacturers and other business partners.

The White House said it largely supports the Senate plan.

The administration has spent about $10 billion on port security since the Sept. 11 attacks. About 65% of cargo is already screened for nuclear or radiological materials. The Homeland Security Department aims to increase that number to 80% by the end of the year and to almost 100% by the end of 2007.

Senate Unanimously Votes To Tighten Security Measures At Ports (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The Senate voted without dissent yesterday to tighten security at U.S. seaports by scanning nearly all incoming cargo for "dirty bombs" and other nuclear weapons.

The bill, approved 98 to 0 in a pre-election push on national defense, would increase safeguards on the rail systems that pick up cargo from ports and authorize 1,000 new agents to screen containers coming off ships. But the legislation does not go as far as some Democrats demanded in requiring inspections for all U.S.-bound cargo before it leaves foreign ports. Almost 11 million containers a year are shipped to the United States.

The plan, which authorizes spending $835 million next year, "works toward a goal of getting to 100 percent screening" of cargo leaving foreign ports, said Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.), one of the bill's authors. Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) said the measure, similar to one the House approved in May, was "the most comprehensive approach to border security we have taken to date."

The Senate bill requires inspections of suspicious high-risk cargo at foreign ports. It also sets up a pilot program to scan for nuclear or "dirty bomb" materials in all U.S.-bound containers at three to-be-determined foreign ports. The trial would help determine if mandatory inspections would bottle up commerce and drive up costs, as Republicans fear.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said that could be too late to prevent massive explosions at U.S. ports or in harbors outside large cities.

James Jay Carafano, homeland security fellow at the Heritage Foundation, said the Senate plan largely ignores security gaps such as the threat from small boats that could detonate explosives next to larger ships, as happened in the 2000 attack on the USS Cole in Yemen that killed 17 Americans.

The bill would make available $400 million for security grants and would expedite incoming cargo from previously approved manufacturers and other business partners. It also included special items for landlocked states, including $40 million for northern border air patrols over Great Falls, Mont., requested by Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), and extending the daily hours at a New Mexico border crossing, sought by Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.).

The White House said it largely supports the Senate plan. The administration has spent about $10 billion on ports security since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. About 65 percent of cargo is already screened for nuclear or radiological materials. The Department of Homeland Security aims to increase that number to 80 percent by the end of the year and to almost 100 percent by the end of 2007.

Senate Approves Bill To Tighten Port Security (MCT)

By Les Blumenthal

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063299

WASHINGTON - The Senate approved a port-security bill Thursday that its sponsors said would make the nation safer from terrorist attack, after it rejected a plan to inspect every inbound cargo container for nuclear weapons.

The measure, approved 98-0, would require installing radiation monitors at the country's 22 largest ports and would authorize a pilot program involving three foreign ports to scan all cargo containers headed to the United States.

It also would establish a new office within the Department of Homeland Security to coordinate port security and would order the department to prepare a plan for getting cargo moving again after an attack. One study estimated that a 12-day shutdown of the ports could cost the U.S. economy $58 billion.

"We have done a lot to secure our ports, but they are still too porous," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. "This bill represents a multipronged approach to plug the holes in our port security."

Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., the bill's lead author, who has been pushing for tougher port security since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, said Senate approval cleared the way for possible final action before the end of the year.

"A big hurdle has been passed," Murray said. "It's a huge step in a very positive direction."

The House of Representatives has approved its own version of the bill, and a compromise will have to be negotiated. Congress is scheduled to recess in early October but could come back after the November elections to finish pending legislation.

Senate passage of the bill comes more than two years after the 9-11 commission concluded that the nation's ports could be more vulnerable to attack than commercial aviation. More than 95 percent of the nation's trade - worth nearly $1 trillion - flows through more than 360 U.S. ports every year. Virtually all of it is carried on 8,500 foreign-flagged vessels that make 55,000 calls at American ports annually.

About 5 percent of the nearly 11 million cargo containers that arrive in the United States annually is opened and inspected. Some are scanned for nuclear material.

Congress' Government Accountability Office has raised questions about the effectiveness of the program that identifies which "high-risk" containers are inspected and has expressed concern about the effectiveness of the radiation monitors now being used.

Efforts to pass a port-security bill had languished until an uproar last February over the disclosure that a Dubai company had been approved to operate a handful of U.S. ports.

The measure picked up more steam over the past few weeks as congressional Republicans have ratcheted up their national security agenda. Democrats said Republicans were scrambling to shore up their national security credentials for political reasons before the elections.

"Five years after 9-11, repeated failures by Bush Republicans have left our ports vulnerable and open to terrorist attack," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said in a statement.

Republicans dismissed such allegations.

"This is an important bill for our homeland security," said Maine Sen. Susan Collins, the lead Republican sponsor of the measure.

Murray said any political motivations for moving the bill weren't important.

"To me it doesn't matter," she said. "Getting it done is the right thing to do."

The Senate tabled, 61-37, an amendment offered by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that would have required that 100 percent of the cargo containers headed for the United States be scanned within four years. Shippers would have picked up the cost.

"What are we waiting for?" Schumer said. "This mandates we inspect all cargo - no pilot programs, no tests, all containers - for nuclear weapons."

Schumer said the Homeland Security Department had been "derelict" by not requiring 100 percent inspections, that the technology existed to do it and that the cost would be $8 per container, not much when considering that it cost $2,000 to ship a container from Hong Kong to the West Coast.

Collins said the bill would move toward 100 percent inspections when it was "proved and feasible." Doing it prematurely could create a massive backlog of containers waiting on the docks to be inspected, she said.

The 22 large ports that would receive radiation scanners handle about 98 percent of the containers that come into the United States. Schumer's amendment would have required that the scanning take place overseas, before the containers are shipped.

The bill would authorize almost $3.3 billion in port-security funding over the next six years and another $400 million in grants to individual ports. Since 9-11, seaports have sought more than $4.3 billion in federal aid for security. The Department of Homeland Security has provided about 20 percent of the amount requested, about $876 million.

Chemical-plant Security Vexes Congress (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK

A toxic battle is brewing on Capitol Hill over how to secure the nation's chemical plants from terrorist attack.

At issue is whether the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) should have the authority to require chemical plants to implement specific security measures, such as switching to safer chemicals or using armed guards. The chemical industry and House Republican leaders believe it should not. Instead, they favor allowing companies to come up with their own security proposals that can then be reviewed and approved by DHS.

On the other side are environmentalists, some security experts, moderate Republicans, and Democrats. They believe DHS should have the ability to require companies to make security improvements, as long as companies have an opportunity to appeal requirements to which they object.

But all sides agree on one thing: It's way past time for the government to come up with some kind of legislation requiring improved security at the nation's chemical plants.

"It's unacceptable we don't have a piece of legislation on such a significant critical infrastructure that, if attacked, could have potentially catastrophic consequences," says Frank Cilluffo, director of George Washington University's Homeland Security Policy Institute in Washington.

Several factors are responsible for the lack of legislation five years after 9/11. In the first few years after the attacks, the chemical industry convinced congressional leaders they could self-regulate. The American Chemistry Council (ACC), which represents 133 chemical manufacturers, set up standards and guidelines to help companies identify their vulnerabilities and create security plans to address them. The ACC says its members have spent $3 billion enhancing security in the past five years.

But investigations done by the media, the Government Accountability Office, and environmental groups made it clear that while some industry players have done a good job in "raising the bar" for security, as Mr. Cilluffo puts it, not all have. Significant vulnerabilities remained, some in densely populated urban areas. Eventually, even the ACC conceded that some kind of legislation was needed to bring uniformity to security in the industry.

"We've been very clear that we want legislation passed this year and what it would look like," says Scott Jensen, a spokesman for the ACC. "It would be risk-based, performance oriented, and it would not include [inherently safer technologies]."

Known as IST in the industry, this essentially means switching from some of the most deadly chemicals to less harmful ones whenever it's technologically and economically feasible.

This summer, the House Committee on Homeland Security unanimously approved a compromise bill that would give DHS the authority to require some high-risk facilities to use safer chemicals when feasible. If a company disagreed with DHS, the bill set up an interagency appeal process.

It was a hard-fought compromise. But now, its advocates contend that the chemical industry, in conjunction with the White House and the Republican leadership, is reneging on the deal. Instead of bringing it to the floor for a vote, House Republican leaders are amending the Homeland Security appropriations bill: It would give DHS the authority to require chemical plants to develop vulnerability assessments and security plans, but it would specifically forbid DHS from requiring any specific security measure. It reads, "Nothing in this section authorizes the Secretary directly or indirectly to require any particular security measure." Environmental advocates say that line is aimed at ensuring that DHS cannot require companies to switch to safer chemicals when feasible.

DOJ_NMG_0063301

"The industry didn't like what was passed in committee, and now they're using the appropriations process to craft a drastically weak, completely industry-friendly version and present it as a fait accompli," says Andy Igrejas of the National Environmental Trust, a nonprofit environmental advocacy group based in Washington. "A congressman can oppose it, but to do so, he or she'd have to vote against Homeland Security appropriations just six weeks before an election."

Mr. Igrejas adds, "There was an open process where competing proposals led to something that was a deal [Republican leadership] agreed to honor, and now instead, under industry pressure" it's going back on its word, he says.

But Mr. Jensen of the ACC disagrees. He says the industry is simply using the legislative process to advocate what it believes is right.

"We're not against IST. The chemical industry developed and created it," he says. "However, what we are against is banning chemicals under the guise of security. We think the legislation should work toward securing those chemicals, rather than banning them."

Some security experts say they're not surprised the sides remain so polarized, but contend it's crucial to get legislation passed soon.

"I'd at least like to see some kind of starting point so we can pull together more and better information so we can figure out how to proceed in the long run," says Jack Riley, a security expert at the RAND Corp. in Arlington, Va.

The House appropriations bill for Homeland Security is still being negotiated, but is expected to be voted on before Congress recesses for the November elections.

Suspended Muslim Safety Expert Sues DHS (AP)

By Wayne Parry, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. -- An Egyptian-born aviation security expert is suing the U.S. government, claiming he was wrongly suspended from his Transportation Security Administration job based on a classified FBI file the government won't let him see.

Wagih H. Makky filed the lawsuit Thursday in federal court in Newark, alleging he was harassed and discriminated against at work after the Sept. 11 terror attacks based on his nationality and his Muslim religion.

The lawsuit claims Makky is one of the world's leading experts in designing and evaluating technology to prevent explosives from being smuggled onto airplanes and rail cars. Makky, 55, a U.S. citizen, most recently worked at the TSA aviation center outside Atlantic City.

Following the Pan Am jet bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988, Makky was chosen to create a Federal Aviation Administration unit to focus government efforts to prevent terrorist attacks on American airliners.

According to the lawsuit, a new supervisor in 2002 asked Makky during their first meeting about his ethnic background. When the U.S. invasion of Iraq began in March 2003, the supervisor placed him on administrative leave, based on the classified file, according to the lawsuit.

In August 2005, Makky was suspended without pay, and remains suspended.

The lawsuit names the Department of Homeland Security among others as defendants. The lawsuit did not specify damages. A Homeland Security spokesman did not return a call seeking comment Thursday.

Makky could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Air Cargo Faces Tighter Screening (AP)

By Denise Lavoie

The AP, September 14, 2006

BOSTON -- Packages taken to airline ticket counters for shipment on passenger planes will have to go through the same security screening as checked baggage, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Thursday.

Such packages _ brought to an airline's counter by individuals looking to get a package to another destination or by courier services _ already were being screened for the past several months at most airports around the country.

But the screening now will be mandatory for 100 percent of those packages, Chertoff said at a news conference at Boston's Logan International Airport.

DOJ_NMG_0063302

"We closed that gap earlier this year, but we're now making this a legal requirement," Chertoff said, announcing that a formal directive was signed Thursday.

Chertoff said the move was in response to concerns that the packages were not being screened for explosives.

Chertoff cited Logan as being the first airport in the country to begin screening 100 percent of its passengers' checked baggage for explosives. Logan had begun the package screening four months ago, using X-ray and explosive sensors that are used to screen baggage on a system of conveyor belts.

Despite the new requirement, most of the cargo on passenger planes, which comes from larger freight shippers, remains subjected only to random checks. Freight forwarders who accept bulk packages and arrange shipment are required to have government-approved security plans and attend TSA training. Air cargo companies must register with the government and be approved by the TSA before they're allowed to send cargo on passenger airliners.

U.S. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House Homeland Security Committee who has criticized the lax screening procedures for counter packages, said he was pleased that the TSA had closed the loophole _ but wanted more done.

"Until the Bush Administration physically screens all cargo on passenger planes for explosives and requires all cargo to arrive at the airport in a form that is screenable using existing screening technology, passenger planes are vulnerable to terrorist attack by people who don't even fly on the planes they seek to bring down," he said in a statement.

In May the TSA announced new air cargo security requirements, including criminal background checks for airline and freight workers and additional screeners to check the packages delivered to ticket counters. It also announced plans to use more bomb-sniffing dogs to screen air freight and to hire more air cargo inspectors.

Meanwhile, cargo pilots have complained about the vulnerability of cargo planes as the government focused on protecting passenger airliners.

The visit by Chertoff and Hawley comes three days after the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which were launched from Logan when hijackers boarded planes at the airport and crashed them into New York's World Trade Center.

Chertoff: Fee Up In Air For Registered Traveler (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 15, 2006

BOSTON — With opposition mounting, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday that he is "still looking at" how much to charge air travelers for a program that would speed them through airport security.

Chertoff said he supports the idea of making people in the Registered Traveler program "pay their own weight," which could cost up to $200 a year.

"We shouldn't necessarily have the taxpayer pay to subsidize people who want to go through the Registered Traveler program," Chertoff told reporters at Boston's Logan International Airport. "We want to be fair. … Now exactly what the right amount of money is going to be and how that's going to work, I think, is something we're still looking at."

Chertoff's comments come days after the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) disclosed that it plans to charge travelers $100 to $120 to enroll in Registered Traveler and at least $70 a year for every year after their first in the program. The Homeland Security Department oversees the TSA.

The government costs are in addition to roughly $80 annually that program participants would have to pay to companies operating the program.

Under Registered Traveler, people who pass a voluntary background check would receive a fingerprint-embedded ID card that would give them access to special security lanes with expedited screening.

The heftier charge stunned some TSA advocates. On Thursday, a coalition of 10 companies seeking to provide services for Registered Traveler called on the TSA to reduce the fee, saying it will "stunt, if not eliminate" the program.

The group, called the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition, also questioned whether the TSA can charge fees to recoup costs of TSA screeners at Registered Traveler checkpoints. Of the $100 the TSA proposes charging, $70 would pay for screener salaries.

DOJ_NMG_0063303

TSA chief Kip Hawley defended the proposed fee after a news conference here with Chertoff and said that $100 is "a reasonable estimate" of the cost for each Registered Traveler.

TSA To Review Proposed Registered Traveler Fee (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Transportation Security Administration is reviewing plans to charge a hefty fee to travelers who want to sign up for a program that aims to expedite trips through airport security.

This week the agency sparked a battle with the private companies that want to offer Registered Traveler when it said it plans to charge an annual fee of $100 per person to cover background checks and the full cost of airport screening. The companies, which expected a fee of about $30, say too few people will sign up if fees are too high. Any fees charged by TSA would be in addition to the charges levied by the companies that provide the service, which run about $80 a person.

Yesterday, a TSA official said the fee amount is now under review.

"The proposed fee will stunt, if not eliminate RT programs, thus undermining the promise of better aviation security and much needed customer service improvements," the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition, which represents private companies that want to provide the service, said in a statement.

Insurers Press For Terror-Backstop Renewal (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins And Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the White House and many in Congress reluctantly agreed to create a temporary government program to backstop the insurance industry in the event of another attack. Officials feared making the government a force in the insurance industry, but they knew the private sector would need time to establish a market for coverage against acts of terrorism.

Now, some in the business and insurance community want to create a long-term or permanent terrorism insurance program. Under the program set up by the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act, the government steps in to help make an insurer's payouts if the losses from a foreign terrorist attack exceed that insurer's deductible.

With more than a year remaining before the program expires, a politically savvy group -- including insurance companies, real-estate owners, financial services firms and former American International Group Chief Executive Maurice Greenberg -- is working to press the issue.

Industry representatives aren't coordinating efforts and haven't agreed on a plan. For example, the plan offered by the real-estate industry conflicts with one from the insurance lobby. But early efforts show that creating a permanent terrorism insurance system will be a priority next year for the financial-services industry.

At a speech in New York today, Mr. Greenberg is expected to say that the government must help the industry if terrorists strike with a weapon of mass destruction. The insurance industry should be able to cover claims from a less catastrophic attack, according to his prepared remarks.

"The industry can handle the impact of another 9/11, what it can't is the aftermath of a dirty bomb or a poisoned water supply in a major city," Mr. Greenberg will tell the Barbon Institute for Risk Management and Insurance, an industry think tank.

He also will propose a group of industry leaders and government officials to develop a long-term terrorism insurance plan. Mr. Greenberg says Washington should allow insurance companies to create tax-free accounts to build reserves to cover claims from terrorism.

The response from his industry colleagues and Washington lawmakers to Mr. Greenberg's proposal will be a test of his political sway. Mr. Greenberg was once seen as the voice of the insurance business in Washington, at times to the chagrin of the insurance lobby. He was ousted in March 2005 amid regulatory investigations into AIG's accounting. Mr. Greenberg controls C.V. Starr & Co., a global insurance and investment firm.

Meanwhile, other industry players are lobbying. Earlier this week, lobbyists for large U.S. real-estate owners traveled to Washington to pitch their solution. Owners of shopping malls, hotels and office buildings say insurers can't offer the level of terrorism insurance they need, and they worry that there would be no coverage if the government exits the market. They propose a $30 billion fund paid for by insurance companies that can be tapped to cover terrorism claims. Under the plan, the government would keep serving as an insurance backstop for five to seven years until the fund is operational.

Before 9/11, losses caused by terrorism were included in standard insurance policies. But insurers paid out $32.5 billion as a result of the attacks, according to the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. Some insurance companies balked at providing the coverage at all. Many insurance companies considered terrorism, by its nature, too unpredictable to insure. Businesses, meanwhile, were confronting the prospect of having no insurance to protect against terrorism. Pressed by several sectors, the Bush administration reluctantly stepped in.

The American Insurance Association wants to extend the basic structure of the current program. The group suggests having the government largely take over paying for attacks involving nuclear, biological, chemical and radiological weapons. Attacks involving conventional weapons would be covered by insurers up to the point where a traditional federal backstop would kick in.

The Bush administration is opposed to a permanent reinsurance program. The backstop "was intended to provide temporary assistance as the industry adapted to a post-9/11 world, but the ... continued presence of a government-provided subsidy could crowd out the chances for a private market to develop," a Treasury Department spokeswoman said.

But other political forces may increase chances that the industry will succeed. The chief sponsor of the bill that created the program, Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.), will be the senior Democrat on the Senate Banking Committee next year.

Amazing Device Sucks Up Sludge -- And Tax Dollars (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Sure, it was a national emergency, but the Transportation Department's inspector general finds $935 an hour for a Sewer Hog a tad piggish.

In a new post-Katrina audit, the inspector general's office told the Federal Highway Administration that the state of Mississippi had overspent by $772 an hour on the Sewer Hog, a high-speed swiller used to clear flooded storm drains.

Desperate to reopen U.S. 90 along the Gulf Coast, Mississippi transportation officials turned to Texas-based Garner Environmental Services Inc., exclusive operators of the Sewer Hog. Together with its partner the Grit Gator, the mobile-home-size contraption sucked slop and sand from about 200 miles of three-foot sewer lines.

But it also hogged the budget. State highway officials -- and the feds -- paid $1.7 million for services that the report said ought to have cost $294,000.

It is not easy to estimate what a rare breed like the Sewer Hog should cost, and like a homeowner with an overflowing toilet, Mississippi highway officials opted to mop first and ask questions later. They were overcharged, the report's authors say, partly because they failed to run the Sewer Hog through a formula designed for pricing specialized equipment and negotiate in advance.

Using that formula, "the rental rate for this specialized equipment would have been $163 per hour," the report read. "In our opinion a rental rate of $935 per hour for the Sewer Hog was higher than what may be considered reasonable, even under the catastrophic conditions that were created by Hurricane Katrina."

The inspector general's office recommends that the Mississippi Department of Transportation consider taking Garner Environmental Services to court to recover part of the bill. Company representatives did not respond to repeated requests for a comment.

The Sewer Hog "was a big thing," said Todd J. Zinser, the acting inspector general, referring to the overcharge.

But it should not, pointed out IG spokesman David Barnes, be confused with a Smart Pig. Smart Pigs root through pipelines looking for leaks -- and they will star in an upcoming report on pipeline safety, he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet With Musharraf And Karzai (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0063305

AP, September 15, 2006

President Bush has scheduled separate White House meetings later this month with the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan, neighboring countries whose relations have sometimes been strained by terrorist hideouts along their border.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf is meeting with Bush on Sept. 22. Days later, on Sept. 26, Afghan President Hamid Karzai is due in the Oval Office. The meetings were announced amid a growing Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan.

"The visit will be an opportunity for the president to congratulate President Karzai on the progress Afghanistan has made over the last five years and to reaffirm America's commitment to stability and reconstruction in Afghanistan," White House press secretary Tony Snow said of the Karzai visit.

The resurgent Taliban, trying to topple the U.S.-backed Karzai government in Kabul, has adopted a dangerous change in tactics, copying the lead of insurgent attacks in Iraq. Since the start of the year, 173 people — including 151 Afghan civilians — have been killed in suicide bombings across the country, NATO announced Wednesday.

Military commanders have called for 2,500 extra troops to help the NATO force, which took control of the coalition in the south on Aug. 1. But NATO nations have failed to agree.

Snow said that in addition to strategizing about countering the threat of militant extremists, Bush and Karzai will talk about Afghanistan's drug trade, need for good governance and faltering economy.

Pakistan was once a key Taliban supporter, but switched sides to become an ally of the U.S. in its campaign against terrorism following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Still, relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan have been strained for years, mainly over allegations by Afghan officials that Pakistan hasn't done enough to go after the remnants of the ousted Taliban regime, which Afghani leaders say have established hideouts in Pakistan along the mountainous border. Pakistan has rejected such charges.

Recently, cross-border relations have improved, and Karzai and Musharraf pledged in meetings in Kabul earlier this month to jointly fight militants.

The Musharraf-Bush sessions follow their meetings in March, when the president traveled to Pakistan. He also visited Afghanistan and India on that trip.

Kerry Faults Bush's Afghanistan Strategy (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, September 15, 2006

Democratic Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, accused the Bush administration of pursuing a "cut and run" strategy in Afghanistan that has emboldened terrorists and made the U.S. less safe.

"The administration's Afghanistan policy defines cut and run," Kerry said in remarks at Howard University on Thursday. "Cut and run while the Taliban-led insurgency is running amok across entire regions of the country. Cut and run while Osama bin Laden and his henchmen hide and plot in a lawless no-man's land."

Kerry's "cut and run" accusation echoes criticism Republicans have leveled at Democrats who have challenged Bush's handling of the Iraq war.

A potential 2008 presidential candidate, Kerry lashed out at the administration on the same day the White House announced meetings later this month with the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan.

"John Kerry lacks the credibility on the war on terror to be taken seriously," said Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz. "The junior senator from Massachusetts would be well served by not using his own agenda's mantra to falsely attack this administration's foreign policy."

Afghanistan has been plagued by an upsurge in violence by the Taliban, which is trying to topple the U.S.-backed government in Kabul. Military commanders have called for an extra 2,500 troops to help the NATO force in Afghanistan.

Kerry wants at least 5,000 additional troops sent there, contending that the Bush administration has focused on Iraq while failing to respond forcefully to threats in Afghanistan and Iran.

"The central front in the war on terror is still in Afghanistan, but this administration treats it like a sideshow," said Kerry, adding there are seven times more troops in Iraq than Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0063306

"When did denying al-Qaida a terrorist stronghold in Afghanistan stop being an urgent American priority?" Kerry said. "How is it possible that we keep sending thousands of additional U.S. troops into the middle of a civil war in Iraq but we can't find any more troops to send to Afghanistan?"

The Republican National Committee dismissed Kerry's criticism.

"John Kerry lacks the credibility on the war on terror to be taken seriously," said spokesman Danny Diaz of the four-term senator, a longtime member of the Foreign Relations Committee. "The junior senator from Massachusetts would be well-served by not using his own agenda's mantra to falsely attack this administration's foreign policy."

Militants Regroup In Western Afghanistan (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2006

As NATO troops exert pressure on Taliban forces in southern Afghanistan, militants have regrouped in western provinces and ignited violence that has killed a dozen people in two days, officials said. Up to 200 Taliban fighters poured into Bakwa in Farah province. They surrounded a police compound and fired rocket-propelled grenades at policemen before being driven out, said Maj. Gen. Sayed Agha Saqeb, the police chief.

NATO commanders have asked for reinforcements to the 20,000-strong force in Afghanistan. Poland pledged to add a 1,000-strong mechanized force but said the troops would not be deployed until February.

Spain says no law broken with CIA flights

Spain may have been a stopover for secret CIA flights, but there is no evidence any laws were violated, Foreign Minister Miguel Angel Moratinos said. He said Spain did not help transfer terror suspects to U.S. agents. U.S. officials have told the Spanish government they were not aware of any secret passengers aboard CIA planes that stopped on the way to such places as Kabul, Afghanistan, or the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, Moratinos said.

Moratinos was the first government minister to testify to a European Parliament committee in Brussels investigating alleged CIA secret flights and detention centers in Europe used for interrogations.

Giovanni Fava of the European Union assembly said in a report this year that 125 CIA-related flights landed at 10 Spanish airports from 2003 through 2005.

Castro recovering well, a friend says

Cuban President Fidel Castro made an appearance of sorts on the sidelines of the Non-aligned Movement summit in Havana when state television showed photos of him chatting with an old friend, Argentine congressman Miguel Bonasso, in Castro's home. Bonasso said the Cuban leader claimed to have regained nearly half the 41 pounds he said he lost since intestinal surgery in July. “Fidel was as lucid and penetrating as ever,” Bonasso wrote in a first-person article about their encounter in the Pagina/12 newspaper. Castro, 80, has not appeared in public since the surgery. He temporarily ceded power to his brother, Raul, the defense chief.

Poland Commits New Troops To Nato Force (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Stephen Fidler And Jan Cienski

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

Poland on Thursday committed 1,000 new troops for Nato’s force in Afghanistan, after a formal meeting of the alliance on Wednesday failed to meet an urgent military request for hundreds of extra soldiers.

The Polish troops will join the 100 already on the ground in Afghanistan but are unlikely to arrive until February 2007.

The push for reinforcements put the spotlight on Nato’s struggle to help establish a stable government in Afghanistan and on its long-term prospects as a military alliance.

At an emergency meeting on Wednesday, Nato’s 26 member countries came up with no commitments for any new soldiers – in spite of a call last week by General James Jones, Nato’s supreme commander, for up to 2,500 troops.

Nato said: “We have had indications in terms of force generation to fill the outstanding requirement...the operation commanders, including Gen Jones, are confident that they have sufficient forces in the theatre to be able to complete the operation successfully.” The alliance said it had managed to clear Taliban insurgents from 55 per cent of the area surrounding their former stronghold of Kandahar.

DOJ_NMG_0063307

Lord Garden, a former senior air force officer who acts as a defence spokesman for Britain's Liberal Democratic party, said: "Part of the problem... is Nato funding. If you volunteer, not only do you provide the troops, you have to provide the money to fund them."

Diplomats sought to emphasise that the Nato mission was a long way from failure. Victoria Nuland, US ambassador to Nato, said: "One of the things that is getting lost here is that the operation against the Taliban is a huge success. The extra troops will allow us to win faster and more decisively and to continue reconstruction at the same time."

However, casualties taken by British troops in the southern province of Helmand have increased controversy over the mission.

NATO's Afghan Test (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

IN AFGHANISTAN, the NATO alliance is engaged in the bloodiest and most important land battle in its 57-year history. Some 6,000 British and Canadian troops have been fighting near-daily engagements with the resurgent Taliban militia in the southern provinces of Kandahar and Helmand, killing more than 500 of the enemy in the past month while suffering three dozen deaths of their own soldiers. The campaign is fateful in several respects: It could prove a turning point both for Afghanistan and for NATO, which hopes to demonstrate that an alliance forged for the Cold War in Europe can tackle the West's 21st-century challenges.

For that reason, it's been encouraging to see the courage and apparent effectiveness of the British and Canadian troops, who are supported by U.S. and Afghan forces; it's been equally disheartening to witness the response of other NATO governments to an urgent request for more soldiers and aircraft to ensure the Taliban's defeat. At a special pledging conference at NATO headquarters in Brussels on Wednesday, the alliance's 26 governments failed to make any new commitments of troops.

NATO's top commander, U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, wasn't asking for anything exceptional when he urged the alliance last week to provide an additional 1,000 soldiers to serve as a reserve battalion as well as 1,500 more air support personnel and a squadron of helicopters. In fact, those forces were supposed to be part of NATO's commitment to southern Afghanistan; only 85 percent of the planned force was provided. The NATO force, which totals 8,000, including Dutch troops in a third province, is barely adequate for its principal planned mission, which was to help extend the authority of the Afghan government to southern Afghanistan and support aid and development projects.

As it has turned out, the NATO troops have encountered fierce resistance from thousands of Taliban fighters who have infiltrated the region since last spring and are staging large-scale assaults. The unexpected intensity of the combat has raised domestic pressure on the Canadian and British governments, though both are so far standing firm. But other NATO governments are failing to commit their own soldiers as reinforcements; even worse, governments that already have troops in Afghanistan, such as Germany, are refusing to consider transferring some of them to the south from the relatively peaceful bases they occupy.

There's no question that placing soldiers in harm's way is one of the hardest steps for a democracy, and rightly so. But European governments that say they are committed to NATO and its mission in Afghanistan cannot continue to watch from a distance as American, British and Canadian soldiers do the lion's share of the fighting -- and dying. If NATO is to be an enduring military alliance, its other members must step forward.

9/11, Osama Reflection: Reverse Cut And Run? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Memories, views and reviews of 9/11 on the fifth anniversary this week should make us reflect on what we've done right and wrong since then. The scorecard:

• President Bush united us with his immediate pledge to get Osama bin Laden "dead or alive" for plotting and executing the 9/11 attacks.

•When that hunt went bad, Bush's preoccupation with going after Iraq's Saddam Hussein, who had nothing to do with Sept. 11, divided us.

DOJ_NMG_0063308

Because Bush and his buddies misled us about weapons of mass destruction, there was public and political support for the Iraq war in the beginning. But now a big majority of you say invading Iraq was a mistake.

In this column back on Oct. 4, 2002, I wrote:

"Congress is 'debating' but President Bush and his cohorts are demanding a virtual blank check to wage war in Iraq. They'll probably get it. That's a mistake."

Currently, we have about 147,000 troops in Iraq, about 21,000 in Afghanistan. We actually "cut and ran" from the hunt for bin Laden in Afghanistan to carry out our Iraq misadventure.

In this column, I've often suggested we should take our troops out of Iraq "sooner rather than later." We're viewed with disdain by many there and by most around the world as an "occupation" force.

Bush says we must "stay the course" and not "cut and run." Since we cut and ran from Afghanistan during our Osama hunt years ago, maybe we should reverse that course now.

Redeploying our troops to fulfill our pledge to get bin Laden could make for a worldwide celebration by freedom lovers. Letting him stay on the loose is the biggest boost for terrorists, in Iraq and around the world.

CIA Learned In '02 That Bin Laden Had No Iraq Ties, Report Says (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The CIA learned in late September 2002 from a high-level member of Saddam Hussein's inner circle that Iraq had no past or present contact with Osama bin Laden and that the Iraqi leader considered bin Laden an enemy of the Baghdad regime, according to a recent Senate Intelligence Committee report.

Although President Bush and other senior administration officials were at that time regularly linking Hussein to al-Qaeda, the CIA's highly sensitive intelligence supporting the contrary view was apparently not passed on to the White House or senior Bush policymakers.

Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) and two GOP colleagues on the committee disclosed this information for the first time in the panel's report on Iraq released last week. They wrote in the "additional views" section of the report that the Cabinet-level Iraqi official "said that Iraq has no past, current, or anticipated future contact with Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda" and that the official "added that bin Laden was in fact a longtime enemy of Iraq."

On Sept. 25, 2002, just days after the CIA received the source's information, President Bush told reporters: "Al-Qaeda hides. Saddam doesn't, but the danger is, is that they work in concert. The danger is, is that al-Qaeda becomes an extension of Saddam's madness and his hatred and his capacity to extend weapons of mass destruction around the world. . . . [Y]ou can't distinguish between al-Qaeda and Saddam when you talk about the war on terror."

According to the three Republicans, the CIA said it did not disseminate the intelligence about the lack of a Hussein-bin Laden connection because "it did not provide anything new."

But other information obtained at the same time from the same source that paralleled what administration officials were saying was immediately passed on to "alert" the president and other senior policymakers, the three Republicans said. A "highly restricted intelligence report" conveyed the source's claim that although Iraq had no nuclear weapon, Hussein was covertly developing one and had stockpiled chemical weapons, according to the committee members.

CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano said he could not provide additional information about the situation beyond what is in the Senate report, but he added that "the agency's decisions to disseminate intelligence are not guided by political considerations."

Committee staff members would not expand on the report's language other than to say the Hussein-bin Laden material was maintained within the CIA at a high level with limited access.

Former senior CIA officials said it was unclear what happened to the Hussein-bin Laden information, although two former aides to then-CIA Director George J. Tenet said they could not remember if they received the original information. "Nothing was withheld from the White House," one former aide said, although there was "a lot of debate inside the agency about the Saddam-al-Qaeda relationship" because it was the focus of repeated questions from administration officials, including Vice President Cheney and his then-chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

DOJ_NMG_0063309

The high-level Iraqi official, who was not identified in the Senate report, was Naji Sabri, then foreign minister. A senior CIA officer, after months of trying, was able to question him through a trusted agency intermediary when Sabri was in New York City around Sept. 19, 2002.

According to former intelligence officials, the CIA case officer filed two separate reports describing his questioning of Sabri. One, involving the Iraq weapons program, would go to analysts interested in that subject, the officer believed; the second, about Hussein and bin Laden, would go to the CIA counterterrorism center. The officer, however, passed his material on to senior agency officials in New York and was not aware of how it was eventually distributed.

Sabri's role as an intelligence source for the CIA has already been publicly reported. New details, including a payment of $200,000 to the intermediary and a secret signal system to assure the CIA officer that Sabri was cooperating, are contained in the recently released book "Hubris," by Michael Isikoff of Newsweek and David Corn, Washington correspondent for the magazine the Nation.

U.S. Says Sectarian Killings Up In Iraq (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, September 14, 2006

Sectarian killings have surged in parts of Baghdad not yet included in a security offensive, the U.S. military said Thursday, while bombings and other insurgent attacks killed four American soldiers and wounded 25 in the capital region.

Police reported finding 20 bodies dumped on streets, many of them victims of reprisal killings in the escalating conflict between Shiite and Sunni Arabs. Six people died when a car bomb exploded at a soccer field in Fallujah, raising the death toll across Iraq to at least 28.

One of the few positive developments for the U.S.-led coalition and the national unity government was the reported killing of a senior member of al-Qaida in Iraq and the capture of another.

Shiite politicians, meanwhile, said they had made progress in trying to break a deadlock over legislation to establish autonomous regions as part of a federated Iraq. Sunni Arabs oppose the bill, fearing it could split Iraq into three sectarian and ethnic cantons.

The worst violence in Baghdad came at midday when a suicide car bomber attacked U.S. troops on the western outskirts of the city, killing two Americans and wounding 25, the U.S. command said. It said six of the wounded had returned to duty and 15 were not seriously injured.

Two more U.S. soldiers also were killed in the Baghdad area, one when his patrol was hit by small-arms fire and the other when a roadside bomb exploded. The command also announced the killing of a soldier Wednesday near the northern city of Mosul, raising to at least 2,676 the number of U.S. military personnel killed since the war began, according to an Associated Press count.

Violence has intensified over the past two days, with more than 140 people either killed by attacks or their bodies found dumped in the streets of Baghdad.

"There was a spike in violence in Baghdad over the past 24 hours from murder-executions," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the U.S. command's spokesman. "Most of those are associated with sectarian violence, not all necessarily, but a large portion."

He said the violence had intensified in areas that have not been reached by Operation Together Forward, a security campaign launched Aug. 7 with 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers.

"The terrorists and death squads are clearly targeting civilians outside of the focus areas," Caldwell said.

In areas that have been part of the operation, U.S. and Iraqi forces have cleared more than 52,000 buildings, found 32 weapon caches, detained 91 people and seized more than 1,200 weapons, Caldwell said.

"Overall, as part of the Baghdad security plan, we have seen a sustained reduction of level in the violence of attacks and murders in the focus areas," he asserted.

DOJ_NMG_0063310

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that "there is a lot of progress being made" to stabilize the Baghdad area and toward the U.S. goal of turning over security in much of the country to Iraqi forces by the end of the year.

As for the continuing bloodshed, McCormack said, "Al-Qaida clearly has an interest in fomenting sectarian violence in Iraq."

Iraq's Interior Ministry reported that Abu Jaafar al-Liby, who it described as either the second or third most important figure in al-Qaida in Iraq, was killed by police earlier this week.

Four other insurgents were killed and two were arrested in the raid, a ministry spokesman, Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, told The Associated Press.

Al-Liby was in charge of the Baghdad sector of al-Qaida in Iraq, Khalaf said. He said two letters were found on his body — one addressed to Osama bin Laden and the other to Abu Ayyoub al-Masri, who is thought to be al-Qaida in Iraq's leader. Both letters pledged loyalty and promised more attacks, Khalaf said.

Caldwell said U.S. military forces also had captured a senior al-Qaida figure and personal associate of the group's new leader. He was arrested along with 70 others Tuesday in a series of 12 raids, the U.S. spokesman said.

The man, who was not identified, led assassination, kidnapping and bomb-making cells in Baghdad, and played a key role in al-Qaida's activities in Fallujah before it was attacked by U.S. troops in November 2004, Caldwell said.

Another U.S. officer, Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, said the man was adept at making car bombs and roadside bombs and liked to set off explosives himself. "This terrorist's capture is a significant blow to al-Qaida, and another step toward defeating terrorism in Iraq," Johnson said.

On the federalism issue, members of the major Shiite political coalition, the United Iraqi Alliance, said they had made some headway in persuading leaders of other parties to support the proposed legislation, which could be introduced next week.

Alliance leaders sent delegations to the Shiite holy city of Najaf to meet with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and Grand Ayatollah Mohammed al-Yaqoubi, spiritual leader of the Fadhila party.

Iraq Violence Continues (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

Five American soldiers and 22 bodies found in Baghdad are among 41 deaths reported. A U.S. general acknowledges a rise in killings in the city.

BAGHDAD — Death squads continued to sweep through the Iraqi capital, leaving behind a grisly trail of at least 22 bodies Thursday, some of them handcuffed and decapitated. At least 19 people were killed or found dead in other violence throughout the country, including five U.S. soldiers whose deaths were reported Thursday.

A U.S. military spokesman acknowledged that despite a major operation to combat death squads and curb sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Arab paramilitary fighters in Baghdad, violence had increased.

"There was a spike in violence that did occur in the city over the last 24 hours," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV told reporters. "And a large portion of those … are from murder, execution-style-type activity."

The grim toll came one day after the discovery of 60 bodies in Baghdad's streets and dozens of other slayings in and around the capital.

Caldwell, however, said that areas such as the troubled Dora district in south Baghdad had seen major improvements in security. "If you go down to the Dora area … where they've focused the operations and continue to operate today, you can walk very freely through that area," he said.

But nearly half of the corpses found in Baghdad on Thursday had been dumped on Dora's outskirts. All of those victims wore handcuffs and had torture marks and bullet holes where they had been shot at close range, Iraqi police Capt. Mohammed Hanoon said.

DOJ_NMG_0063311

In other violence, a suicide bomber detonated an explosives-laden truck near an electrical substation on Baghdad's western outskirts, killing two U.S. soldiers. The concussion and shrapnel from the blast injured 25 other soldiers even though the explosion occurred outside thick concrete blast walls, U.S. Army spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said.

It wasn't immediately clear why the soldiers were at the substation, or whether the bombing had any effect on the power supply in Baghdad.

The military reported that two other soldiers had died in the capital on Thursday; one was shot to death in southeast Baghdad and another was killed by a roadside bomb.

And a U.S. soldier in the northern city of Mosul was shot Wednesday and died after being taken to a military hospital, a military statement said.

Also Thursday, a car bomb in southeast Baghdad killed nine people, including two Iraqi policemen, and injured 29 other people. Interior Ministry officials also reported that two worshipers were killed when gunmen attacked a mosque with AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenades.

In the northern city of Tall Afar, about 40 miles west of Mosul, a man detonated an explosives vest near a checkpoint, killing one man and injuring three other people.

In the northern oil hub of Kirkuk, gunmen killed a tribal sheik and local councilman named Abdullah Khalaf Azzawi and his son as they were driving home.

The U.S. military also announced a flurry of anti-guerrilla activity in the western province of Al Anbar, a haven for foreign insurgent fighters. Caldwell said U.S. and Iraqi forces had killed 66 suspected insurgents and arrested 830 others this month.

Witnesses said U.S. Marines raided a funeral 20 miles west of Ramadi, where Sunni Arab-led insurgents and U.S. troops have battled for months. After the burial ceremony, U.S. forces arrested at least 60 men at the gathering.

Caldwell also announced that U.S. and Iraqi troops had conducted 25 raids in and around Baghdad, capturing 70 suspected insurgents, including an associate of Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Ayyub Masri.

Caldwell did not release the name of the detainee.

solomon.moore@latimes.com

A General's Candor On Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus led the 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 invasion of Iraq and the first year of the occupation. Then, for 15 months, he took charge of training and equipping Iraqi security forces, and he returned to the United States last year. Army insiders have said they believe he may return to Iraq next year, perhaps as the replacement for the senior general there, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. Yesterday Petraeus had this to say about sectarian tensions in Iraq, in response to questions at the Brookings Institution:

The February bombing of the gold-domed mosque in Samarra was "hugely harmful" and a "very, very devastating blow" to security efforts, he said. "It took the gloves off the . . . Shia militia," starting "a downward spiral that is very hard to arrest. . . . It's had a horrific effect on the security situation," he said, evidenced by the violence in Baghdad that is "played out sadly day after day."

One of the most serious effects of the upswing in sectarian fighting is that it is "tearing at the efforts to restore the rule of law," he said, adding that it is vital to ensure that Iraqi army units are not "infected" by sectarianism.

Iraq Official Says Syrian Help Needed (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

The Associated Press, September 15, 2006

Iraq will spend more on jobs and reconstruction to battle the insurgency in the restive west, but neighboring Syria must clamp down on terrorists crossing the border, Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh said Thursday.

Saleh met with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and told a Pentagon news conference he did not request more American troops for Anbar province because that would be a military decision.

DOJ_NMG_0063312

A senior American commander in Iraq, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said this week the military can't defeat insurgents in Anbar with current troops levels — and that political and reconstruction progress is needed to win over people in the region.

Saleh said it is important to "get our Syrian neighbors to behave more responsibly ... and to clamp down on the presence and activity of some of the former regime leaders who are presently in Syria, as well as some of the terrorists that are going across the borders."

The U.S. and Iraqi governments have long accused Syria of not doing enough to stop insurgents crossing into Iraq to fight U.S. troops. Syria denies that, saying it is impossible to fully control the long desert border.

For his government's part, Saleh said, officials are working to build up Iraqi security forces and are working with tribal chiefs in Anbar to make the "environment ... less permissible for these terrorists and extremists to act."

"And we need to move in fast with economic reconstruction," said Saleh, who was meeting later Thursday with Vice President Dick Cheney.

"I personally met with the governor of Anbar 10 days ago or so. And we have agreed to release a lot of funds," he said. "We need to do a lot more to make sure that people will see benefit with security, as well. It's not just a matter of security operations. People need to see reconstruction and they need jobs being made and so on."

Saleh laid out a timetable for legislation over the next six months that he said also will move Iraq forward, saying for instance that by the end the year it will pass a law that will distribute oil wealth to all sectors of Iraqi society.

Kurds in the north and some Shiite Muslims in southern Iraq — Iraq's two chief oil regions — want regional control over oil production and revenues. But Iraq's Sunni Muslims and much of the Baghdad government want to maintain national control over Iraq's petroleum resources.

Other legislation will focus on investment law, disarming and demobilizing private militias blamed for much of the violence in Iraq and reforming the de-Baathification commission. That body worked on purging members of Saddam Hussein's ousted Baath Party from the military and government, a move some believe helps fuel the insurgency.

In A Volatile Region Of Iraq, U.S. Military Takes Two Paths (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

AL-FURAT, Iraq -- With a biker's bandanna tied under his helmet, the Special Forces team sergeant gunned a Humvee down a desert road in Iraq's volatile Anbar province. Skirting the restive town of Hit, the team of a dozen soldiers crossed the Euphrates River into an oasis of relative calm: the rural heartland of the powerful Albu Nimr tribe.

Green Berets skilled in working closely with indigenous forces have enlisted one of the largest and most influential tribes in Iraq to launch a regional police force -- a rarity in this Sunni insurgent stronghold. Working deals and favors over endless cups of spiced tea, they built up their wasta -- or pull -- with the ancient tribe, which boasts more than 300,000 members. They then began empowering the tribe to safeguard its territory and help interdict desert routes for insurgents and weapons. The goal, they say, is to spread security outward to envelop urban trouble spots such as Hit.

But the initial progress has been tempered by friction between the team of elite troops and the U.S. Army's battalion that oversees the region. At one point this year, the battalion's commander, uncomfortable with his lack of control over a team he saw as dangerously undisciplined, sought to expel it from his turf, officers on both sides acknowledged.

The conflict in the Anbar camp, while extreme, is not an isolated phenomenon in Iraq, U.S. officers say. It highlights two clashing approaches to the war: the heavy focus of many regular U.S. military units on sweeping combat operations; and the more fine-grained, patient work Special Forces teams put into building rapport with local leaders, security forces and the people -- work that experts consider vital in a counterinsurgency.

"This war was fought with a conventional mind-set. The conventional units are bogged down in cities doing the same old thing," said the Special Forces team's 44-year-old sergeant, who like all the Green Berets interviewed was not allowed to be quoted by name for security reasons. "It's not about bulldozing Hit, driving through with a tank, with all the kids running away. . . . These insurgencies are defeated by personal relationships."

DOJ_NMG_0063313

The real battles, he said, are unfolding "in a sheik's house, squatting in the desert eating with my right hand and smoking Turkish cigarettes and trying to influence tribes to rise up against an insurgency."Cutting Deals

Under the glittering chandeliers of his newly remodeled salon, Sheik Jubair adjusted his fine, white cotton dishdasha , or traditional robe, and lit a cigarette.

As if on cue, the American team sergeant leaned over and handed him an ashtray.

The 63-year-old sheik is the de facto ruler of the Albu Nimr, a wealthy tribe whose influence stretches from Anbar's violent capital of Ramadi up the Euphrates to Haditha. Jubair knows the U.S. military needs his tribe as much as it needs the military. Shunned in the 1990s for plotting against Saddam Hussein, the tribe backed the U.S.-led overthrow of Hussein in 2003. But Jubair now faces threats from Anbar's entrenched Sunni Arab insurgency, which he said put a $5 million bounty on his head.

Week after week, the team has spent long hours cultivating Jubair -- funding his projects, buying his son a PlayStation, even holding his hand during treatment at a U.S. military hospital for an infected toe. In return, Jubair has supplied hundreds of police and army recruits, as well as intelligence targeting insurgents in the region.

During a recent visit at his home in al-Furat, Jubair pressed the team sergeant for a hospital, a gas station, a school, payment for a damaged car and a mosque. "We don't do mosques," the sergeant replied.

One minute the tough and temperamental Jubair was unbuttoning his shirt to show off a wound acquired in the Iran-Iraq war. The next, he was pouting because the American team dared visit his nephew and rival, Sheik Hatem, a.k.a. the "boy king," who officially heads the tribe and lives in the same compound.

"He's young and doesn't know anything," Jubair scolded the team sergeant. "If you give him projects, I will close the city council and come here!"

For the Americans, such engagement is as vital as it can be maddening. "Sometimes I feel like I'm dealing with teenagers," the sergeant said. "They even do the 'mom' and 'dad' thing with me" and the team captain.

It's also work that involves keen judgment and knowing when to cut deals. After the team arrived in January, it captured a former police colonel accused of stealing cars and $60,000 in pay and killing another police officer. But when the colonel was detained and sent to Abu Ghraib prison, sheiks Jubair and Hatem pleaded for his release. "They said you will increase your wasta and all that," the team sergeant said, "so we secured his release, a controlled release."

The compromise helped win the tribe's backing for a local police force. But it also heightened frictions with the U.S. Army battalion, whose convoy transporting the detainee had hit a roadside bomb.A Clash of Cultures

Every night like clockwork at the U.S. military camp -- known as a forward operating base, or FOB -- outside Hit, a loudspeaker atop the Special Forces team house blasts an alert that the Army battalion is about to shoot off flares.

"Attention on the FOB! Attention on the FOB!" a male voice boomed one recent night. "There will be an illumination mission in 10 minutes. Go Cowboys!"

"I've tried to figure out a way to cut that wire," the team sergeant muttered as he stood on the roof, bemoaning the battalion's predictable tactics.

The clash of military cultures was apparent from the start in late January, when the Special Forces team captain, scruffy after days in the desert, arrived at the Hit camp and introduced his team's mission to Lt. Col. Thomas Graves, commander of the 1st Battalion, 36th Infantry Regiment. Graves, a close-shaven West Point graduate from Texas, said nothing and walked away, according to team members.

"We grow our hair a little longer," the team sergeant said. "We wear mustaches, and the conventional Army doesn't want to deal with you because they look at you as undisciplined. We're the most disciplined force in the Army!"

To Graves, the problem boiled down to communication and his battalion's limited, or "tactical," control over the Special Forces. "It's not that they have long hair. I don't care if they're frickin' from Mars," said Graves in the camp's chow hall. "They have a responsibility to tell us what they were doing, but they refuse to do it."

Graves said the Green Berets and their Iraqi army scout platoon once shot at his tanks; he said he never investigated the incident but declined to explain why. Concern over his troops' safety led him to initiate steps to remove the team, he said, adding, "I don't care if you're frickin' naked, just don't shoot at my tanks!"Training Iraqi Forces

DOJ_NMG_0063314

At a desert firing range outside Hit, a squad of Iraqi army scouts attacked a line of silhouetted targets, emptying their AK-47 assault rifles and then switching effortlessly to pistols. Next, they practiced sweeping a room, pivoting through the doorway and shouting bursts of Arabic.

Training foreign military forces is a core Special Forces mission -- and the top priority of the U.S. command in Iraq. The Iraqi scout platoon, recruited from the Albu Nimr tribe and coached by the team in Hit, displayed an agility and confidence unusual among Iraqi soldiers. And the Americans fostered loyalty in the platoon.

"We've been to their homes, we've treated their children. They are our partners," said the team captain, an energetic officer from Los Angeles.

"We walk with them as brothers," said Mokles Ali Muklif, the Iraqi platoon leader.

But last spring, when the scouts spotted a roadside bomb during a solo mission and warned U.S. forces about it, they were detained by Graves's battalion, blindfolded and forced to sit in bitter cold for seven hours before the team could secure their release. "I was livid," the team sergeant said.

Later, when the Special Forces team offered to give advanced training to the entire Iraqi army battalion, Graves rejected the idea. Morale continued to drop in the Iraqi battalion, its manpower down to 60 percent after hundreds of soldiers quit over lack of pay, poor food and duty far from home. "We could have had the battalion conducting unilateral ops, and 1-36 could be sitting back at the firm base," the team captain said.

Instead, the team threw all its energy into mobilizing the Albu Nimr tribe behind a police force -- first in its territory of al-Furat, then in the broader region including the contested town of Hit.A Recruiting Drive

Col. Falah Salah Shimra, 41, a portly tribesman with an imposing demeanor, examined the charred shell of a police station destroyed by a bomb planted on the roof.

Chief of al-Furat's growing tribal police contingent of several hundred men, Shimra minimized the attack on his fledgling force. "Basically, within our area we have no threat at all," he said. "The threat is from outside."

Nearby, tribal police manned a checkpoint, wearing blue shirts as uniforms. None had body armor. Most used their own rifles and ammunition and patrolled in their own vehicles. Many had gone for months without wages until the Special Forces team helped cut through red tape and graft to secure their full pay in July.

Once they get more equipment, Shimra said, he plans "to extend our security all around Hit and get rid of the insurgents."

Indeed in July, backing from tribal leaders led to Hit's first successful police recruiting drive.

"We knew there would be no people in Hit, so to facilitate success we put out word in al-Furat," the team sergeant said.

But a dispute emerged when Graves decided to "lock down" Hit with tanks and hold the recruiting drive at a frequently mortared U.S. combat outpost inside the town rather than in a safer tribal area across the Euphrates. "It's the most dialed-in place!" said the team sergeant, whose men narrowly missed being struck by a mortar shell during the drive.

In the end, only three Hit residents volunteered. But about 150 tribesmen crossed the river to sign up. Graves said he considered the police recruitment to be one of the U.S. military's biggest achievements in his area, and he acknowledged the Special Forces team's help in enlisting the tribesmen. "They deserve credit for that," he said of the team, whose tour ended last month.

The Special Forces soldiers realize there are drawbacks to relying on the tribe, which is focused on protecting its own territory and interests and which imposes tribal law that can undercut civil authority. Every decision, from firing a policeman to averting revenge killings, requires the sanction of tribal leaders such as Jubair. But the reality in Anbar, the team captain said, is either to "engage the tribes . . . or leave them to the will of the insurgency."

Iraqis Feel Weight Of High Prices, Few Jobs (CSM)

By Dan Murphy And Awadh al-taiee

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

CAIRO AND BAGHDAD

DOJ_NMG_0063315

When the top Marine commander in Iraq addressed criticism that US forces appeared to be losing the political, if not the military, fight in Anbar Province recently, he said that success rests as much on restoring a measure of economic stability and basic services as it does on ending Iraq's sectarian bloodshed.

"Economic development and the establishment of social order and public services ... are the conditions which must be set that will result in the support of the local people, and ultimately cause the defeat of this terrorist-backed insurgency," Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said earlier this week.

But Iraq's economy is weaker than at any point since the US invasion. Some estimate joblessness at 60 percent (the CIA shows a 30 percent rate for 2005), and prices for foodstuffs and basic goods have doubled - and in some cases tripled - since 2003.

Earlier this month, Iraq's planning minister, Ali Baban, said the rise in the consumer price index (CPI) - the basket of goods and services used to measure inflation - increased by nearly 70 percent in July compared with 12 months earlier. In July 2005, the CPI rose by 30 percent.

While the daily death toll frightens Iraqis - it topped 100 in the past two days alone - the country's economic grind is eroding the standards of living of millions of Iraqis and leading to mounting frustration in a country where the average monthly wage is less than $200.

Take Ahmed Obeidi, who saw an improvement in his life immediately following the war but now says he goes to sleep at night terrified about his family's prospects. Until 2003, he was a mason whose tiny daily wage - about $2 - nevertheless was enough to keep his wife and three children clothed and fed.

After the war, he picked up construction work on US-funded projects. Prices rose that first year, but his daily wages had soared to $10, allowing him to save small amounts for the first time in his life. But as security in Baghdad collapsed starting in early 2004, opportunities to work dried up.

Soaring prices reflected the lack of security. Oil smugglers took advantage of rising corruption and distracted security services, and the cost of hauling goods rose to reflect the risks of ambush. Significant US reconstruction spending was deflected to security: Of more than $12 billion spent through the middle of this year, at least $4 billion went to security.

That doesn't take into account informal security arrangements. Long-haul truckers in Baghdad, food wholesalers, and even local retail shops say small weekly protection payments to corrupt cops and militias have become standard.

Now, Mr. Obeidi is happy to find five days of work a month. "I don't know what we'll do if the five days ... run out," he says. "The only jobs are [with] the police or the Army, but I can't join because of my age. I don't have a degree, so a government job isn't an option. I feel like my whole life is collapsing gradually with the country."

Yet, as Baghdad residents, the Obeidis are fortunate. While the price of bread has almost tripled, the price of meat has doubled, and prices for gas and electricity increased nearly four-fold, those in major cities are eating better than their rural counterparts.

A report sponsored by the UN's World Food Program late last year found that nationwide, 1 in 4 Iraqi children under age 5 suffered from either "acute or chronic malnutrition." The number was 1 in 3 in rural areas in the south.

Iraq's economic problems pose a great conundrum for policymakers. Usually when wages are flat and unemployment high, prices are stable, because consumption also stays flat. In developed economies like the US, inflation walks hand-in-hand with economic growth and job creation. But in Iraq, violence is driving the price increases, destroying jobs and testing a social net that was already weak before the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime. Economic despair, in turn, generates new recruits for the sectarian militias most responsible for the economic decline.

Falah Hassan works in a small grocery store in western Baghdad for about 7,000 dinars, or $5, a day. He says he asked his boss for higher wages to compensate for higher prices, but understood why he said no. "Our customers are dwindling, and they buy less when they do come in."

Trained as a butcher, he says he was recently offered $10 a day to work in a meat market near Baghdad's Adhamiyah neighborhood, a stronghold for Sunni Arab insurgents, but says the dangers of traveling the four miles to his new place of work outweighed any potential benefit.

DOJ_NMG_0063316

"I'd love the money, but what are the chances I'll get killed if I travel those roads to work? Then my family would have nothing," he says. "If this continues, soon we'll be like ants, eating what we can find by the side of the road."

Like many Baghdadis, he blames the economic situation on the government's security failures. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki came to office this year promising to flood Baghdad's streets with Iraqi and local troops, and restore safety. But July was the second-deadliest month on record - belying US and Iraqi government claims that their efforts were making progress.

"We're a country rich with oil and yet we have children who are starving," says Mr. Hassan. "I don't know of a better measure of a government's failure than when it's people don't get enough to eat."

Judge Tells Hussein, 'You Are Not A Dictator' (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 — The chief judge in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein assured the defendant on Thursday that he was "not a dictator," a day after a court prosecutor demanded the judge be removed for showing bias toward Mr. Hussein and letting him harangue witnesses.

One witness, a Kurdish farmer, testified that in 1988 he had pleaded with Mr. Hussein for the life of his wife and seven young children. He said a furious Mr. Hussein shouted, "Shut up and get out."

In court, Mr. Hussein jumped up to defend himself.

"Why did he try to see Saddam Hussein?" he asked the judge, referring to himself in the third person, as is his habit in court. "Wasn't Saddam a dictator and an enemy to the Kurdish people, as they say?"

The judge replied: "I will answer you: you are not a dictator. Not a dictator," he repeated. "You were not a dictator."

Mr. Hussein, smiling, replied, "Thank you."

The judge said: "The people or those who are around the official make him a dictator, and it is not just you. This is the case all over the world." The judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, is a Shiite who had served as a judge in Mr. Hussein's government.

Mr. Hussein and six other former high-ranking officials are charged in connection with the killing of at least 50,000 Kurds, including many in chemical weapon strikes in a 1988 military campaign to eliminate them from the mountainous parts of Iraq's far northeast.

The courtroom exchange happened on a day in which 49 bodies were found, apparently killed, around Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said.

Five American soldiers also died in fighting on the outskirts of Baghdad and in northern Iraq, the military said.

Also Thursday, an Iraqi deputy prime minister, Barham Salih, said officials here would introduce legislation in Parliament next month to disarm Shiite militias that have stoked an ongoing cycle of sectarian violence in Baghdad and throughout Iraq.

Mr. Salih, speaking to reporters in Washington, cast the legislation as an advanced step in a process that is already under way to urge militia leaders, foremost among them Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric who controls the Mahdi Army, to give up their weapons.

"There are discussions with Moktada Sadr and other political leaders in the country that they all have to make a choice," Mr. Salih said. "Either they are part of the political process and renounce arms and integrate into the country's political system and governing institutions, or the present situation will not be acceptable."

Mr. Sadr's militia is estimated to include up to 20,000 fighters, drawn mostly from poor Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and larger cities in Iraq's south. A competing Shiite militia created and trained in Iran, the Badr Organization, has about 5,000 men, American officials have said.

On Thursday, though, American military units and Iraqi Army and police forces began "clearing operations" in the Shaab and Ur neighborhoods, two districts controlled by the Mahdi Army.

South of Baghdad, elements of Mr. Sadr's militia clashed Thursday with Iraqi troops and the police, injuring a number of police officers and civilians, police and army officers said.

In Diwaniya, about 150 miles south of Baghdad, a joint Iraqi and American patrol raided a Sadr office around 2 a.m., said Brig. Abdul Khaliq Badir Lafta, commander of the Diwaniya police.

DOJ_NMG_0063317

The raid ultimately led to a three-hour exchange of gunfire between militia forces and Iraqi police commandos, he said. At one point, armed Mahdi Army fighters tried to storm the governor's building and were repelled by police commandos, said Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanimi, commander of the Eighth Iraqi Army Division in Diwaniya.

'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein During Genocide Trial (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 -- The judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial told the toppled Iraqi leader on Thursday that he wasn't "a dictator," one day after prosecutors accused the judge of bias and demanded his resignation.

Judge Abdullah al-Amiri made the comment shortly after the court heard emotional testimony from a Kurdish farmer who said Hussein told him to "shut up and get out" when he begged the Iraqi president to spare the lives of his wife and seven young children, who were taken into custody in 1988.

Hussein challenged the farmer's testimony, asking, "Why did he try to see Saddam Hussein [if] Saddam Hussein was a dictator and was against the Kurdish people?" according to the Associated Press.

Amiri said from the bench: "You are not a dictator. You were not a dictator. However, the people or the individuals and officials surrounding you created a dictator. It was not you in particular. It happens all over the world."

"Thank you," Hussein replied.

On Wednesday, prosecutors called for Amiri's resignation, saying he had allowed "defendants to go too far, with unacceptable expressions and words" and had "allowed the defendants to treat the chamber as a political forum," according to a pool report.

In a news conference Thursday, Iraqi High Tribunal spokesman Raed Juhi sought to control any damage that the judge's comments might have inflicted on the tribunal's ability to impartially try Hussein.

"The court will continue with its neutrality and its course. The judge is only human," Juhi said. "At the end, the judge will decide guilty or not guilty based on the evidence. This has no effect on the case."

Hussein, Ali Hassan al-Majeed, also known here as "Chemical Ali," and other co-defendants are facing charges of perpetrating atrocities against Kurdish villagers in northeastern Iraq during the so-called Anfal campaign in 1987 and 1988. They stand accused of killing 50,000 to 100,000 Kurds, many of them with poison gas.

Meanwhile, in the southern town of Diwaniyah, U.S. and Iraqi troops stormed the office of radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in a pre-dawn raid. Sahib al-Amiri, a Sadr aide, said the soldiers took computers from the office and some weapons from office guards but did not take anyone into custody. A U.S. military spokesman confirmed that the raid occurred but did not provide details.

Later Thursday morning, Sadr loyalists headed to the governor's office in Diwaniyah to protest the raid, but guards shot at the people and into the air to drive them away, Amiri said. Several protesters, he said, were wounded.

Elsewhere, a car bomb exploded Thursday morning near a Shiite mosque in northwest Baghdad's Hurriyah neighborhood, killing three people and wounding 15 and causing damage to the mosque, according to Col. Abdulrahman Awaiyed of the Interior Ministry.

A second car bomb detonated near the passport office in central Baghdad, killing three guards and wounding 17 civilians, he added.

Officials in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, announced plans to start a security operation modeled after the one being carried out in some of Baghdad's most volatile neighborhoods to tame sectarian violence. The campaign in Basra, where British forces have responsibility for security, is expected to pull British troops from across the theater and send them from neighborhood to neighborhood. Basra is plagued by rising crime and power struggles between Shiite political parties backed by militias.

British and U.S. officials said the effort will also concentrate on reforming police stations in targeted neighborhoods by weeding out police who are loyal to Shiite militias or involved in crime. "We have to dare to say an institution is corrupted," said Abdal al-Jhabar, a deputy interior minister for southern Iraq. "We have to clean this up."

'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein At Trial (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0063318

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

The comment is likely to renew the prosecution's call that the jurist step down from the case.

BAGHDAD — The chief judge in Saddam Hussein's trial for genocide against Iraq's Kurdish population said in court Thursday that the deposed Iraqi president had not been a dictator.

The comment seemed sure to raise anew prosecution objections about the judge, Abdullah Amiri, a veteran Iraqi jurist who has drawn praise in court from Hussein this week.

On Wednesday, the chief prosecutor, Munqith Faroon, asked that the judge step down because, Faroon said, he had allowed Hussein to turn the proceeding into a political forum.

The exchange Thursday came during the testimony of a Kurdish villager, Abdullah Mohammed Hussein, 49, the latest in a series of witnesses to describe Iraqi military abuses during the Anfal military campaign in the late 1980s.

The campaign left as many as 100,000 Kurds dead and is the origin of the charges against Hussein and six codefendants.

As he faced Hussein in court, Mohammed Hussein said he had once met with the former Iraqi president when he made his way to Baghdad to ask about the fate of his missing wife and children.

Mohammed Hussein's unusual testimony prompted Hussein to question how it was possible that a supposed "dictator" like himself would have agreed to an audience with a humble Kurd like Mohammed Hussein.

"You were not a dictator," said the judge, who also served as a jurist during Hussein's rule.

Hussein went silent for a moment, as if he himself could not believe what he had heard, prompting the judge to repeat, "You weren't a dictator."

The judge did not make clear exactly what he meant, and he and Hussein soon moved on to other topics.

The Kurd said the Iraqi army offensive had caused him to lose track of his wife, Aysha, and seven of his children, the youngest being a baby girl, Shleer, just over 3 months old. He said Iraqi forces who invaded his village, Sedir, took all eight into custody.

"I did not know what had happened to my wife and children," said Mohammed Hussein, who testified that he escaped into Iran with son Ali, 9.

Six months later, after an amnesty was issued for Kurds, Mohammed Hussein said, he returned to Iraq and enlisted in the army. But he said doubt haunted him about the fate of his family, and he seized upon the idea of going to Baghdad to see Hussein.

Once in the capital, Mohammed Hussein said, he made his way to the presidential office and asked for an interview with Hussein, who would occasionally see ordinary petitioners in an effort to project a magnanimous image.

The Kurd said he was told to write a formal request and, three days later, was ushered into an office to meet with Hussein.

"I prayed to Allah to put mercy in Saddam's heart, so that he would release my loved ones," Mohammed Hussein testified.

However, Mohammed Hussein said, Hussein became agitated once he told him that his family had been detained during the offensive in Kurdistan.

" 'They were just lost within the Anfal wave!' " Mohammed Hussein quoted Hussein as telling him.

Mohammed Hussein said he pressed the president on the point.

" 'Do not talk!' " the witness said Hussein then told him. " 'Get out of here!' "

Mohammed Hussein said he saluted the Iraqi leader and left, but had a feeling Hussein would release his relatives. It never happened.

Several years later, Mohammed Hussein said, he was informed that Kurdish authorities had discovered three identity cards while excavating a mass grave. Among them, he said, were the documents of his wife and sons Nasir and Jamal.

Hussein seemed suspicious of the Kurd's account and asked if the witness had kept a copy of the interview request submitted to the office of the presidency.

Mohammed Hussein said no: "Saddam took it from me."

patrick.mcdonnell@latimes.com

Times staff writer Suhail Ahmed contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0063319

The Right Troops In The Right Places (NYT)

By Seth Moulton

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

APPROACHING the city of Karbala last year for a meeting with a local Iraqi Army commander, my convoy of four Army Humvees came across hundreds of bearded men in green camouflage uniforms lining the road. They were directing traffic and searching vehicles for bombs — good things — and they waved us through, just as Iraqi security forces should.

But we don't issue green uniforms to Iraqi troops.

After the meeting, I sent an e-mail message to my headquarters in Baghdad, asking whether an entire Iraqi battalion, usually 700 to 1,000 soldiers, had been newly authorized for this relatively peaceful province.

Of course, it hadn't. This was another new militia. And even though the militia had already been approved by Iraqi officials, and recruited, outfitted and deployed in daily operations, no senior American commander in Baghdad knew about it.

Still, it wasn't hard to explain how this could happen in Karbala, a major city just two hours from Baghdad. There were hardly any Americans there.

The last American base in Karbala was closed in the summer of 2005. Ostensibly our departure was a victory — an area turned over to Iraqi control. The American troops weren't sent home, though; they were simply shifted north to a town near Falluja, where they were needed more.

For most of 2005, I worked for the American commander in charge of training Iraqi security forces. My job was to keep tabs on Iraqi troops in several provinces south of Baghdad that were mostly Iraqi-controlled. As a young Marine lieutenant, I was honored to have the responsibility, but it was a sign of how thinly our forces are stretched. My team of two marines could have used about 50 more.

Time and again I watched as American forces drew down, and militias blossomed in the resulting power vacuum. The first provinces we are handing over to our Iraqi counterparts are in the heart of the Shiite south, an area where anti-American violence is minimal but ethnic hatred is brewing.

Sunni insurgents started attacking Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of all Iraqis, to destabilize the new Iraqi government. The Shiites' ethnic-based response, however, carried out by their militias, is what ignited the deeply sectarian violence that now threatens outright civil war. The premature departure of American troops from the places where the militias were born only feeds their growth. A good Iraqi friend from the area told me recently that Iraqis now call this time "the militia era."

In the long term, we must withdraw American troops, and replacing them with capable Iraqi forces is the right way to do it. But there are two serious problems with how we are putting this strategy into effect.

First, despite all rhetoric in Washington to the contrary, American commanders are being pressured to meet timelines rather than encouraged to wait until Iraqi forces are ready. "Standing up" Iraqi troops is not enough; they must be well-trained.

Second, our strategy is based on consolidating American forces in huge megabases as a means to reduce numbers and, as advocated by several members of Congress, to "move to the periphery." This is exactly the opposite of what has been prescribed for decades to fight a counterinsurgency, or to squelch a fomenting civil war.

American military advisers, and the Green Berets they take after, are our greatest assets in Iraq because they are a model for how to fight insurgents and build indigenous forces. Our advisers teach the Iraqi troops everything from physical fitness to urban warfare tactics, and mentor their officers in leadership and mission planning.

I once visited an Iraqi base where a combination of officer corruption and insurgent activity had led to a severe water shortage. An entire battalion was ready to quit, but the Green Berets embedded with the Iraqis encouraged them to stay while they pressed for a solution — and endured the shortage alongside the Iraqi soldiers. The battalion remained intact, and we discovered new problems with the Iraqi supply system and new tactics of local insurgents.

Our advisers can also thwart militia attempts to infiltrate the Iraqi units, and are better able to judge when the Iraqis are competent to take over. Most important, while sharing intelligence and conducting joint operations, these small groups of American soldiers and marines develop the trust of their Iraqi soldiers and the local populace. Our growing megabases do anything but.

DOJ_NMG_0063320

So, what should we do? The obvious prescription to stop the rising violence is more troops, but the wrong kinds of soldiers and tactics only alienate the Iraqi people, strengthening the insurgency. On top of that, the Army and Marine Corps don't have any extra troops to send. President Bush recently sent more American forces back into Baghdad, another place where militias took over after United States troops were withdrawn too quickly. But they too have to come from somewhere, and in turn we should expect those areas to become more violent.

This makes it all the more important to use the troops we have as effectively as possible.

We need more military advisers, including both Special Forces teams and specially trained conventional units. Our precious few Special Forces troops must focus on mentoring Iraqi troops, rather than on the more exciting diversion of unilateral raids. Some of our best Special Forces units were devoted to hunting down the Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, but violence has only increased in the three months since his death. Had that same manpower and money been devoted to training Iraqi troops and stemming the growth of militias, we would have another Iraqi battalion or two ready to take our places.

While consolidating bases is a short-term way to reduce troop requirements, fielding more adviser teams will eventually allow more Americans to come home. American troops embedded with the Iraqis they train usually require less support than conventional units; many rely on the Iraqis for food, shelter and basic defenses. Green Berets in 12-man teams have already replaced entire battalions of conventional forces in some Iraqi cities.

Yet despite the success of advisers, the Army and Marine Corps still have a habit of sending their least capable troops to fill these positions. Many teams have trouble getting essential supplies like weapons and ammunition, even as the Army finds the resources to man speed traps on its ever-growing bases. Only 1 in 30 Americans deployed to Iraq serves as an embedded adviser. We can't win this war from the Burger Kings and rec centers of our largest bases, nor can we afford the thousands of non-combat troops needed to support them.

Iraq's militia problems are likely to get worse before they get better, and only a legitimate Iraqi government can rid the country of them completely. But we must be sure we are fighting the war we say we are. Both problems with our current strategy — not waiting for Iraqi forces to be ready, and consolidating our bases at the expense of classic counterinsurgency tactics like small adviser teams — emanate from the overriding concern for bringing the troops home.

Pushing for withdrawal timelines is not helping the struggle in Iraq; encouraging the military to better fight the insurgency will. After all, winning the war would be the best reason to leave.

Seth Moulton was a Marine infantry officer in Iraq from March toSeptember 2003 and from July 2004 toOctober 2005. He is writing a book about his service.

World Bank Lists Failing Nations That Can Breed Global Terrorism (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The number of weak and poorly governed nations that can provide a breeding ground for global terrorism has grown sharply over the past three years, despite increased Western efforts to improve conditions in such states, according to a new World Bank report.

"Fragile" countries, whose deepening poverty puts them at risk from terrorism, armed conflict and epidemic disease, have jumped to 26 from 17 since the report was last issued in 2003. Five states graduated off the list, but 14 made new appearances, including Nigeria and seven other African countries, Kosovo, Cambodia, East Timor, and the West Bank and Gaza. Twelve states, including Afghanistan, Somalia and Sudan, made both lists.

"Past international engagement with these countries has failed to yield significant improvements," said the assessment released by the World Bank's Independent Evaluation Group, which reports on the bank's programs to the board of directors. It was timed to coincide with the annual meeting of the bank and the International Monetary Fund this month in Singapore.

Hurdles facing the countries at risk, often referred to as "failed" or "failing" states, include "weak security, fractured societal relations, corruption, breakdown in the rule of law, lack of mechanisms for generating legitimate power and authority" and limited investment resources to meet basic needs, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0063321

To avoid "adverse spillover effects -- such as conflict, terrorism and epidemic diseases -- the international community and the Bank need to find more effective ways" of assisting them, it said.

The Bush administration has described failing states as a major threat to U.S. security. "The danger they pose is now unparalleled," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice wrote in a column that appeared late last year in The Washington Post. "Absent responsible state authority, threats that would and should be contained within a country's borders can now melt into the world and wreak untold havoc.

"Weak and failing states," Rice said, "serve as global pathways that facilitate the spread of pandemics, the movement of criminals and terrorists, and the proliferation of the world's most dangerous weapons."

The administration's updated counterterrorism strategy, published earlier this month, set economic development in "failing states or states emerging from conflict" as a key objective.

Official U.S. foreign assistance to the least developed countries topped $27 billion in 2005, according to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, more than twice the level when Bush took office. That amount places the United States first among international donor nations in terms of absolute dollars, although Washington remains at the bottom when aid is tallied as a percentage of gross national product. The United States also scores higher than many other countries in the percentage of its aid that is spent on security, trade and food supplies rather than on more traditional forms of development efforts.

In a major restructuring, the administration is increasingly directing assistance toward those countries whose governments are judged as heading in a positive direction in terms of institutional and economic development and U.S. security interests.

In 2002, the World Bank launched its own initiative to expand assistance to fragile states and increased its lending to them by 67 percent, to $4.1 billion, between 2003 and 2005. Its report cited a number of lessons learned in the process.

In several countries, there was either too much aid or too little. Assistance from all international donors, the report said, varied from nearly $200 per capita for East Timor to $15 per capita for the Central African Republic. In a number of cases, an influx of aid was not matched by a domestic reform agenda that would allow the country to adequately utilize it.

In other countries, donors demanded too many reforms, too quickly. In Afghanistan, the report said, "donor reforms have not been selective enough and have led to 120 pieces of legislation."

Donors sometimes disagreed about the goals of overlapping aid programs, making it "difficult to achieve policy coherence" in recipient countries, the report said. "In Afghanistan, for example, the Ministry of Finance receives technical assistance for customs modernization from the Bank, USAID, the European Union" and Britain's development aid program.

Terrorism, Here And There (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

For five years, the Bush Administration has repeatedly made the case that the best reason to take the war on terror abroad is so that it need not be waged at home. And for five years, the claim has been ridiculed by those who argue that "the use of heavy military force to transform Muslim societies over there, if you would, is only likely to increase the number of suicide terrorists coming at us," as the University of Chicago's Robert Pape put it last year.

Reality is otherwise. In the current issue of Foreign Policy, Kim Cragin and Andrew Curiel of the Rand Corporation compare the incidence of terrorism world-wide in the four years preceding and following 9/11. Between 1998 and the end of 2001, there were 2,991 fatalities from terrorism in North America, almost all of them on 9/11. Since then, there have been only three.

By contrast, terrorist fatalities are up nearly everywhere else, more than tenfold in the Middle East. The authors of the study say this means that "the rest of the world is paying with their lives" for the U.S. war on terror. But that's an odd way of damning a policy that aims to keep America safe. Even stranger is the suggestion that the U.S. is to blame for al Qaeda's explicit policy of targeting fellow Muslims. Such targeting has long been part of Osama bin Laden's explicit strategy, and his deputy, Ayman al Zawahiri, recently made it clear again when he warned the Gulf States that terror was coming their way.

It's a tragic fact that so many Muslims have been murdered in terrorist atrocities. But it is also the case that Arab regimes such as Saudi Arabia that once tolerated or funded terrorism have belatedly come to recognize its dangers. That's progress for them -- and safety for Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0063322

DOJ:

Poetic Justice: DOJ Whistleblower On D.C. Ethics Committee (NLJ)

By Peter Geier, Staff reporter

National Law Journal, September 15, 2006

"Poetic justice" is what a former U.S. Department of Justice ethics attorney calls her appointment to the District of Columbia Bar's legal ethics committee while a disciplinary complaint has been pending against her with the D.C. bar.

And some poetic justice may go a long way for whistleblower Jesselyn A. Radack, who was the subject of a Justice Department complaint before the D.C. Bar's Office of Bar Counsel when she was named in June, 2005 to the committee that advises the bar on the rules of professional conduct.

Radack is the former Justice Department ethics advisor in the case of "American Taliban" John Walker Lindh who quit her government job, lost a private-sector position and was the subject of a criminal investigation, all involving the Lindh case. Saying that she leaked information to the press, the Justice Department referred Radack to the state bars where she is licensed-and was even put on the federal "no-fly" list.

"Because of this episode, I am dedicating my life to whistleblowers," said Radack, who started work last May at Grayson & Kubli, a private practice in McLean, Va., that handles government contracts, telecommunications and whistleblower law.

She also decided not to pursue the action she filed against DOJ that a federal judge in Washington recently dismissed. [NLJ, Aug. 28].

"I'm in a new job and ready to let go of it," Radack said. "It was empowering to put them on the defensive for once and finally get my version of the events down in a public forum."

Radack claims that she was pushed out of her job as general counsel to DOJ's Office of Professional Responsibility for not playing along with her superiors after federal law enforcement officials disregarded her advice on handling Lindh, dubbed the "American Taliban" when he was captured in Afghanistan.

U.S. District Judge Henry H. Kennedy Jr. recently found that DOJ did not violate its own policy when it sent referral letters to the Maryland and D.C. bars. Radack v. U.S. DOJ, No. 04-1881 (D.D.C.).

Actions 'really scary'

But Radack quoted a footnote in Kennedy's opinion in which he wrote: "It is clear, though, that she has sustained injury in the form of a damaged reputation and reduced employment prospects."

"The scope and breadth of what they are doing is really scary," she said, adding that the outcome of her lawsuit implies that the government "can go after you if it can show that something you did in the private sector that it didn't like relates back to something you did when you were working for them."

Charles S. Miller, spokesman for DOJ, said that the department would say with regard to Radack only that "We're pleased with the court's decision."

Radack lost her civilian job in the Washington office of New York's Hawkins Delafield & Wood after she gave a Newsweek reporter copies of legal memoranda that she had written on the Lindh matter once she suspected that they had disappeared from the file.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III, presiding over the Lindh case, ordered a three-week investigation into how Newsweek got material that had been filed with the court under seal.

Radack claims that the DOJ used Ellis' order as a pretext to get her fired from Hawkins Delafield, place her under criminal investigation, help Hawkins Delafield contest the unemployment compensation she sought, refer her to the state bars where she is licensed and put her on the "no-fly" list.

The "no fly list" identifies people suspected of posing "a risk of air piracy or terrorism or a threat to airline or passenger safety." It is maintained by the Transportation Security Administration, part of the Department of Homeland Security, which the Justice Department oversees.

But time-and Radack-have moved on. The criminal matter was closed without charges being brought, the Maryland bar complaint was dismissed and she is working again.

While her ethics committee appointment will have no bearing on the Office of Bar Counsel's handling of her case, she is nonetheless pleased for the vote of confidence.

"I have lived to fight another day, but it will be other people's fights," she said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Want Enron-linked Convictions Reinstated (AP)

By Kristen Hays

AP, September 15, 2006

Federal Enron prosecutors today asked the entire U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals to hear arguments about reinstating fraud and conspiracy convictions against four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives that a three-judge panel threw out in a split decision last month.

The 2-1 decision slapped the Justice Department by overturning most convictions against the four men, who were found guilty in 2004 of participating in a sham 1999 deal that allowed Enron to post bogus profits.

The three-judge panel ruled that evidence was insufficient to support convictions against one of the Merrill defendants. Regarding the other three, the opinion said prosecutors employed a flawed theory that they deprived Enron of its right to their honest services because, even though the deal was a sham, it was consistent with corporate goals and did not rob the company or shareholders of money or property.

The panel affirmed convictions of perjury and obstruction against one of the three who lied to a grand jury about the deal.

In today's filing, prosecutors said the reversal "threatens to insulate from punishment proven criminal conduct by corporate employees as long as their fraudulent goals are shared by senior executives, without regard to the obvious interest of a legitimate business entity and its stockholders in the honest services of all corporate employees."

Prosecutors said a rehearing before all 14 5th Circuit judges is warranted to correct the panel's "cramped and unworkable" interpretation of the honest services theory.

Thomas Hagemann, who represents Daniel Bayly, one of the three who was head of investment banking for Merrill, said he wasn't worried that a re-hearing before all 14 5th Circuit judges would make a difference.

"With all due respect to the Justice Department, we remain convinced of the justice and the correctness of the majority opinion's decision on honest services," Hagemann said.

Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University College of Law, said appellate courts, including the 5th Circuit, have examined the honest services issue before with differing opinions. That may prompt the entire 5th Circuit to take another look, she said.

"When courts have trouble deciding whether conduct is within or outside the 'honest services' language of the statute, then how can we expect lay people to know if what they are doing is criminal?" she said. "What really needs to happen here is for Congress to rewrite the law so that it is clear and people know what is legal and what will be considered criminal."

Bayly and James A. Brown, both of Darien, Conn.; Robert Furst, of Dallas; and William Fuhs, of Denver, were each convicted of conspiracy and fraud for helping push through a loan from the brokerage disguised as a purchase of three Enron-owned power plants on barges in Nigeria so the energy company could appear to have met quarterly earnings targets. Brown also was convicted of perjury and obstruction.

The four were sentenced in 2005 to prison terms ranging from 2.5 years to nearly four years.

Fuhs, Bayly and Furst were released from prison on appeal bonds earlier this year, but Brown was not.

A fifth defendant convicted of fraud and conspiracy for helping push through the deal, former mid-level Enron finance executive Dan Boyle, did not appeal and is in prison. A sixth defendant, former in-house Enron accountant Sheila Kahanek, was acquitted.

DOJ_NMG_0063324

Former Willbros Exec Pleads Guilty To Bribery (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

HOUSTON — A former executive of a subsidiary of Willbros Group Inc. pleaded guilty Thursday to violating a federal law by conspiring to bribe government officials in Nigeria and Ecuador to obtain gas pipeline work in the two countries, the Justice Department said.

Jim Bob Brown, 44, is to be sentenced Nov. 30 for violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

Brown, who worked for Willbros International Inc. in Nigeria and South America, admitted that he and another Willbros International executive arranged for the payment of about $1.5 million in cash in Nigeria in 2005 as part of a conspiracy to obtain gas pipeline construction business there.

Brown also said he and other Willbros International executives approved of a scheme from at least 1996 to early 2005 in which fictitious invoices were submitted from the company's Nigerian operations. The money was used to make payments to officials with Nigerian revenue agencies and courts to get lower taxes and to influence litigation.

The Justice Department said Brown also admitted that in 2004 he conspired to pay at least $300,000 to officials of the Ecuadorean government oil company to obtain a gas pipeline rehabilitation contract.

HP's Shares Rising Above The Fray (SFC)

By Benjamin Pimentel, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 15, 2006

Despite scandal, company steadily bounces back

Four years ago, Hewlett-Packard's bid to buy Compaq Computer turned into a bitter boardroom battle, jangling nerves on Wall Street and sending the company's stock plunging to as low as $14.

One would think that the current scandal at HP -- with shocking revelations of corporate spying that could possibly lead to criminal charges -- would also rattle investors' confidence in the technology giant.

But that hasn't happened.

Instead, the Palo Alto company, which is considered one of the big comeback stories of the past two years in the tech industry, has managed to remain a favorite of investors. The boardroom scandal has not turned into a material event for the company, at least in Wall Street's eyes.

For proof of that indifference, look no further than HP's stock, which has remained steady over the past two weeks, trading above $36, up nearly 50 percent from a year ago. It dipped slightly last week at the height of the scandal but steadily bounced back this week.

The stock closed at $36.25, down 12 cents, Thursday. That's just 13 cents below where it was the day the scandal broke last week.

"I personally think this is a big soap opera," analyst Eric Ross of ThinkEquity Partners said of the uproar over the HP board's use of questionable tactics in its probe of directors, journalists and employees involved in suspected media leaks. "Realistically, I just don't think anybody cares."

The lack of reaction on Wall Street also speaks to the financial industry's focus on the bottom line. Some analysts say disputes involving ethics and morals appear to hold little sway when compared with returns.

"That's really what shareholders are looking at -- the financial performance," said Michael Cohen, director of research at Pacific American Securities.

Mark Lanyon of Morningstar portrayed the controversy as "lots of sound and fury" that ultimately will not have a serious impact on financial performance.

Cindy Shaw, an independent financial analyst and former HP employee, said it could be "a bit of a distraction as HP comes down the homestretch of its fiscal year," which ends in October.

"Sales productivity could be impacted if clients want to talk about it, so some business could slip into the following quarter," she said in an e-mail. "I also see minor potential for this to swing buyers that are on the fence between two vendors to decide against HP."

But even such distractions would hurt HP's earnings by only a penny or two this quarter.

"Then, I would expect HP to be off to the races again," she added.

Cohen of Pacific American Securities said he doesn't think the time HP sales representatives spend chatting with customers about the scandal would be a big deal.

"Everyone is going to want to talk about it," he said. "If I was in the field and I'm a buyer and here comes the HP guy, I'm going to see him as a source for 'Let's talk about what's going on.' But even if they spend time shooting the breeze, they usually do that on other topics to keep the networking alive."

He said HP's stock was seriously affected during the battle over the Compaq merger because it involved a transaction that had long-term implications for the company's direction.

"It was a question of the future of the company with two alternate paths, with or without Compaq," he said.

The current scandal "is just board intrigue" that will probably not affect HP's operations.

However, he said, investors could become concerned if charges are filed against HP executives or board members.

The company faces several state and federal investigations, including probes by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, the Justice Department and Congress.

Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to indict people within the company and outside.

"If you start seeing board members being indicted, that could lead to a depression in the stock a little," Cohen said. "But even with indictments, I still think that the financial results of the company will likely remain mostly unaffected."

Ross of ThinkEquity Partners echoed this point, saying the penalties HP could face will likely be insignificant.

"We're talking about probably a drop in the bucket," he said.

Referring to other companies embroiled in recent major scandals, he added: "This is serious stuff, but this isn't Enron or WorldCom."

Another reason for continued investor confidence in HP is that while the scandal has hurt Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, it has left CEO Mark Hurd virtually unscathed.

Dunn spearheaded the disastrous investigation into the media leaks. She will step down from her post in January and will be replaced by Hurd.

Ross noted that a company board's role is to pick members of the management team and define the company's long-term direction -- a role the HP board accomplished with Hurd's hiring.

"Now that Mark Hurd is there, Patricia Dunn has done her job," Ross said. "She brought Mark Hurd in -- she's not needed."

Lerach Sues HP Directors, GC Over Records Scandal (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 15, 2006

It was Thursday afternoon and the press was sweating: For three days no one new had decided to go after Hewlett-Packard's board of directors for their recent descent into public ignominy.

Not to fear, though: At about 4 p.m., plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach joined Congress, the California attorney general, the San Francisco U.S. Attorney, and federal regulators. Representing an HP shareholder, Lerach filed a suit accusing board members and executives of breaching their fiduciary duty for a litany of reasons, including their ongoing use of top Silicon Valley lawyer Larry Sonsini.

Lerach's complaint is the latest result of a mess that began early this year when HP board Chairwoman Patricia Dunn initiated a probe in which an investigator lied to access private phone records of other directors and several journalists.

And while it's not yet clear how state Attorney General Bill Lockyer or U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will proceed -- Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to bring state charges, while Ryan's office met with HP lawyers on Monday -- Lerach's claims are quite explicit in the derivative suit he filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court in California.

The lead partner at Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins argues in the suit that 10 HP board members and executives -- including Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins -- should be forced to pay damages to the company.

DOJ_NMG_0063326

Lerach wrote that the defendants "breached their fiduciary duties to HP, committed gross mismanagement, abused their control of HP, and have engaged in a gross dereliction of their duties, as well as corporate waste and attempted enrichment" by seeking to solidify their positions within the company by investigating board members Thomas Perkins and George Keyworth.

The scandal first became public last week when The Wall Street Journal reported on Perkins' ongoing attempt to get HP to admit that he left the company in protest of the investigation.

In that probe, a contractor -- Boston-based Ronald DeLia, according to the Journal and Lerach's complaint -- used pretexts to access the board members' phone records to find out who was leaking information to reporters.

HP spokesman Ryan Donovan wouldn't comment on the suit Thursday. "We normally don't comment on any kind of pending suits," he said. Lawyers at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius representing HP in the federal investigation couldn't be reached by press time.

But Lerach had plenty to say. "It looks like a case of internal board warfare a little bit, and you don't necessarily think of that as a derivative suit," he said. But since the matter blew up publicly, he added, it's become very expensive for the company to handle.

Lerach said that, like most derivative cases, his suit is largely focused on getting better corporate governance protections in place. "But money should not be deemed insignificant," he said. "There's going to be a great cost to this scandal. It ought to be borne by the individuals responsible."

One part of the mess Lerach says is particularly troubling is the board's ongoing reliance on GC Baskins and Sonsini, who Lerach says advised the firm on the leak probe, the subsequent investigation of that probe, and recent board meetings discussing how to deal with the aftermath.

"Throughout the investigation, the controversy surrounding this investigation, HP's SEC disclosures regarding this investigation and its aftermath, the HP board has continued to rely upon the advice and counsel of Baskins, the in-house general counsel of HP, despite the fact that she was personally involved in structuring and implementing the investigation which utilized illegal tactics," the complaint says.

Lerach also wrote that "Wilson Sonsini and Sonsini are conflicted and would be key witnesses and possible defendants in any ultimate legal action," so the board should have sought independent counsel.

A Wilson Sonsini spokeswoman did not return a call for comment by press time.

Lerach said Thursday that state derivative cases tend to move slowly, and he's not yet sure who is representing HP in the case.

"I bet you it won't be Wilson Sonsini," he said.

N.Y. AG's Office Objects To Grasso's Request For New Judge (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 15, 2006

The New York attorney general's office Wednesday filed an objection to former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's request that Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Charles Edward Ramos recuse himself from presiding over the government's excessive pay lawsuit against Grasso.

"Grasso may have been permitted to treat the New York Stock Exchange as a fiefdom for his personal enrichment, picking the members of the Board and placing those over whom he had the most significant regulatory authority on the compensation committee, but he cannot be permitted to pick and choose the judge who will preside over his trial," the government said in its affidavit.

Grasso's attorneys argued in a motion filed last week that Ramos should recuse himself after he participated in ex parte settlement discussions in the case.

They also argued that the judge made factual and legal comments on the case during settlement discussions that would make it difficult for him to preside over the case.

DOJ_NMG_0063327

Finally, Grasso said last week that he was unaware that the judge had applied twice for a position at the Stock Exchange and that in his second application Ramos had cited to a case he decided in which he had addressed the issue of excessive compensation.

The government called Grasso's arguments baseless, deceitful and disingenuous. It said Grasso and his attorneys were in fact aware that Justice Ramos had applied twice for a board position at the Exchange.

Hedge Margins Draw The Focus Of Fed Official (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

A top Federal Reserve official believes regulators need to examine whether banks and securities dealers are imposing adequate margin requirements on hedge funds.

Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, believes margin requirements that are sensible in normal times may prove too thin in stressful market conditions and could actually aggravate violent market moves.

While he doesn't assert that margin rules are too low or say what regulators should do, his remarks suggest regulators may soon turn their attention to margin practices after pressing Wall Street to improve how they handle complex and fast-growing credit and equity derivatives.

Mr. Geithner, in remarks to be delivered in a speech in Hong Kong this morning, noted regulators are overhauling rules on how much capital banks must maintain to guard against loan and trading losses. "It is critical," he said, that that effort "be reinforced with more attention by supervisors to margin practice ... within the major financial institutions." An advance copy of Mr. Geithner's remarks was made available yesterday in New York.

Margin requirement refers to the amount of collateral a bank or dealer requires from a client, such as a hedge fund. In the event the client loses money on its position and isn't able to meet its obligations, the bank or dealer can sell the collateral to protect against loss. For example, the initial margin requirement for individual stock investors is 50%, meaning they must put at least half the value of their stock purchase up as cash or some other form of collateral. Big institutional customers typically enjoy far lower margin requirements -- zero in the case of some reputable hedge funds. Once their position turns unprofitable, they are subject to a "margin call," meaning they must post additional collateral.

"Collateral plays an increasingly important role in counterparty credit risk management," Mr. Geithner noted, "particularly for highly leveraged counterparties" such as hedge funds, which are investment pools for wealthy investors that use borrowed money to make big bets on stocks, interest rates, currencies, and other markets. Banks and dealers limit their risks by varying collateral as trading positions move for or against their clients. But he noted that while this makes sense for each individual firm, collectively it can aggravate big moves in the market.

"As financial firms demand more collateral, funds are forced to liquidate positions, adding to volatility and pushing down asset prices, leading to more margin calls and efforts by the major firms to reduce their exposure to future losses," his remarks said.

Mr. Geithner's remarks were part of a broader speech in which he was set to praise the role of hedge funds in making the overall financial system safer and more stable by providing "improved liquidity," or adding to the pool of buyers and sellers in a particular market, making pricing more efficient, and creating a diversity of opinion and new opportunities for investors.

He also was set to note that banks today have capital equal to 8.5% of their assets, a larger cushion against losses than the 6.5% level of the early 1990s. These developments, he said, indicate the financial system is better protected against financial shocks than it was in 1998, when it was rocked by Russia's debt default and the near-failure of hedge fund Long-Term Capital Management.

Still, Mr. Geithner has in the past year increasingly warned of potential weak spots in the financial system and has played a key role in several continuing efforts to fix specific problems. The New York Fed, the Securities and Exchange Commission, Britain's Financial Services Authority and a group of large banks and securities dealers have in recent months worked to clean up extensive back-office problems in the fast-growing market for credit derivatives, which are in essence insurance policies protecting the holder against a corporate default. Those participants will meet Sept. 27 at the New York Fed to assess progress on cleaning up credit derivatives and to tackle similar problems in equity derivatives.

DOJ_NMG_0063328

The New York Fed, SEC and FSA also are already jointly assessing large financial institutions' "stress testing," a routine internal test used to see how much money might be lost under stressful market conditions.

Billionaire In Mexico Settles Case With S.E.C. (NYT)

By Elisabeth Malkin

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 14 — The billionaire tycoon Ricardo Salinas Pliego and the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States reached a settlement on Thursday in the first lawsuit against a foreign company under the corporate governance rules of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Mr. Salinas Pliego, who owns Mexico's second-largest broadcaster, TV Azteca, agreed to pay $7.5 million in penalties and compensation to settle accusations of fraud involving a scheme to conceal a deal between a TV Azteca subsidiary and a company secretly owned by Mr. Salinas.

In the settlement, Mr. Salinas Pliego neither admitted or denied wrongdoing. One of his executives, Pedro Padilla Longoria, agreed to pay $1 million.

TV Azteca, which was also a defendant in the case, said in a statement that the settlement "does not entail economic consequences" for the company. Mr. Salinas Pliego had no comment.

Under the agreement, Mr. Salinas Pliego and Mr. Padilla are forbidden to serve as executives or directors of any publicly listed American company. Mr. Salinas Pliego delisted his companies from the New York Stock Exchange last year, arguing that "excessive regulation" was a burden.

The S.E.C. charged Mr. Salinas Pliego with fraud in January 2005 in connection with a debt deal involving what was then the cellphone unit of TV Azteca. A company called Codisco, secretly owned by Mr. Salinas Pliego and a partner, bought discounted debt owed by the cellphone unit.

The cellphone unit later paid back the debt at full price to Codisco. Mr. Salinas Pliego and his partner each made a profit of $109 million.

Mr. Salinas Pliego did not reveal his involvement in Codisco to his board and to regulators until TV Azteca's lawyer in New York resigned at the end for 2003. That led to investigations by the S.E.C. and the National Banking and Securities Commission of Mexico.

The S.E.C. also accused Mr. Salinas Pliego and his executives of engaging "in an elaborate scheme to conceal Salinas's role," and said that Mr. Salinas Pliego sold TV Azteca stock while his involvement in the debt deal remained undisclosed.

Another executive, Luis Echarte, settled earlier with the S.E.C.

Mr. Salinas Pliego has argued that the debt deal was legal and that his actions helped save the cellphone unit.

The executive, who is not related to former President Carlos Salinas, has a reputation for using his successful companies — which include a national chain of furniture and appliance stores and a bank — to finance unrelated projects.

Through local affiliates, Mr. Salinas Pliego is building a Spanish-language television network in the United States.

Last year, Mr. Salinas Pliego paid $2.3 million in fines to Mexican regulators. Corporate governance advocates in Mexico saw the case as a test of Mexico's new securities laws, which include criminal penalties. Mr. Salinas Pliego was never prosecuted.

The SEC-Saw (WSJ)

By Ira M. Millstein And Harvey J. Goldschmid

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Shareholder access is officially back on the agenda at the SEC, forced there by a recent court decision. And this time around the SEC should seize the opportunity to craft a solution that opens up the proxy to shareholders in a sensible way, a solution that ensures board accountability to shareholders.

DOJ_NMG_0063329

The decision last week by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit paved the way for shareholders to propose bylaw amendments allowing shareholders to nominate directors and for those nominations to be included on the company's proxy. The decision turned on the court's analysis of an SEC rule allowing exclusion of any proposal that "relates to an election" and the various interpretations given to that rule by the SEC over the years. The SEC has since announced that it will develop a proposed amendment to that rule and will hold an open meeting on Oct. 18, 2006, to consider the proposal.

This isn't the first time the SEC has considered this issue. Most recently, in October 2003, it proposed new rules for shareholder access to company proxy material. Those rules were designed to shift the balance of power between corporate managements and shareholders, by giving dissatisfied majorities of shareholders a meaningful role in the election process without the need to embark on an expensive proxy contest. Under the process then and now in effect, there are virtually no contested elections for the boards of large public corporations in the U.S. The analogy is to elections in the Soviet Union.

The SEC's proposed rules in 2003 generated an enormous amount of vigorous debate. It even led indirectly to reform in the area of majority voting through the urgings of institutional investors and governance thought-leaders. But the proposed rules themselves never progressed to "final." This occurred for a variety of reasons, including concerns about complexity and potential for abuse by obstructionists, to pure management self-interest in ensuring that director elections remained under company lock and key.

The October 2003 proposed rules may have stalled, but the reasons they were proposed in the first place are all around us still. Shareholders are still the providers of capital in our economy. They are still responsible for electing directors who will improve performance. And they still lack a meaningful avenue of bringing about mid-course corrections when management is ineffective or wrongheaded and the board is compliant. They still need an avenue to making themselves felt.

The court's decision has opened the door for the SEC to think again about shareholder access and its importance for corporate efficiency, honesty, productivity and profitability. The SEC should strive for a solution that gives shareholders a voice in the director election process. Its recommendation should include safeguards such as minimum holding requirements that may be necessary to ensure that access opportunities are not abused by shareholders with non-efficiency or obstructionist motivations. A uniform approach to shareholder access is key to achieving a balanced result and avoiding the confusion and delay that can reign when ad hoc development by too many cooks is permitted to occur (as with majority voting reform, for example).

We urge the SEC to balance the system and give shareholders the tools to hold boards accountable -- and, in the process, restore public confidence in the fairness and economic rationality of the governance system.

Mr. Millstein is senior associate dean for corporate governance at the Yale School of Management. Mr. Goldschmid is the Dwight Professor of Law at Columbia and a former SEC Commissioner. Both are at Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Deplores Web Predators (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 15, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told an audience in Kansas City on Thursday that the battle against Internet predators is “a fight for our future.”

Gonzales called on all levels of law enforcement as well as parents, educators and private advocacy groups to work together to defeat the “vast and frightening network” of criminals who every day seek to harm children.

“It is brutal. It is heinous, and it is criminal,” he said.

The attorney general spoke to several hundred federal, state and local law enforcement officials from across the Midwest attending the annual Protect Our Children conference.

He told them that the proliferation of child pornography and sexual predators should be seen as “a call to arms” to those dedicated to fighting it.

DOJ_NMG_0063330

Halting those crimes is a top priority of the Justice Department. Gonzales promoted an initiative started earlier this year called Project Safe Childhood, which seeks to coordinate law enforcement efforts with endeavors to educate children and parents about the problem and how they fight a "determined and desperate brand of criminal."

He cited a recent study that found half of Internet users between the ages of 10 and 17 reported being exposed to pornographic material over the Web. And one in seven reported that they were sexually solicited online.

While that was an improvement from five years earlier, when a study found one in five reporting solicitations, Gonzalez said, "One in seven getting solicited is one in seven too many."

Federal prosecutors in the Western District of Missouri filed 42 child exploitation cases last year and have filed 23 this year, according to a spokesman. Nationwide, federal prosecutors last year charged more than 1,503 defendants in child exploitation cases, according to the Department of Justice.

Gonzales also told the audience Thursday that a new series of public service announcements will begin airing early next year to raise public awareness about the problem's scope.

Gonzales Asks For Stronger Penalties Against Online Sex Predators (AP)

By David Twiddy

AP, September 15, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Joint federal and local task forces arrested more than 1,600 people nationwide last year who were accused of exploiting children over the Internet, a fivefold increase over 2000.

But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday the problem only continues to grow as the Internet has given child pornographers and people seeking trysts with minors unparalleled access to young users and made it easier to hide from law enforcement.

"The only way to respond to their horrific ambitions is to respond with greater perseverance," said Gonzales, speaking at the Protect Our Children Conference, a three-day event bringing law enforcement from Missouri, Kansas, Illinois and Nebraska together with child advocates and abuse treatment organizations.

In particular, Gonzales said states need to re-evaluate their laws against child exploitation and make them stronger, if necessary.

Missouri, for example, enacted legislation this year that boosts the penalties for many child sex crimes, such as a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years for someone convicted of trying to entice a child into meeting to have sex.

President Bush this summer signed into law legislation that effectively doubles many federal sentences for pedophiles, as well as requires offenders to place their names and locations on Internet databases and be charged with a felony for not providing regular updates.

Gonzales said federal, state and local law enforcement are doing a better job of coordinating their efforts and teaming up with community organizations that teach parents and children how to avoid online predators and deal with the aftermath when children are abused.

He added that his office and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children will begin airing new public service messages early next year to call attention to the online dangers.

"We need to get the public as well as government officials to start thinking about it in the right terms; it is brutal, it is heinous and it is criminal," he said, adding that the pornographic material is increasingly graphic and involving children as young as toddlers and even infants. "Our ultimate goal is prevention because a child who is molested bears a scar that never quite heals."

He added that federal authorities are increasingly reaching out to other countries, where much of the child pornography now traded among pedophiles is made and distributed, to stiffen their own child sex laws.

U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman's office in Kansas City has been among the leaders in the country in attacking online predators, filing 42 child exploitation cases last year, the sixth-highest in the nation. So far this year, the office has filed 23 cases, spokesman Don Ledford said.

Schlozman said the Internet's reach means he's dealing with offenders around the world, so he could be barely making a dent in rooting out local pedophiles.

"Sometimes you don't know exactly if that predator is operating from Overland Park (Kan.) or Bangkok," he said. "We certainly see a ton of it here. So I know it's a huge problem but, 'Is it getting better?' That's really hard for me to say."

US Attorney General Visits KC (WDAF)

WDAF-TV, Fox 4, Kansas City, September 15, 2006

KANSAS CITY, MO. - They are out there and they are preying on our young. On Thursday, one group of criminals was the focus of a visit to the Metro by the U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales.

A national study said that one out of every seven children who go online will be solicited sexually. That statistic was so disturbing that the US Justice Department pledged a crackdown on Internet predators. That's what brought Gonzales to Kansas City.

"It's a wrenching reality that every day children are sexually solicited online," Gonzales said.

In many ways Gonzales was preaching to the choir. He spoke to state, local and federal officials at a conference on child protection. Gonzales' message? The Federal government will lead the fight against Internet predators.

"Everyday we must talk to our kids about what they are seeing, what they are hearing and who they are communicating with online," Gonzales said.

It was a message that rang true to those listening. US Attorney for Western Missouri Brad Schlozman said last year his office prosecuted more than 40 sexual predator cases.

"These predators are acting under a veil of anonymity on the Internet," Schlozman said. "They feel emboldened and they traffic on the Internet."

Captain Paul Carrill heads up the cyber-crimes unit for the Platte County Sheriff's department. He said that what initially surprised him is who the predators are.

"They range from the guy who does nothing and lives at home with his parents and has to take a taxi cab to the meet location, to the other end of the spectrum. You have a very well education, upper-class, well-paid individual," Carrill said.

What many in local law enforcement wanted to know was who will pay for all the tough new programs the federal government wanted to see.

"This is an important issue and I think we will have support in Congress for additional funding," Gonzales said. "But we'll work on that."

He said that it's an issue that can't be ignored and every year it gets worse.

Email Linda Wagar at linda.wagar@foxtv.com

GOP Officials Say Ney Will Offer Guilty Plea (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney, the Ohio Republican charged with taking gifts, trips and campaign donations from lobbyist Jack Abramoff, is expected to plead guilty to at least one criminal corruption charge possibly as early as today, Republicans officials told the Associated Press.

Ney has consistently denied any wrongdoing but agreed last month to give up his re-election bid for the upcoming election. It is not clear from the Republican officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of pending legal proceedings, if Ney will resign his House seat. The officials did not say what charge Ney would plead guilty to, or whether he would plead guilty to more than one charge. Calls to his congressional office were not immediately returned. Abramoff has been convicted of conspiracy and fraud.

Congress could limit payday-loan interest

A Pentagon official urged Congress on Thursday to limit interest rates on so-called payday loans to military servicemembers because some personnel face debt problems so severe that they have been reassigned and have lost their security clearances. David Chu, undersecretary of Defense, testified that a ceiling is needed “to prevent any lenders from imposing usurious rates” on the estimated 225,000 servicemembers — 17% of the military — who use payday loans.

The annual interest rate would be capped at 36% under the Senate version of a defense bill. The ceiling was not included in a version that passed in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0063332

Payday loans are short-term cash advances made by storefront businesses, often clustered around military bases. Borrowers can face huge debt if they don't repay quickly because interest rates can exceed 900%.

House changes rules on 'earmarks'

The House took a step toward curbing "earmarks," the practice of lawmakers anonymously inserting into legislation targeted spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district. A rule change, which passed 245-171, requires lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into bills.

"This doesn't get rid of earmarks, but it makes everyone know who's getting them," said Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., a critic of special-interest spending.

Ohio Congressman Is Said To Agree To Plead Guilty (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio, has agreed to plead guilty to federal criminal charges related to his dealings with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, lawyers and others with knowledge of the investigation said Thursday.

A guilty plea would make Mr. Ney, a six-term congressman, the first member of Congress to admit to criminal charges in the Abramoff investigation, which has focused on the actions of several current and former Republican lawmakers who had been close to the former lobbyist.

People with detailed knowledge of the investigation said Mr. Ney had entered an in-patient rehabilitation center in recent days for treatment of alcoholism, making it uncertain whether he would appear at a court hearing to announce the plea. Lawyers and others would speak only anonymously because of concern that they would anger prosecutors.

They said the agreement with the Justice Department — and the exact criminal charges, which are expected to include conspiracy and false statement — would be disclosed in Washington as soon as Friday and would probably require Mr. Ney to serve at least some time in prison.

Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt members of Congress and other public officials. The scandal was among the factors that led Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the former House Republican leader, who had been close to Mr. Abramoff, to resign in June, his aides said at the time.

Democratic lawmakers and political strategists have seized on the Abramoff case — and a separate bribery investigation involving military contractors that led to a guilty plea last year by Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California — in arguing for voters to return Democrats to power in the House and Senate in the November elections.

Mr. Ney has been under scrutiny by the Justice Department for more than a year over gifts he received from Mr. Abramoff that included a lavish golf trip to Scotland in 2002 by chartered private jet.

The congressman has said in the past the gifts had nothing to do with several official actions he took in support of Mr. Abramoff and his clients, including placing statements in the official Congressional Record on their behalf.

Mr. Ney announced last month that he would not seek re-election, citing stress on his family because of what he called the "ordeal" of the scrutiny over his ties to Mr. Abramoff.

In May, Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, who left the House to join Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm, pleaded guilty to trying to corrupt Mr. Ney with illegal gifts, including the Scotland trip.

Mr. Ney's lawyers in Washington, Mark H. Tuohey and William E. Lawler, did not return phone calls on Thursday. Nor did Justice Department officials.

Another person familiar with the department's investigation said at least one of the criminal charges in Mr. Ney's guilty plea would involve the accuracy of his claim in a House financial disclosure statement that he won $34,000 in a private London casino during a trip in 2003.

Those winnings were also under scrutiny by the Justice Department, in part because the amount of the winnings coincided to a surprising degree with the amount of debt outstanding on Mr. Ney's credit cards. Mr. Ney's host on that trip was a Cyprus-based aviation company that was seeking Congressional support for sales of airplane parts to Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0063333

Before the Abramoff scandal, Mr. Ney was seen by colleagues as positioning himself to rise in the House Republican leadership.

Affable and loyal to the Republican agenda in Congress, he got as far as chairman of the House Administration Committee, a post in which he controlled the allotment of office space on Capitol Hill and management of the House cafeteria and other services.

But in January, he was pressured to give up the committee post; Republican leaders said they feared that the assignment had brought undue scrutiny to the corruption accusations facing Mr. Ney and other Republicans.

Apart from the notoriety he received from the Abramoff scandal, Mr. Ney may be best remembered in Washington for his decision to label French-fried potatoes sold in the House cafeteria as "Freedom Fries" as a protest over the French government's refusal to support the American invasion of Iraq.

G.O.P. Picks Replacement

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Sept. 14 (AP) — Republicans picked a party-backed state senator Thursday in a special primary to replace Representative Ney.

The winner, State Senator Joy Padgett, defeated four other candidates, winning 66 percent of the vote.

Ms. Padgett will face Zack Space, the Democratic nominee, on Nov. 7 for the 18th District race. She said she was not concerned that she could be tied to Mr. Ney and said she would have to work to separate herself from him.

Ney To Plead Guilty In Scandal (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) is expected to plead guilty in the coming days to charges stemming from his association with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and he will blame a long-standing problem with alcohol for behavior that spiraled down to illegality, sources close to the congressman said last night.

Ney, known in Abramoff-related court documents as "Representative No. 1," checked into a rehabilitation clinic for alcoholism yesterday, a senior House official and personal friend said yesterday. Under pressure from Republican leaders worried about losing his seat, Ney announced this summer that he would retire from Congress at the end of the year.

Now, three House sources said, the Justice Department is expected to announce a plea agreement or an agreement to reach a plea bargain as early as tomorrow. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to preempt a legal announcement.

But Ney's Washington attorney, Mark H. Tuohey, said from London yesterday that he expected no immediate developments in the case.

Ney, a popular, soft-spoken Republican, became known as the mayor of the House for the largess he showed to fellow members from his post as chairman of the House Administration Committee. His entanglements with Abramoff, however, became his undoing.

Guilty pleas from Abramoff, two former aides to retired representative Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and Ney's former chief of staff all said Ney accepted gifts and favors in exchange for official actions on behalf of Abramoff's clients. Tickets to events and expense-paid golf vacations helped win Ney's support for legislation, his insertion of comments into the congressional record and his pulling strings to secure government contracts for Abramoff's clients, according to Abramoff, former DeLay spokesman Michael Scanlon, former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony C. Rudy and former Ney chief of staff Neil G. Volz.

For months, Ney has maintained his innocence. Aides in his office did not return calls, and Justice officials would not comment.

Voters in a special primary election in Ohio yesterday selected state Sen. Joy Padgett as the Republican nominee to succeed Ney.

Ohio Congressman To Plead Guilty To Criminal Charge In Corruption Probe, GOP Sources Say (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0063334

By Jonathan Weisman

AP, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON – Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, is expected to plead guilty in coming days to charges stemming from his association with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and he will blame a long-standing problem with alcohol for behavior that spiraled down to illegality, sources close to the congressman said Thursday night.

Ney, known in Abramoff-related court documents as "Representative No. 1," checked into a rehabilitation clinic for alcoholism Thursday, a senior House official and personal friend said Thursday. Under pressure from Republican leaders worried about losing his seat, Ney announced this summer he would retire from Congress at the end of the year.

Now, three House sources said, the Justice Department is expected to announce a plea agreement or an agreement to reach a plea bargain as early as Saturday. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they did not want to pre-empt a legal announcement.

Ney, a soft-spoken, popular Republican, became known as the mayor of the House for the largesse he showed to fellow members from his post as chairman of the House Administration Committee. His entanglements with Abramoff became his undoing.

Guilty pleas from Abramoff, two former aides to retired Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and Ney's former chief of staff all said Ney accepted gifts and favors in exchange for official actions on behalf of Abramoff's clients.

Tickets to football games, box seats at concerts, and all-expense-paid, lavish golf vacations helped win Ney's support for legislation, his insertion of comments into the Congressional Record and his pulling strings to secure government contracts for Abramoff's clients, according to Abramoff, former DeLay spokesman Michael Scanlon, former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony C. Rudy and former Ney chief of staff Neil Volz.

For months, Ney has steadfastly maintained his innocence. Aides in his office did not return phone calls Thursday, and Justice Department officials would not comment.

Voters in a special primary election in Ohio on Thursday selected state Sen. Joy Padgett as the Republican nominee to succeed Ney in the largely rural district. Ney personally tapped Padgett to run before he announced his retirement.

Columnist Contradicts Leak Source (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — Robert D. Novak, the columnist who first disclosed the identity of the intelligence officer in the C.I.A. leak case, has disputed statements by his primary source, Richard L. Armitage, who said his mention of her identity was inadvertent.

In his syndicated column published on Thursday, Mr. Novak said that Mr. Armitage, a former deputy secretary of state, had "obscured" the details of their conversation on July 8, 2003, in a way that made Mr. Armitage's disclosure of the identity of the Central Intelligence Agency officer, Valerie Wilson, seem less deliberate.

Mr. Novak wrote that Mr. Armitage "did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests.''

"He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column," the writer said.

Mr. Novak added, "He told me unequivocally that Ms. Wilson had worked in the C.I.A.'s Counterproliferation Division and that she had suggested her husband's mission."

Ms. Wilson's husband is Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador who criticized the Bush administration Iraq policy on July 6, 2003, in an Op-Ed article in The New York Times. Mr. Wilson traveled to Niger in 2002 to examine reports that Iraq tried buy uranium ore and wrote in his article that he found such purchases highly unlikely.

The conversation between Mr. Armitage and Mr. Novak became significant because it led to a criminal referral by the C.I.A. to the Justice Department. A preliminary inquiry was followed by an investigation by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, a special counsel.

Mr. Fitzgerald has not prosecuted anyone for talking to Mr. Novak. He cleared Mr. Armitage of wrongdoing in a letter last February, but he has brought charges against one official, a perjury and obstruction indictment in October 2005 against I. Lewis Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0063335

Mr. Armitage, who confirmed last week that he was Mr. Novak's main source, disclosed the conversation to the Justice Department in October 2003.

On Thursday, Mr. Armitage said he stood by his account of the meeting. He said that his comments about Ms. Wilson in the conversation came at the end of the interview, were brief and made in response to a question posed by Mr. Novak.

Mr. Novak's new column offered a conflicting account of other aspects of the interview. He said he was offered the chance to meet Mr. Armitage "without explanation" after trying for more than two years to arrange an interview.

Mr. Armitage said he agreed to the interview only after Mr. Novak had interceded with a mutual friend. In addition, Mr. Novak criticized Mr. Armitage for waiting nearly three years before disclosing that he was Mr. Novak's source, writing that it caused "intense pain for his colleagues in government."

Mr. Armitage has said he did not publicly discuss his role because Justice Department prosecutors cautioned against that.

What A Load Of Armitage! (WSJ)

By Victoria Toensing

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Richard Armitage has finally emerged from the cover-my-backside closet, "apologizing" on CBS for keeping quiet for almost three years about being the original source for Robert Novak's July 14, 2003 column stating that Joe Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked for the CIA and had suggested him for a mission to Niger. He disingenuously blames his silence on Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's non-legally based request -- any witness is free to talk about his or her testimony -- not to discuss the matter.

Put aside hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxpayer funds squandered on the investigation, New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85 days in jail, the angst and legal fees of scores of witnesses, the White House held siege to a criminal investigation while fighting the war on terror, Karl Rove's reputation maligned, and "Scooter" Libby's resignation and indictment. By his silence, Mr. Armitage is responsible for one of the most factually distorted investigations in history.

There is a reason the old Watergate question -- What did he know and when did he know it? -- has become part of our investigative culture. It provides a paradigm for parsing a complicated factual scenario.

• Joseph Wilson: In July 2003, when he demanded an investigation of a White House cabal for violating the Intelligence Identities Protection Act by "outing" his wife, Mr. Wilson knew Ms. Plame did not meet the factual requirements for covert status under the Act. She was neither covert at the time of publication nor had a covert foreign assignment within five years. He acknowledged so in his book: "My move back to Washington [in June 1997] coincided with the return to D.C. of a woman named Valerie Plame." As the Senate negotiator for this 1982 Act, I know a trip or two by Ms. Plame to a foreign country while assigned to Langley, where she worked in July 2003, is not considered a foreign assignment. I also know covert officers are not assigned to Langley.

• Richard Armitage: Mr. Armitage now claims he only knew on Oct. 1, 2003 that he was Mr. Novak's source. We should question that claim in light of Mr. Novak's account this week that Mr. Armitage "made clear he considered [the information about Ms. Plame] especially suited for my column."

Mr. Armitage also knew he had met with Bob Woodward on June 13, 2003, telling him about Mr. Wilson's wife's CIA employment and her role in her husband's trip to Niger. But when the FBI interviewed Mr. Armitage on Oct. 2, he admitted to the Novak conversation only, notably forgetting meeting with one of our country's premier investigative reporters. By attributing his longtime silence to Mr. Fitzgerald's request, Mr. Armitage must have forgotten Mr. Fitzgerald was not appointed until Dec. 30, 2003. If Mr. Armitage had come forward during those three months, there might never have been a special counsel.

• Patrick Fitzgerald: What Mr. Fitzgerald knew, and chose to ignore, is troublesome. Despite what some CIA good ol' boys might have told Mr. Fitzgerald, he knew from the day he took office that the facts did not support a violation of the Act; therefore, there was no crime to investigate. Although he claimed in Mr. Libby's indictment that Ms. Plame's employment status was "classified," Mr. Fitzgerald refuses to provide the basis for that fact and, even if true, can point to no law that would be violated by revealing a "classified" (not covert) employment. It was this gap in the law that created the need to pass the Act in the first place.

DOJ_NMG_0063336

Mr. Armitage intimated on CBS that, although his "chitchat" was careless, there was perhaps "a conspiracy" in the White House to retaliate against Mr. Wilson. However, Mr. Fitzgerald knew (prior to indicting Mr. Libby) that Mr. Armitage was Mr. Novak's original source, Mr. Libby never spoke to Mr. Novak, and Messrs. Rove and Libby had merely responded to reporters' questions. Hardly acts of initiating a criminal conspiracy. Mr. Fitzgerald knows it is not criminal to discredit a mendacious attack on the president. There was a crime only if Ms. Plame were covert and the person revealed that fact with knowledge of her status. Mr. Fitzgerald learned during the investigation that not one person had any basis to think she was covert. Just ask Mr. Armitage, who asserted in his apologia, "I had never seen a covered agent's name in any memo . . . in 28 years of government."

During the investigation Mr. Fitzgerald learned that a former New York Times reporter, Cliff May, twice told the FBI that, prior to Mr. Novak's column, he had heard in an offhand way from a nongovernment employee that Mr. Wilson's wife worked for the CIA, a clear indication that her employment was known on the street. Ditto columnist Hugh Sidey, who wrote that Ms. Plame's name was "knocking around in the sub rosa world. . . for a long time."

Mr. Armitage, who came forward after Mr. Libby was indicted, was told in February 2006, after two grand jury appearances, he would not be indicted. Mr. Rove, however, after five grand jury appearances, was not informed until July 2006 he would not be charged. Mr. Fitzgerald made the Rove decision appear strained, a close call. Yet of the two men's conduct, Mr. Armitage's deserved more scrutiny. And Mr. Fitzgerald knew it. Each had testified before the grand jury about a conversation with Mr. Novak. Each had forgotten about a conversation with an additional reporter: Mr. Armitage with Mr. Woodward, Mr. Rove with Time's Matt Cooper. However, Mr. Rove came forward pre-indictment, immediately, when reminded of the second conversation. When Mr. Woodward attempted to ask Mr. Armitage about the matter, on two separate occasions pre-indictment, Mr. Armitage refused to discuss it and abruptly cut him off. To be charitable, assume he did not independently recall his conversation with Mr. Woodward. Would not two phone calls requesting to talk about the matter refresh his recollection? Now we also know Messrs. Armitage and Novak have vastly different recollections of their conversation. Isn't that what Mr. Libby was indicted for?

What Mr. Fitzgerald chose not to know is even more troublesome than what he chose to ignore. When Mr. Armitage came forth in October 2003, why did Mr. Fitzgerald not request his appointment calendar from early May, the time the first story appeared in the national press about an unnamed former ambassador's trip to Niger? Mr. Fitzgerald demanded this type of information from White House personnel. Just think, if he had done so of Mr. Armitage, he would have learned prior to indictment about Mr. Woodward's appointment.

By the time he indicted Mr. Libby on Oct. 28, 2005, Mr. Fitzgerald knew two conflicting facts about the classified nature of the Niger trip: since at least early May 2003, Mr. Wilson was discussing his Niger trip with the press (Nicholas Kristof, the New York Times) and claimed in his July 2003 NYT op-ed that his mission was "discreet, but by no means secret." Yet, the indictment states that around June 9, 2003, the CIA sent "classified" documents to the vice president's office discussing "Wilson and his trip to Niger." If the trip was classified for the vice president, why was it declassified for Mr. Wilson? Did Mr. Wilson violate any law by revealing his trip or did Mr. Fitzgerald choose not to know?

Did Mr. Fitzgerald subpoena Ms. Plame? He could have asked her why, if she were truly covert, was she attending an Eastern Shore meeting in May 2003 with Democratic senators. The first journalist to reveal Ms. Plame was "covert" was David Corn on July 16, 2003, two days after Mr. Novak's column. The latter never wrote, because he did not know and it was not so, that Ms. Plame was covert. However, Mr. Corn claimed Mr. Novak "outed" her as an "undercover CIA officer," querying whether Bush officials blew "the cover of a U.S. intelligence officer working covertly in . . . national security." Was Mr. Corn subpoenaed? Did Mr. Fitzgerald subpoena Mr. Wilson to attest he had never revealed his wife's employment to anyone? If he had done so, he might have learned Mr. Corn's source.

It is not just Mr. Armitage who should apologize. So should Joe Wilson and Pat Fitzgerald.

Ms. Toensing was chief counsel for the Senate Intelligence Committee and deputy assistant attorney general in the Reagan administration.

Former Nev. Politician Pleads Guilty (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063337

LAS VEGAS -- A former politician and lobbyist accused of ferrying bribes for a strip club owner reached a plea deal Thursday, just days before the start of his trial, authorities said.

Lance Malone, a former Clark County commissioner, has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said. Malone is scheduled to enter his plea Monday.

Authorities in turn have dropped wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud charges, and agreed not to object to Malone serving his sentence concurrently with a three-year sentence a San Diego jury levied against him last summer for similar charges.

Malone's trial was to cap off a three-year FBI probe into corruption and bribery on the Clark County commission. At the center of the probe was Michael Galardi, the former owner of three strip clubs who claimed to have paid off dozens of politicians in Nevada and Southern California with cash and favors.

Authorities said Malone, who was hired as Galardi's lobbyist after losing a bid for re-election, acted as Galardi's bagman, delivering wads of cash to his former colleagues. In return, Galardi said he sought favorable votes on the commission, which was reviewing plans to expand one of his clubs.

Galardi, 44, pleaded guilty in 2003 and testified in Las Vegas and in a related San Diego federal bribery case.

Malone's lawyer did not return a call for comment.

Russo's Wife To Plead Guilty (MR)

By Ryan Dezember And Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporters

Mobile Press-Register (AL), September 15, 2006

Crystal Russo, the wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, will plead guilty in Mobile's federal court next week to obstruction of justice as part of an agreement with prosecutors, according to a Wednesday court filing.

Crystal Russo, 25, was scheduled to be tried next month for allegedly trying to help her husband hide money that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors this summer in their corruption case against the now-convicted former mayor.

Specifically, she is accused of helping her husband move nearly $96,000 from one bank account to another account that had been hastily created in her maiden name, Crystal R. McDonald, in order to hide the money from federal agents seeking to seize it as part of a March 31 indictment.

Three days after the new account was created at Vision Bank, Crystal Russo tried to withdraw much of the money to pay off the couple's debts, according to the indictment. She was informed that the government had already frozen the account.

On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a Mobile federal jury on numerous counts related to plots by Wall and fellow developer Jim Brown to enrich the mayor in an effort to curry favor in City Hall. Brown pleaded guilty in his own agreement with prosecutors and became the government's star witness in the two-week case against the others.

Steve Russo, 44, was convicted of 22 counts that included those related to his role in moving the money targeted for forfeiture.

Russo, Sutley and Wall are scheduled for sentencing in January. Brown's sentencing is set for November.

Crystal Russo's plea agreement has not yet been released. But a Wednesday filing that followed a Tuesday meeting between prosecutors and her Mobile lawyer, Gordon Armstrong III, says that she will plead guilty to one of the three charges brought against her in June by a federal grand jury.

That charge -- obstruction of justice -- carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison, although prosecutors typically agree to recommend a sentence at the low end of advisory sentencing guidelines in exchange for a guilty plea. Under preliminary calculations by the U.S. Probation Office, such a sentence would be 10 months in prison.

Any sentence less than a year would make Crystal Russo eligible for probation rather than serving prison time. U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose will make the final determination of her sentencing range -- as well as decide whether to follow it -- at a hearing that would be set once Crystal Russo pleads guilty. She is scheduled to plead guilty next Thursday, according to court records.

Besides the obstruction charge, Crystal Russo was charged in June with conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government and the destruction or removal of property to prevent seizure. As part of the plea bargain, prosecutors likely would recommend that the other two charges be dropped.

Neither Armstrong nor federal prosecutors responded to telephone calls seeking comment late Wednesday.

Prosecutors Have Plea Deal With Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — Prosecutors in the Orange Beach corruption probe have reached a plea deal on charges against Crystal Russo, the wife of former Mayor Steve Russo.

She will plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Mobile next Thursday to obstruction of justice, according to a court filing Wednesday. She could be given probation.

Crystal Russo, 25, was facing trial next month for allegedly trying to help her 44-year-old husband hide $96,000 that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors in their probe of the former mayor.

On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a federal court jury in Mobile of fraud and related charges in a real estate scheme in the Gulf Coast resort.

Businessman Arrested On Extortion Charges (SFC)

By Jim Herron Zamora, Christopher Heredia And Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, September 15, 2006

(09-14) 17:07 PDT OAKLAND -- A well-connected Oakland businessman has been arrested on federal charges of extorting bribe money in exchange for using his influence to help a contract applicant win a deal with the city, authorities said today.

Maurice Himy, 59, of San Rafael was arrested Wednesday by FBI agents on a federal complaint accusing him of interference of commerce by threats or violence. Until March, he owned Spaccio, an Italian men's clothing store on Frank Ogawa Plaza, just steps from Oakland City Hall.

Himy appeared before U.S. Magistrate Wayne Brazil in Oakland today. The magistrate ordered Himy to turn over his passport and released him on his own recognizance. Himy will return to court Sept. 21, authorities said.

Himy's leased silver 2005 Mini Cooper was parked today outside his San Rafael home, where the shades were drawn. No one answered the door, and he did not immediately return a call for comment.

Himy's arrest followed a 17-month investigation by the FBI over the awarding of a city of Oakland contract to provide auctioneering services for city-owned vehicles and surplus property.

According to the complaint, Himy, a person described as a "cooperating witness" and an unnamed city of Oakland official -- identified only as "City Official A" -- began discussing in September 2004 "the payment of thousands of dollars to Himy" in exchange for help in securing the contract for the witness.

Himy has sold suits to Oakland Mayor Jerry Brown and Jacques Barzhagi, the mayor's former senior advisor who was ousted from his post last year after details of a domestic dispute with his wife became public.

The complaint does not name any city officials and Brown's spokesman, Gil Duran, said today, "This has nothing to do with Jerry Brown or the mayor's office."

Duran confirmed that Brown and Himy had traveled together to Agadir, Morocco, in 2004 when Oakland was seeking to establish a sister-city relationship with a city in a Muslim country. Himy is a native of Morocco, Duran said.

Under the deal outlined in the complaint, Himy would receive 8 percent of the commissions if he agreed to help obtain the contract, authorities said.

"Pay me or I will kill the contract," Himy told the witness in a phone call, FBI Special Agent Marlo McGuire wrote in an affidavit.

In April 2005, the witness, wired with a recording device, met with Himy at Spaccio, authorities said. During the recorded conversation, Himy repeatedly demanded money from the cooperating witness, at one point demanding $65,000 in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering contract, the complaint said.

Himy warned the witness, "You try to f -- me up, then I, I'll kill the deal," the complaint said. "I'll let the other guy have it."

In February, the witness learned that his application for the auctioneering contract had been approved.

"Based upon the evidence uncovered during the investigation, there is probable cause to believe that Himy has extorted one or more local business owners seeking to do business with the city of Oakland," McGuire wrote.

"It is probable that the criminal acts of Himy affected commerce or the movement of any article or commodity in commerce since the contract impacted included the sales of used automobiles," McGuire wrote.

Chronicle staff writers Demian Bulwa and Peter Fimrite contributed to this report.

Oakland Clothier Accused Of City Hall Extortion (MERCN/AP)

The San Jose Mercury News, September 15, 2006

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) - A former Oakland clothier with alleged connections to City Hall was charged with one federal count of extortion today on accusations that he received money to help an FBI informant obtain a lucrative city contract.

Maurice Himy, who operated Himco Apparel Inc. in Oakland until March, is accused of greasing the wheels of City Hall to help the informant win the contract to auction surplus city property in February that Himy estimated could generate $1 million in income.

Himy, 59, who remained free after his Wednesday arrest, was to appear in federal court Sept. 21. He faces a maximum 20-year sentence if convicted, authorities said.

The one-count complaint alleges Himy, in exchange for more than $10,000, steered the contract the businessman's way with the help of a City Hall insider. The businessman was not named in an affidavit released today, but he contacted the FBI after Himy allegedly told him the only way he could obtain the contract was through payoffs to Himy.

The informant, who recorded some of his conversations with Himy, initially was rejected for the contract because it was submitted too late but was awarded it in February after Himy intervened, according to court documents. During one taped conversation, Himy allegedly told the informant, ``Pay me or I will kill the contract."

Himy, 59, of San Rafael, did not have a listed phone number and could not immediately be reached for comment.

The affidavit from FBI agent Marlo McGuire of the Oakland branch did not name the City Hall employee, referenced in the affidavit as ``City Employee A," who was associated with Himy to seal the deal.

Erica Harrold, a spokeswoman for City Attorney John Russo, said, ``We haven't been contacted by the FBI and if there are any problems, obviously, we want to see those addressed and remedied."

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan of San Francisco said the investigation is ongoing.

Oakland Clothier Arrested In Corruption Probe (BCNW)

Bay City News Wires, September 15, 2006

(BCN) OAKLAND Federal prosecutors said today that 59-year-old Maurice Himy of San Rafael has been arrested by the FBI on a complaint charging interference of commerce by threats or violence in connection with a public corruption probe in Oakland.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the complaint alleges that Himy was involved in extortion and public corruption involving the awarding of a city of Oakland contract to provide auctioneering services for city-owned vehicles and surplus property.

The complaint alleges numerous discussions between Himy, a cooperating witness, and an Oakland city official, named only as “City Official A,” involving the payment of thousands of dollars to Himy in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering city contract that was eventually approved for the cooperating witness.

Prosecutors said Himy’s arrest is the result of a 17-month investigation by the FBI.

U.S. attorney’s spokesman Luke Macaulay said the investigation is continuing but declined to elaborate further.

Himy was the owner of Spaccio, a men’s clothing store located at 140 Frank Ogawa Plaza, adjacent to Oakland City Hall. The store closed in March.

Prosecutors said Himy was arrested Wednesday afternoon in Oakland and made his initial appearance in U.S. District Court this morning before Magistrate Judge Brazil. He was released on his own recognizance, with the condition that he turn in his passport to the U.S. Marshals Service.

Himy is scheduled to return to court on Sept. 21 for identification of counsel.

According to the complaint, discussions began in September 2004 between the cooperating witness and Himy about the Oakland auctioneering contract.

Prosecutors say Himy allegedly provided terms of a contract between the witness and Himy in which Himy would receive 8 percent of the commissions generated by the auctioneering contract in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering contract.

According to the complaint, Himy said, "pay me or I will kill the contract."

The complaint alleges that Himy repeatedly demanded money from the cooperating witness and at one point demanded $65,000 in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering contract.

In February, according to the complaint, the witness received notification that his application for the auctioneering contract had been approved.

The maximum sentence for each count of interfering with commerce by threats or violence is 20 years and a fine of $250,000, plus three years of supervised release.

Three Boston Police Officers Indicted As Result Of FBI Probe (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

BOSTON— Three Boston police officers arrested in Miami in July on federal drug charges were indicted Thursday on charges of conspiring to possess heroin and cocaine with intent to distribute, the U.S attorney's office announced.

Roberto Pulido, 41; Carlos Pizarro, 36; and Nelson Carrasquillo, 35, had gone to Florida, authorities said, to collect a $35,000 payment for protecting a Massachusetts shipment of cocaine that was part of an undercover FBI sting operation. At the meeting, prosecutors said, agents recorded the men agreeing to protect two more cocaine shipments totaling 100 kilograms and also to protect 5 kilograms of heroin.

The new indictment charges all three with one count of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 1 kilogram of heroine, and it charges all three with a count of attempting to aid and abet the possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. Pulido and Carrasquillo also were named in a second count on the attempting to aid and abet charge.

Pizarro and Carrasquillo have been ordered to home detention with electronic monitoring. Pulido was ordered held until trial. Authorities have identified him as the ringleader, allegedly also involved in a wide range of illegal activities from identity theft to trafficking in stolen goods.

Pulido's lawyer, Rudy Miller, has said that prosecutors have based much of their case against his client on the word of a witness he characterized as a "major drug dealer and a suspected murderer." He did not immediately return a message for comment Thursday.

Jeffrey A. Denner, a lawyer for Pizzaro, said Thursday night that he was pleased with the decision to allow his client to return home.

"We believe that Mr. Pizzaro deserves to be out on conditions as the judge ruled. We expect to now effectively defend him against the charges," Denner said.

Stephen Neyman, an attorney for Carrasquillo, had said his client should be released pending trial because of his good record as an officer and his ties to the community. He did not immediately return a message for comment Thursday night.

Pulido and Pizarro have been Boston police officers since 1996 and Carrasquillo since 1999.

The three each face a minimum sentence of 4 years and a maximum sentence of life in prison, and a $4 million fine on each charge.

2 Of 3 Indicted Cops Freed By Magistrate In Drug Smuggle Case (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet And O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, September 15, 2006

Three alleged crooked cops were suspended without pay by the Boston Police Department yesterday and two of them freed on bail after their indictments by a federal grand jury on drug conspiracy charges.

DOJ_NMG_0063341

Roberto Pulido, 41, Carlos Pizarro, 36, and Nelson Carrasquillo, 35, have been in custody since their arrests in Miami in July on charges they agreed to be hired muscle for a shipment of cocaine that turned out to be the bait in an undercover sting. But yesterday, U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Joyce London Alexander, unconvinced Pizarro and Carrasquillo are a flight risk or a threat to the public, set them free pending trial.

The two men return in disgrace to city streets where they once patrolled as respected cops.

Though the judge ruled they posed no threat to the public, the suspended officers' own safety is in question with the Boston Fire Department investigating two alleged fire bombings of Nelson Carrasquillo's Dorchester home.

Pulido, the alleged ringleader, was detained, in part, due to comments he made during the FBI's 2 -year investigation when - as first reported in the Herald - he said he would kill the children of anyone who betrayed him.

The three men were on paid leave until yesterday when the indictments were handed down.

"As soon as the Police Department learned they were indicted, the commissioner moved to change their status to suspended without pay immediately," police spokeswoman Elaine Driscoll said of acting Police Commissioner Al Goslin's actions.

US Grand Jury Indicts 3 Boston Officers (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2006

BOSTON

A federal grand jury yesterday indicted three Boston police officers arrested on drug-trafficking charges. Roberto Pulido, 41; Carlos A. Pizarro, 36; and Nelson Carrasquillo, 35, all of Boston, were each indicted on one count of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 1 kilogram of heroin. Pulido and Carrasquillo were each indicted on a second count of attempting to aid and abet the possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. All three officers were indicted on a third count of attempting to aid and abet the possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. The officers, arrested in Miami in July, are accused of protecting large shipments of drugs into Boston. If convicted, each faces a maximum sentence of life in prison and a $4 million fine on each count. Already on administrative leave, they will be taken off the police payroll. US Magistrate Judge Joyce London Alexander ordered Pulido jailed without bail until the case is resolved and set conditions of release for the other two officers.

Appeals court backs transit station ruling The US Court of Appeals upheld yesterday a lower court's ruling that the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority and the Federal Transit Administration did not act unlawfully when attempting to make Copley station accessible to the disabled. The ruling could be the final blow to the Back Bay preservationists who had sued both agencies, alleging that they violated historical preservation laws in planning changes around the station. Copley station is adjacent to the Boston Public Library and Old South Church, both of which are on the National Register of Historic Places. The two groups' only appeal is to the US Supreme Court.

Hyde Park man sought in fatal stabbing Police said yesterday they were seeking a Hyde Park man in the fatal stabbing in June of a father of two from Dorchester. They accused Michael Scott, 21, of killing James Green, 28, on June 12 on Washington Street near Melville Avenue in Dorchester. They described Scott as black, about 5 foot 5, and 135 pounds. Green's relatives could not be reached last night. Police asked anyone with information about Scott's location to call 617-343-4470 or 800-494-TIPS.

CAMBRIDGE

Jury selection started in shaken-baby case Jury selection began yesterday in the murder trial of a Framingham man charged in the 2004 shaken-baby death of his infant son, the Middlesex district attorney's office said. On Feb. 19, 2004, police responded to a call of an unresponsive baby, 2-month-old William Christian III. He was rushed to MetroWest Medical Center in Framingham, where doctors found multiple fractures and brain swelling. The next day, William Christian Jr., 23, was arrested and charged. The medical examiner attributed the death to shaken-baby syndrome and ruled it a homicide.

BOSTON

MBTA police unions protest TSA patrols Three unions representing MBTA Transit Police protested yesterday about federal Transportation Security Administration teams monitoring key T hubs to Logan International Airport, stating in a press release that they oppose working with TSA employees ``because of safety, supervisory and legal issues." This month, a TSA team has been monitoring passengers at South Station, the Silver Line, and the Blue Line's Airport station. The unions said the program ``deceives the public" by insinuating that TSA employees are police officers. TSA spokeswoman Ann Davis said TSA personnel are not purporting to be law enforcement officers.

DOJ_NMG_0063342

Man found dead on North Station stairs MBTA Transit Police are investigating the death of a 40-year-old man found yesterday morning on an exit-only stairway at North Station, officials said. Police said there were no signs of foul play. The medical examiner will determine the cause of death.

Mass. to grant $38m to health facilities Hospitals and community health centers across Massachusetts will share $38 million in grants next month, state Health and Human Services Secretary Timothy R. Murphy announced yesterday. Acute-care hospitals will receive $28.8 million, and community health centers will share $8.2 million. The biggest grants include $4 million for Carney Hospital in Boston, $2 million for New England Medical Center in Boston, and $1.7 million for Brockton Hospital. The Franciscan Hospital for Children in Brighton will get $1 million for a psychiatric and rehabilitation unit and for dental services.

Former Chicago Patronage Chief Returns To Federal Grand Jury (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, September 15, 2006

CHICAGO - Mayor Richard M. Daley's former patronage chief made his second appearance before a federal grand jury in three weeks Thursday as prosecutors pushed ahead with an investigation of City Hall.

Robert Sorich, the former No. 2 man in the mayor's office of intergovernmental affairs, first appeared before the grand jury Aug. 24.

Sorich, 43, returned for another session Thursday, said his attorney, Thomas Anthony Durkin.

"He will appear every time he is subpoenaed and he will answer all of the questions put to him and that is all I'm going to say," Durkin said.

Sorich was one of three former officials convicted by a federal court jury July 6 in what prosecutors called a scheme to use fraud to cover up the fact that they were loading the city payroll with campaign workers.

Sentencing is set for Nov. 15.

U.S. attorney's office spokesman Randall Samborn declined to comment on Sorich's latest grand jury appearance.

At Sorich's trial before U.S. District Judge David H. Coar, witnesses portrayed the office of intergovernmental affairs as the nerve center that ran Daley's political operation. The mayor has been accused of no wrongdoing.

Witnesses said Sorich decided who got city jobs and regularly favored members of "political armies" based in city departments and available for deployment throughout the community to get out the vote on Election Day.

They testified that Sorich, himself, assigned precinct workers to various sections of the city to help Daley and other candidates whose campaigns had the mayor's blessing.

While Sorich had the title of deputy director of the office of intergovernmental relations, he was known as the mayor's patronage chief.

Political patronage is an old Chicago tradition in which the election winners - often stalwarts of the fabled Chicago Democratic Machine - get the city jobs. It was largely prohibited by court order in 1973, but various investigators have found compliance has been spotty at best.

Most recently, U.S. District Judge Wayne R. Andersen appointed a monitor to assure that the order, known as the Shakman Decree, is obeyed.

In appearing before the grand jury, Sorich had immunity from prosecution for anything he might admit, as long as it was the truth.

It is not unusual for prosecutors to call those convicted in corruption cases before the grand jury to "compel" their testimony by granting them immunity and questioning them on pain of perjury for lying.

DOJ_NMG_0063343

Former Gov. George Ryan's former inspector general, Dean Bauer, was called before a grand jury after pleading guilty to obstruction of justice and admitting he covered up seven years of Statehouse scandals while he was supposed to be uncovering them. But it was not clear that anything came of Bauer's testimony.

The City Hall investigation was launched as an inquiry into payoffs to officials from the operators of trucking companies in exchange for work in Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

It evolved into an investigation of hiring fraud, focusing on the office of intergovernmental affairs.

Manhattan: Closing Arguments In Gotti Trial (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Closing arguments began yesterday in Federal District Court in the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti, with prosecutors saying that Mr. Gotti's claim that he quit the Gambino crime family in 1999 was no more than a scheme to avoid a long prison sentence. Miriam E. Rocah, a federal prosecutor, said that Mr. Gotti, left, devised the plan while in federal prison from 1999 to 2004 on unrelated racketeering charges. Mr. Gotti's defense is that he retired from the Mafia before mid-July 1999, a time frame that would protect him from prosecution because of the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges. But the government contends that Mr. Gotti had known that his prison conversations with visitors at Ray Brook federal penitentiary were being recorded, and that was why Mr. Gotti told people that he wanted to leave "the life" behind him.

Gotti's Defense Attacked (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2006

John A. Gotti spent a lifetime rising to the top of the Gambino crime family and the proof was "overwhelming" that he reaped millions of dollars through a murderous racketeering conspiracy that pillaged city businesses, a federal prosecutor said yesterday.

In her closing argument to a Manhattan federal court jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam Rocah said Gotti, the son of the late Gambino boss John Gotti and known as "Junior," had raised a disingenuous defense that he had withdrawn from a life of crime that had paid him so well.

"It just doesn't make any sense and you should reject it," Rocah said of Gotti's withdrawal defense.

The 42-year-old Gotti is on trial for the third time on racketeering charges stemming from his role in the Gambino crime family. The first two trials ended in mistrials. In the current case, prosecutors contend that Gotti, of Oyster Bay, took part in loan-sharking, money laundering and extortion.

The indictment also accused him of plotting the 1992 abduction of radio talk-show host and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa, an incident that led to Sliwa being seriously wounded by gunfire.

Though Gotti isn't charged with murders, Rocah said that the underlying Gambino crime family enterprise policed its rackets with killings. She reminded the jury that one witness had stated that Gotti had plotted to kill two crime family members he believed were stealing construction money kickbacks. That murder plot was shelved when the intended victims showed up with longtime Gambino associate Joseph Watts, who told Gotti his father wanted the two men to keep the cash, Rocah said.

Gotti's main defense is that he had withdrawn from a role in the Gambino crime family by July 21, 1999, five years before he was indicted in July 2004. That date is crucial because it could put the case beyond the statute of limitations.

Rocah tried to belittle the withdrawal defense, saying Gotti was deeply involved in some of the crimes.

"Proof of John Gotti Junior's participation in the charged crimes is overwhelming," said Rocah, as she delivered her summation facing the jury from a lectern.

Rocah said mob turncoats like Michael DiLeonardo told of how he personally paid millions of dollars to Gotti in construction payoffs. Gotti lived a life of luxury with a big home in Long Island that required lots of cash, Rocah observed.

"How does someone who hasn't held a 9-to-5 job in his life get all this money?" Rocah asked rhetorically.

DOJ_NMG_0063344

The answer, she said, was through a life of crime. While to many people a cash-flow problem means not having enough money, in Gotti's case it meant trying to find ways to legitimize the illicit cash he had, she said. The prosecution summation continues today.

Prosecutor Tells Jurors Not To Fall For Gotti's `charade' (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- John "Junior" Gotti made millions of dollars leading the Gambino crime family for nearly a decade before claiming he'd quit the mob so he could keep the money and dodge prison, a prosecutor said in her closing argument Thursday at his racketeering trial.

"Before he had ever been charged with a crime, Gotti was planting the lies that would one day be used in a courtroom like this one," Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam E. Rocah told jurors at Gotti's third trial on the charge in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

Two earlier trials in the last year ended with deadlocked juries.

Rocah dismissed statements Gotti made in prison conversations in which he claimed he had quit the mob and wanted to move to Canada to start a new life. She said it was part of "a charade contrived by Gotti to get himself off the hook."

The statements at the start of closing arguments, which were to continue Friday, illustrated the government's strategy to prove Gotti continued to benefit from Gambino family crimes well after he claimed to have quit the mob before July 1999.

Defense lawyers convinced a majority of jurors at a trial that ended with a hung jury in the spring that Gotti had quit the mob and could not be held accountable for crimes that came to light more than five years after he left his old life.

The government countered that argument at the retrial that began last month by producing new evidence about the actions and statements by Gotti after he pleaded guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 and served a six-year prison sentence.

Rocah said Gotti in the 1999 plea admitted only a few isolated crimes before his best friend began cooperating with the government three years later, detailing a long history of Gotti's supervision of extortion, loansharking, gambling and fraud.

She said Gotti also ordered two 1992 attacks on radio show host and Guardian Angels crimefighting group founder Curtis Sliwa in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air criticisms of his father, John Gotti, who was sentenced to life in prison in 1992 for a racketeering conviction.

The elder Gotti died in prison a decade later. Sliwa recovered from gunshot wounds to resume his radio attacks against the mob.

The prosecutor said the younger Gotti, who has denied ordering the Sliwa attacks, was careful not to get too close to most crimes, relying on associates and soldiers to carry them out.

"He never got his hands too dirty," she said.

In fact, Rocah said, Gotti operated like the chief executive officer of a corporation, "raking in millions of dollars in the 1990s."

She added: "Throughout the 1990s, John Gotti's business was crime, and business was good."

Rocah said Gotti developed a strategy to claim he had quit the mob after an uncle told him in prison that he was being demoted from his leadership role in the Gambino crime family and after he learned that his best friend was cooperating with the government.

"The proof of this defendant's guilt is overwhelming," she said.

The closings began a day after Judge Shira Scheindlin tossed out two new racketeering charges the government brought to try to prove Gotti continued committing crimes after he claimed to have quit the mob.

Gotti's lawyers were scheduled to present their closing argument Friday.

If convicted, Gotti, 42, could face up to 30 years in prison.

JUNIOR'S RETIREMENT 'CHARADE' (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063345

Federal prosecutors yesterday took aim at John "Junior" Gotti's claims that he left the Mafia - arguing that prison tapes expose the mob scion's retirement as an elaborately contrived charade.

"Gotti hatched a plan to . . . plant the seed that [he] was out of the mob life," Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam Rocah told a Manhattan federal jury in closing arguments.

"Before he was even charged with a crime, Gotti was planting the lies that would some day be used in a courtroom like this one."

Gotti claims he left the mob in 1999 and can't be prosecuted for racketeering because the five-year statute of limitations has expired.

In wrapping up the defense case, attorney Charles Carnesi tried to cast doubt on the feds' interpretation of a key videotape in the case.

Prosecutors had claimed that Junior's "Dapper Don" dad, John Gotti Sr., was captured on tape a year before his death announcing he was passing the crime-family reins to his brother Peter and three others, including Junior.

The defense insisted the tape simply referred to Junior and two other mobsters copping guilty pleas.

Alleged Galante Ally Pleads Guilty In New York Case (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

'Matty the Horse' admits he helped infiltrate labor union

NEW YORK (AP) – Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello, an ailing 86-year-old longtime capo in the Genovese crime family who had ties to Danbury garbage kingpin James Galante, pleaded guilty Thursday to a racketeering charge, admitting he helped infiltrate a union and interfere with a federal grand jury probe.

Ianniello, his wooden cane hanging on a chair beside him, entered the plea before U.S Magistrate Judge Ronald L. Ellis in Manhattan.

A plea agreement signed with the government called for Ianniello to be sentenced to between 1½ and two years in prison. Without the deal, Ianniello would have faced up to 20 years in prison. Sentencing was set for Dec. 14.

He also agreed to forfeit up to $1 million to the government.

Ianniello was indicted in June along with Galante and 27 others in a broad federal racketeering case that involved the garbage industry.

He was a longtime capo who allegedly became one of the family's acting bosses following the 1997 racketeering conviction of Vincent "The Chin" Gigante.

Gigante died in prison at age 77 last December. Long before that, he was dubbed the "Oddfather" for his bizarre behavior, including wandering the streets of Greenwich Village in nightclothes, muttering incoherently.

Ianniello, who lives on Long Island, is free on bail.

In court, Ianniello was difficult to understand as he read a statement admitting his role in efforts to corrupt a union and to prevent the union's leaders and employees from being honest with the government during a federal grand jury probe of mob activities.

Ianniello's lawyer said his client's voice was affected by a stroke.

Ianniello entered his plea to a single count of racketeering, admitting that he received unlawful payments from a labor union and that he conspired to obstruct justice.

Ianniello said he committed the crimes between 1990 and 2005.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy J. Treanor told Ellis that Ianniello participated in a conspiracy in which some union officers lied to federal investigators about various things, including the involvement of organized crime in union business.

Aryan Brotherhood Jury Deadlocks On Death Penalty Verdict (AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063346

Santa Ana, Calif. (AP) -- A federal jury has failed to reach a verdict in the death penalty phase of the trial of two Aryan Brotherhood leaders convicted in July of murder, racketeering and conspiracy, the jurors announced Thursday in a note to the judge.

The same jurors convicted Barry "The Baron" Mills and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham in July. Jurors were then asked, in a separate proceeding, to determine whether Mills, 58, and Bingham, 59 should be sentenced to death or life in prison without possibility of parole.

After jurors indicated they were deadlocked, defense attorneys asked U.S. District Judge David O. Carter to declare a mistrial, which would result in Mills and Bingham serving life sentences without parole. Prosecutors asked that the judge consider ordering the jurors to resume deliberations and try to break the deadlock.

Carter did not immediately issue a ruling.

Jurors had deliberated for five days in the death penalty phase of the trial.

The case against Mills and Bingham was part of a larger indictment that federal prosecutors hope will dismantle the violent white supremacist which is accused of running powerful gambling operations and drug rings from inside some of the nation's most notorious prisons.

Experts say the full indictment, which lists 32 murders and attempted murders, makes up one of the largest federal capital punishment cases in U.S. history, with more than a dozen people potentially facing execution. More defendants go on trial in Los Angeles later this year.

Mills and Bingham were convicted under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law, and of offenses known as Violent Crime in Aid of Racketeering — laws originally passed to target the Mafia. The so-called VICAR verdicts, which involved the killings of two black inmates in 1997, made Mills and Bingham eligible for the death penalty.

The two were convicted of inciting a race riot at a prison in Lewisburg, Pa., by conspiring to send a secret message to Aryan Brotherhood members. Frank Joyner and Abdul Salaam, alleged members of the DC Blacks prison gang, were killed during the riot.

Government witnesses testified about a secret note, written in invisible ink made from urine, that was passed from Bingham's high-security cell in Florence, Colo., to Lewisburg. The note read: "War with DC Blacks, TD."

While prosecutors argued at trial that it was an order to incite a race war at the Pennsylvania facility, defense attorneys said the note was merely a warning to other gang members after tensions flared between the brotherhood and the D.C. Blacks at a prison in Marion, Ill.

The guilt phase of the trial exposed some of the brotherhood's long-kept secrets, including how members communicate from behind bars and between prisons that are thousands of miles apart.

Some witnesses testified about a plot to kill an inmate who had assaulted the late mob leader John Gotti in prison. Testimony indicated that Gotti, head of the Gambino crime family, had paid the brotherhood for protection.

One witness said Gotti offered to pay $500,000 for the hit; another testified that he had been passed bullets to hide until the gang could fashion a zip gun with which to shoot Gotti's attacker. The hit never occurred, and Gotti died of cancer in prison in 2002.

Mills and Bingham were also convicted of a count of murder for the killing of Arva Lee Ray, a prisoner slain at the Lompoc, Calif., penitentiary in 1989. They also were convicted of counts of racketeering that included acts of murder and attempted murder.

Mills is currently serving two life terms for murder after nearly decapitating an inmate in 1979. Bingham is behind bars on robbery and drug charges and would have been released in 2010.

The two other men who went on trial with Mills and Bingham — Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson — will be sentenced to life in prison.

Banker Is Charged With Taking $6.1 Million (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063347

A former vice president of National Penn Bank was charged yesterday with embezzling $6.1 million from bank clients.

Edward G. Mawhinney, 36, of Sewell, allegedly opened lines of credit under customers' names while working at the Philadelphia branch. He was charged by information instead of grand jury indictment. An information is usually a precursor to a guilty plea.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, Mawhinney created fake documents and forged signatures and information on loan applications, loan agreements and tax returns.

"This was a planned, calculated, and well-executed violation of customer trust," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said.

Mawhinney could not be reached for comment. The bank made the case public last year. In a statement, the bank said: "We appreciate and look forward to justice prevailing through the courts and applaud the U.S. attorney and the FBI for their diligent work in this matter."

The company said its parent, National Penn Bancshares, has $5.23 billion in assets and operates 80 branches of National Penn Bank, FirstService Bank, HomeTowne Heritage Bank, and Nittany Bank.

N.J. Banker Charged With Stealing $6.2M (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 15, 2006

A former vice president of private banking at National Penn Bank was charged yesterday by federal prosecutors with stealing and diverting almost $6.2 million of bank funds from 1998 to 2004.

Prosecutors filed the charges against Edward G. Mawhinney, 36, through a criminal information, a process indicating that Mawhinney will plead guilty.

According to prosecutors, Mawhinney, of Sewell, N.J., was responsible for opening loans and lines of credit for customers and managing the accounts.

The charging papers said Mawhinney fraudulently opened lines of credit under the names of existing bank customers without their knowledge and consent.

He did it by forging customer signatures and information on loan applications and federal tax returns. Authorities charged that he also created bogus documents to make the lines of credit appear legitimate.

Then, Mawhinney stole money from these lines of credit to pay his own debts and buy his home, prosecutors said.

He also gave money to benefit third parties without the bank's knowledge or approval. The third parties either got loans that had not been approved by the bank or had delinquent loans paid down or paid off completely.

Mawhinney is also charged with embezzling almost $699,000 from 2001 to December 2004 that was entrusted to the safe-keeping of the bank.

"This was a planned, calculated and well-executed violation of customer trust," said U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan. "He forged signatures, created phony documents and took $6 million of the bank's money for himself and others."

A spokeswoman for National Penn Bank's holding company said Maw-hinney no longer works at the bank.

National Penn Bancshares has more than $5.2 billion in assets and operates 80 branch offices in Pennsylvania, most of them in the Philadelphia region.

The bank issued a statement yesterday saying they had reached a settlement in November in which some individuals involved in the fraud paid $3.5 million to National Penn.

National Penn said its insurer would put up more than $2.7 million to settle a claim the bank filed regarding the loan fraud. About half that sum already has been paid with the remainder due next month.

Thomas Bergstrom, Mawhinney's attorney, was unavailable for comment yesterday.

Former Company President Admits Stock Fraud Plot (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2006

CAMDEN, N.J. -- The former president of eContent Inc. pleaded guilty Friday, admitting that he and other officers and directors misused company funds for personal expenses.

DOJ_NMG_0063348

John P. Sgarlat is the second person to plead guilty in connection with wrongdoing at the company, and the investigation is continuing, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric M. Schweiker.

Sgarlat, 55, of Harvey's Lake, Pa., and Wellington, Fla., also admitted to several schemes, including one in which he improperly issued stock.

Under his plea deal, Sgarlat agreed to pay restitution, in amounts to be determined. He also agreed to forfeit to the government at least $320,000, as well as a vehicle, certain artwork and an autographed Tiger Woods caddie coverall from the 2001 Masters golf tournament. The vehicle, artwork and coverall have all been seized by the FBI.

Sgarlat remains under house arrest pending sentencing next year. He has been under house arrest since his arrest by FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents in February, federal prosecutors said.

The company had been based in Florida while Sgarlat was president in the late 1990s and early 2000s. He was president until April 2001.

He pleaded guilty to two charges: conspiring to commit securities and wire fraud, which carries up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, or twice the gain from the scheme; and a count of money laundering, which carries up to 20 years in prison and a fine up to $500,000 or twice the value of the transactions.

___P>

On the Net:

U.S. Attorney's Office: http://www.usdoj.gov/usao/nj/press/

British Gambling Exec Resigns, Judge Rules He's Free To Leave NY (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - The chairman of British online gambling company Sportingbet PLC, who was arrested last week after New York customs officials discovered his name on a Louisiana warrant charging him with illegal online gambling, resigned on Thursday, the company said.

"Further to its recent announcements regarding Mr. Peter Dicks, Sportingbet confirms that, with great reluctance ... the Board accepted the resignation of Mr. Dicks as Independent Non-executive Chairman of Sportingbet with immediate effect," the company said in a statement posted on its Web site.

Dicks appeared in state Criminal Court in Queens on Thursday, when Judge Gene Lopez adjourned his case until Sept. 28.

The court appearance came a day after New York Gov. George Pataki received a formal request from Dicks and his attorney, Barry Slotnick, to withdraw a warrant the governor had signed that would allow Dicks' extradition to Louisiana.

Slotnick said he and his client argued that Louisiana's request for extradition "is inappropriate and that Peter Dicks has not committed any crimes there or anywhere. He hasn't been in Louisiana for 20 years."

On Thursday in court, Dicks was informed that the governor had withdrawn the warrant. Restrictions on Dicks' $50,000 bail that barred him from leaving New York also were lifted.

"There is nothing pending in terms of any accusations against Dicks in the state of New York," Slotnick told The Associated Press, adding that Dicks was now free to travel back to London, where he lives.

A Pataki spokeswoman, Jessica Scaperotti, said the governor's decision was made in consultation with prosecutors in Louisiana and New York. "The decision was made to withdraw the extra warrant pending legal review of the arguments raised by Mr. Dick's attorneys," she said.

When he's back in court later this month, Slotnick said, "it's our hope that the (Louisiana) warrant at that time will be totally withdrawn."

Slotnick said Dicks is appearing in court New York on Sept. 28 only "because Louisiana is requesting his presence. But the only one who can order him to Louisiana is Gov. Pataki."

Dicks was arrested at New York's Kennedy International Airport on Sept. 6 following his arrival on a flight from England. Customs, performing a routine name check, discovered he had an outstanding warrant issued by the Louisiana State Police Gaming Enforcement Division.

DOJ_NMG_0063349

Last Friday, after his New York arrest, acting Justice John Latella released him on $50,000 bail but ordered him to surrender his passport and stay in the New York metropolitan area during the extradition process.

The Louisiana warrant was issued in May, charging Dicks with gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a $25,000 fine.

Louisiana authorities want to bring Dicks back to stand trial in St. Landry Parish, where the warrant for his arrest was signed.

Dicks, 64, is the second executive of a British Internet sports-betting company to be held in the U.S.

David Carruthers, former chief executive officer of BetOnSports PLC, was arrested in July. The company fired Carruthers, who remains under house arrest in the St. Louis area awaiting trial, and closed its U.S. Web sites.

The founder of Abingdon PLC, a private equity firm, Dicks is also a director at Nasdaq-listed Polar Technology Trust PLC and Standard Microsystems Corp. He has been non-executive director at Sportingbet since 2000.

Sportingbet shares soared more than 25 percent to close at 192 pence ($3.60) on the London Stock Exchange. The stock had fallen sharply after Dicks was detained.

Sportingbet Chairman Dicks Resigns After Detention (Update4) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 15, 2006

By Dan Weeks

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Peter Dicks, arrested in New York last week on charges of illegal computer gambling, resigned as chairman of the Internet bookmaker Sportingbet Plc.

Sportingbet's shares surged 25 percent today, the most in four years, on speculation that the resignation makes the London-based company more likely to stay in business.

Dicks was the second manager of a U.K. Web gaming company to be ensnared in a government crackdown after the July arrest of David Carruthers, at the time the chief executive officer of Betonsports Plc. Betonsports was barred from doing business in the U.S., where officials say online wagering sites may launder money and lack safeguards for minors and gambling addicts.

``This is hot money betting that this issue has bottomed out," said Mark Reed, managing director of Teather & Greenwood, a London-based brokerage.

Shares of Sportingbet closed 39 pence higher at 192 pence in London. The stock is still 20 percent below its last closing price before Dicks' detention was announced, and about 40 percent below its close on July 14, the last session before Betonsports said Carruthers had been held.

Separately, a New York state judge postponed consideration of a request by Louisiana state police to extradite Dicks to that state on illegal computer gambling charges.

`Great Reluctance'

New York Governor George Pataki's warrant for Dicks' extradition was ``withdrawn for further investigation," said Nicole Navas, a spokeswoman for Queens District Attorney Richard Brown. The original Louisiana warrant for Dicks remains in effect.

The resignation was accepted with ``great reluctance," the company said in a Regulatory News Service statement. Sportingbet said it will replace Dicks in ``due course."

His departure ``helps the company, as it may find a replacement with a new strategy and fewer personal problems," said Ian Murrell, a trader at Wills & Co. in London.

Dicks, a 64-year-old Briton who also is chairman of London- based Daniel Stewart Securities Plc, was arrested Sept. 6 at New York's John F. Kennedy International airport after getting off a flight from London.

He was released on bail two days later and returned to Queens Criminal Court today for an extradition hearing in Kew Gardens, New York. Judge Gene Lopez set a new hearing date of Sept. 28 and gave Dicks permission to leave the country in the meantime.

Dicks, who received his passport and driver's license back from New York authorities, declined to comment on his charges or extradition. His lawyers, Peter Neiman and Barry Slotnick, also declined to comment.

888 Resignation

DOJ_NMG_0063350

``He's appeared, he will appear," Slotnick told the judge at the hearing before Lopez ruled, referring to his client.

The chief executive officer of 888 Holdings Plc, another U.K. online-gaming company, also said he will step down today. John Anderson will be replaced by Gigi Levy, 888's chief operating officer, at the end of the year.

``We are closely monitoring the progress of the recent enforcement actions in the U.S.," 888 said today in a statement. ``888 has no involvement" in sports betting, it said.

Shares of 888, the world's largest online casino, added 2.4 percent to 150 pence in London. PartyGaming Plc, the world's biggest Internet-poker company, advanced 4.3 percent to 110.25 pence, its biggest percentage gain in almost a month.

``These stocks have gotten destroyed and they are still huge cash flow businesses," said Darren Chervitz, research director at New York-based Jacob Asset Management, which invests in Internet companies. ``Someone may be saying this is the time to take a chance."

Venture Capitalist

Sportingbet, which first sold shares to investors in January 2001, accepted almost 150 million sports and gaming wagers in the fiscal third quarter that ended April 30. About four-fifths of clients are American.

Dicks joined Sportingbet as non-executive chairman in 2000, according to the company's Web site. He co-founded venture- capital firm Abingworth Plc and is a director of companies in the U.S. and U.K., including Polar Capital Technology Trust. He also is chairman of Private Equity Investor Plc, a London company that invests in computer and Internet companies.

To contact the reporter on this story: Dan Weeks in London at dweeks1@bloomberg.net

Ex-Prosecutor's Bribery Trial Begins (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

(AP) - DETROIT-A lawyer for a former chief prosecutor accused of helping a convicted rapist get a new trial in exchange for campaign contributions tried to cast him as an ethical man as his trial began Wednesday.

But prosecutors said Carl Marlinga let his political ambitions interfere with the pursuit of justice.

Marlinga's duty "was overcome by a desperate need for money - not to line his own pockets, but to fuel his political ambitions," Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares said in his opening statement to the jury.

Marlinga, the former Macomb County chief prosecutor, is charged with bribery, wire fraud, making false statements to the Federal Election Commission and violating federal campaign finance laws. The charges stem from the 59-year-old's failed 2002 bid for Congress.

If convicted, he could face up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Prosecutors say that Marlinga filed a motion with the Michigan Supreme Court that led to a new trial for Jeffrey Moldowan, who had been convicted in 1991 of kidnapping and raping his ex-girlfriend. Moldowan was acquitted at his new trial after spending more than 10 years behind bars.

They say he also accepted contributions in exchange for helping St. Clair Shores businessman James Hulet, accused of drugging and raping a teenage girl.

Hulet eventually pleaded guilty to assault with intent to commit criminal sexual conduct, a drug charge and a firearm charge, and was sentenced to two years in prison in January 2004.

Marlinga was not personally involved in the prosecution of Moldowan, which was handled by an assistant prosecutor. But he took an interest after being contacted by Ralph Roberts, a prominent businessman who employed Moldowan's sister, Cares said.

Marlinga filed his motion with the Supreme Court as he was approaching an important fundraising deadline in his congressional campaign. Around the same time, Roberts contributed the maximum $2,000 allowed. Later, Roberts gave another $1,600 in his wife's name, and Marlinga also expected Roberts to host fundraisers for him, Cares said.

Charges against Roberts were dropped last year.

Defense attorney Mark Kriger said Marlinga's interventions in the Moldowan case began before he decided to run for Congress and were motivated by a commitment to justice.

DOJ_NMG_0063351

"What he did in the Moldowan case, we as citizens should be very proud of," Kriger said.

The federal court trial is expected to last about two weeks. Marlinga spent two decades as chief law enforcement official of Michigan's third-largest county. Before his election to the post, he worked for a time as an assistant U.S. attorney in Detroit - part of the same office prosecuting him now.

Guard Pleads Guilty In Contraband Case (AP-Y)

By Bill Kaczor, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

One of five prison guards charged in a sex-for-contraband scandal that ended in a deadly shootout with federal agents pleaded guilty Thursday to conspiracy to commit mail fraud.

Alfred Barnes, 42, of Thomasville, Ga., agreed to cooperate in the prosecution of other defendants. In exchange, the government dropped charges including witness tampering, bribery and mail fraud.

The five men are accused of taking part in an alleged scheme in which guards reportedly paid female inmates for sex with alcohol, food, money and marijuana over a two-year period. The guards also were accused of intimidating inmates and witnesses to ensure their silence.

Authorities said prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution on June 21 and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and the other defendants.

Hill and Justice Department special agent William "Buddy" Sentner were killed. A prison employee assisting in the arrests was wounded. None of the surviving guards were charged in connection with the shooting.

Barnes testified that families of three female inmates mailed money orders to him and he provided them with cosmetics, jewelry, cigarettes and other tobacco products that he smuggled into the prison. He said he had sexual relationships with two of the women, and "basically just a money relationship" with the third.

Another guard, Vincent Johnson, also pleaded guilty Sept. 6 to conspiring to commit mail fraud in a similar deal with prosecutors. Johnson was not accused of having sex with inmates. Instead, coerced inmates to keep quiet about the scheme and to not cooperate with investigators, according to a statement of fact he signed.

Barnes and Johnson each could face a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and $250,000 fine. Johnson's sentencing is set for Nov. 17 and Barnes' for Dec. 14.

Trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 30 for the other three guards, Gregory Dixon, Alan Moore and E. Lavon Spence.

Feds Lower Boom On Alternative Money (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh, Usa Today

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The government Thursday warned consumers and businesses that it is illegal to use alternative money known as "Liberty Dollar" coins, which organizers promote as a competitor to the almighty dollar.

"We don't want consumers to be fooled," U.S. Mint spokeswoman Becky Bailey says, noting U.S. Attorneys offices across the USA have noticed a marked increase in inquiries about the coins.

The coins' producers vowed to fight the government's decision.

Evansville, Ind.-based National Organization for the Repeal of the Federal Reserve Act and the Internal Revenue Code, otherwise known as NORFED, has been making the Liberty Dollar coins for eight years and claims $20 million is in circulation. The group says the money, unlike official U.S. cash, has a hedge against inflation because it is made almost entirely of silver and is backed by stocks of silver and gold in a vault in Idaho.

The coins are then spent by the group's 2,500 Liberty Associates in stores run by fellow supporters or are accepted unknowingly by clerks who are unaware they are not receiving real money.

The Justice Department has determined that use of Liberty Dollars, which come in varying denominations, "is a crime," according to the Mint, which issued a rare public warning Thursday.

"The United States Mint is the only entity that can produce coins," Bailey says.

DOJ_NMG_0063352

The Mint notes the coins share some resemblances to real money, such as the term "Trust in God" instead of "In God We Trust" and use of a torch in the design. Such similarities may confuse people into thinking the money is real, the Mint says.

But NORFED says it will challenge the government, arguing it has never claimed Liberty Dollars were official money and that it has a right to offer an alternative.

"The designs and verbiage ... are original and are not copies of any U.S. Mint currency," NORFED Executive Director Michael Johnson said in a statement.

It's unclear how many people or businesses are unknowingly holding Liberty Dollars, which cannot be exchanged for real money at banks.

In a case in Buffalo, a man and his son are set to go on trial next month after they knowingly tried to buy beer at a Buffalo Sabres hockey game with Liberty Dollars.

The Mint did not say if government officials will seek to prosecute individuals or NORFED after its warning.

Reed Runk, part-owner of Kendall Funk & Bismark Jewelers in Chambersburg, Pa., says the store has been accepting Liberty Dollars for about a year and has sold a few as well. Runk says the store will continue to accept and sell the coins.

"We just feel that they are something that educates people as to what the monetary systems are like in the world, that they are a fiat system, that if people lose faith in them, they will collapse," he says. Besides, "They are a good-looking coin."

Bond Denied For Litchfield Man Accused Of Producing Child Porn (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. - A federal judge denied bond Thursday for a 65-year-old man accused of creating sexual images of children in a photo studio above a hair salon.

Paul Kincaid, who is charged with possessing child pornography and producing it near his home in Litchfield, will remain in the custody of U.S. marshals pending trail, said Sharon Paul, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield.

"The judge found that he presented a danger to the community," Paul said.

Prosecutors accuse Kincaid of using a Polaroid camera to create sexual images of minors in a makeshift photo studio above a hair salon near his home.

Kincaid's attorney, Jon Gray Noll, said after the judge's ruling that it's too early to say how his client might eventually plea.

"We have to see the pretrial discovery, we have to see how the evidence was obtained," he said. "I've had a lot tougher cases that we've won."

Authorities said they seized hundred of images of child pornography, including photo albums, from Kincaid's home, which is located about 50 miles south of Springfield.

A criminal complaint charges Kincaid with possession and production of child pornography on or about September 2004. Authorities did not release the ages or otherwise identify the alleged victims.

Kincaid was arrested at his home Sept. 6.

A conviction on a charge of producing child pornography carries a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison. The possession charge carries a penalty of up to 10 years, authorities said.

Elderly Women Plead Not Guilty In Los Angeles Hit-run Transient Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

By Andrew Glazer, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A pair of elderly women charged with murdering two transient men and illegally collecting millions from their life insurance policies have pleaded not guilty.

Helen Golay, 75, and Hungarian-born Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, each face two counts of murder and two counts of conspiracy to commit murder for financial gain in the deaths of Paul Vados, 73, a Hungarian native, in November 1999, and Kenneth McDavid, 51, in June 2005. The women are being held without bail as long as prosecutors consider a death sentence for them.

Authorities alleged that Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, convinced the men to sign them on to their life insurance policies and then collected some $2.3 million (â,¬1.8 million) after running them over in secluded alleys.

Superior Court Commissioner James Bianco on Wednesday denied Golay's request to be allowed to have mascara and tweezers to pluck her eyebrows, to wear her own clothes and to be awakened no earlier than 7 a.m. on court days.

"I certainly understand the difficulties of confinement," but sheriffs need time to bring her from her jail in surburan Lynwood to the downtown Los Angles courtroom, Bianco said.

Rutterschmidt's attorney, Michael Sklar, challenged the legality of conspiracy charges against her, but Bianco ruled that the charges could stand. Sklar also said he had not yet received evidence from the state.

Bianco ordered the district attorney's office to provide him with discovery by Sept. 22. Bianco also scheduled a next court hearing for Oct. 5, when a date for preliminary hearings would be set.

Federal authorities arrested the two women in May and charged them with mail fraud in connection with the insurance scheme while the murder investigation progressed.

Former Ramsey Suspect Appears In California Court (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, September 15, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif. — John Mark Karr, briefly a suspect in JonBenét Ramsey's murder, was back in court here Thursday for the first time since he jumped bail five years ago to avoid child pornography charges.

Karr's chief lawyer, Robert Amparan, said the 41-year-old former teacher will fight the misdemeanor charges and has no plans to cut a deal with prosecutors involving a guilty plea in exchange for a sentence of time served and probation.

Karr, unshackled in a blue jailhouse jumpsuit, sat passively as lawyers debated whether cameras should be allowed at his trial on five counts of possessing pornography, brought when investigators allegedly found illicit images on his computer.

Defense lawyer Gayle Gutekunst argued that a simple misdemeanor case had “exploded into a media event” that could make it hard to find impartial jurors.

“The court can put the skids on this and help return the case to what it was in 2001,” Gutekunst said.

Judge Cerena Wong rejected TV cameras but said she'd permit one still photography camera. Wong said Karr's trial would begin Oct. 2 but scheduled a hearing to resolve a dispute over whether prosecutors can seek a delay. Karr will get a bail hearing Tuesday.

Authorities here regained custody of Karr this week after the Boulder, Colo., district attorney said Karr no longer was a suspect in Ramsey's December 1996 death because DNA tests failed to put him at the crime scene.

Karr was arrested in Thailand on Aug. 16 after he made phone calls and wrote e-mails claiming to have killed the 6-year-old child beauty queen.

He was brought to Colorado, even though his ex-wife, the mother of his three sons, said he couldn't have killed Ramsey because he was in Georgia that Christmas with his family.

If convicted of the child pornography charges here, Karr could face a maximum of a year in jail on each count, although first-time offenders rarely get a sentence that severe, says David LaBahn, executive director of the California District Attorneys Association. A typical sentence in a case like Karr's is six months, LaBahn says.

Karr already has been in custody seven months — six months in 2001 before he made bail and a month since his Thailand arrest. California defendants get an additional day for every three days of jail time, so he has more than nine months to his credit now.

Once free after a conviction, he would be in a statewide law-enforcement database of sex offenders but not on the public registry created under California's Megan's Law. Only felony offenders appear on that list.

Asked why Karr fled, Amparan noted that he had lost his job and his family after his wife filed for divorce and obtained a restraining order prohibiting contact with her or their children.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Department Closes Investigation Into Teenager's Death (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

Annapolis (AP) - The Justice Department has ended an investigation into the death of a black teenager at a party in Anne Arundel County.

Seventeen-year-old Noah Jamahl Jones was killed in the summer of 2004 in an altercation that involved six white men in Pasadena.

The Justice Department began its investigation after allegations were made that Jones' death might have resulted from a racially motivated attack. But it said Thursday that there is insufficient evidence to pursue criminal civil rights charges.

One of the men was acquitted in state court last year of voluntary manslaughter.

Missouri: Voter ID Law Is Struck Down (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

A judge struck down the state's new voter identification law as an unconstitutional infringement on the right to vote. The law required voters to show a federal or Missouri-issued photo ID at the polls. The judge, Richard Callahan of Cole County Circuit Court, said that was an unconstitutional burden on voters because the paperwork required to get those ID's was not free. In Georgia, a federal judge blocked that state from enforcing its voter identification law during local special elections next week. Georgia's law requires voters show a valid form of government-issued identification.

Judge Strikes Down Mo. Voter ID Law (AP-Y)

By Kelly Wiese

AP, September 15, 2006

A judge struck down Missouri's new voter identification law Thursday as an unconstitutional infringement on the right to vote.

The law required voters to show a federal or Missouri-issued photo ID at the polls, which Cole County Circuit Judge Richard Callahan said was an unconstitutional burden on voters because the paperwork required to get those IDs is not free.

The right to vote is "a right and not a license," the judge wrote.

Callahan said the requirement is a particular burden to women, the poor, the undereducated and the elderly. Missouri law requires those getting or renewing a driver's license to show they are lawfully in the country, generally with a birth certificate or passport.

Those whose name has changed, such as some married women, also must provide documents showing those changes. And some people may not have the knowledge of how to navigate bureaucracy to obtain a license, he said.

Supporters of voter ID laws say they are needed to protect against voter fraud.

Gov. Matt Blunt, a Republican who backed the law, decried the decision.

"This is a constitutionally sound law that will help improve Missourians' confidence in the elections process and help combat those who attempt to manipulate the system," he said in a written statement.

Secretary of State Robin Carnahan, a Democrat who has been critical of the law, praised the decision.

"This ruling affirms my concern that the law clearly jeopardizes the constitutional voting rights of many Missourians," she said.

Also Thursday, a federal judge in Georgia blocked the state from enforcing its voter identification law during local special elections next week. Georgia's law requires voters show a valid form of government-issued identification, such as a passport or driver's license. If they don't have those, voters can also obtain a free voter ID card.

U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy said that few have obtained identification cards, even though officials know thousands don't have them.

He did not block use of the law during November's general election, explaining that he would hear arguments on that issue later.

Pledge Challenger Newdow Claims Web Scribe Defamed Him (LAW)

DOJ_NMG_0063355

By Mike Mckee, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 15, 2006

Sacramento, Calif., atheist Michael Newdow took plenty of grief from conservative commentators two years ago when he tried unsuccessfully to get the words "under God" taken out of the Pledge of Allegiance.

But being called a liar in an online column was more than he could stand -- and a Northern California minister could pay the price.

This Monday, Newdow -- who's both a lawyer and an emergency room physician -- is scheduled to appear in San Francisco's 1st District Court of Appeal to argue that his libel suit against the Rev. Austin Miles should be allowed to proc eed.

Newdow claims that Miles -- a self-described "interdenominational chaplain" who writes conservative columns posted on the Internet -- defamed him by accusing him of committing perjury before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals during the pledge case. Specifically, Newdow claims Miles accused him, in posts on two news service sites, of telling the court his young daughter suffered emotional distress as the result of being forced to recite the pledge in her classroom. Newdow insists he never said that.

Instead, he says, he only argued that children, including his daughter, are unduly influenced when a state-run school leads them in a ritual proclaiming the existence of God.

"Had Miles done as any reasonable person would have done -- i.e., simply read the 9th Circuit's panel decision before writing his article," Newdow wrote in court papers, "he would have quickly appreciated that his 'view' ... was 100 percent wrong."

The 9th Circuit in 2002 agreed with Newdow's claim that the pledge, as recited in public schools, violated the First Amendment's establishment clause. But two years later, the U.S. Supreme Court tossed Newdow's suit, voting 5-3 that he didn't have standing to bring it in the first place.

Since then, Newdow has pursued the merits of his arguments by representing an unnamed "Roe" c lient in challenging the pledge again. That case is now pending before the 9th Circuit, as is a separate case of Newdow's challenging the inclusion of the words "In God We Trust" on American money.

In his case against Miles, Newdow won a $1 million default judgment in Superior Court in June 2004 after Miles failed to respond to the initial complaint. That judgment was later set aside, though, after the trial court found that Miles, through no fault of his own, had no actual notice of the suit.

Immediately thereafter, Miles filed a motion to strike Newdow's libel suit as an attempt to block free speech. Contra Costa County Superior Court Judge Steven Austin denied that motion last year.

On appeal, Miles' lawyers -- Edward White III, associate counsel at the Thomas More Law Center in Ann Arbor, Mich., and Stockton, Calif., attorney Mark Thiel -- contend their client has shown his online comments were protected speech involving an issue of public interest.

To overcome that presumption, they argue in court papers, Newdow -- as an admitted public figure -- would have to show by clear and convincing evidence that Miles acted with actual malice. White and Thiel contend Miles' comments were based on information from other sources that he believed were accurate.

"When all is said and done," the two argued, "the dispute here is one of semantics and not of malicious falsehood."

That's not what Newdow believes. He even accuses Miles of making up quotes purported to be Newdow's own words.

"This man has no compunction whatsoever about disseminating falsehoods and persisting in flouting the law," Newdow, who is representing himself, wrote in court documents. "His meaningless claim that Newdow must have said something, somewhere -- 'on an Internet site ... or during television interviews' -- that could be used to support his fabrication is nothing but drivel."

Newdow also argues his default judgment should be reinstated, contending Miles actively hid to avoid being served the suit. Newdow says he tried service by mail, made two attempts through a professional service company and hired a licensed private investigator, all to no avail.

"The court will see," he wrote, "that the only inference that can be drawn from the evidence in this case is that Miles sneered at our judicial system and intentionally avoided service."

Miles' lead lawyer, White, couldn't be reached for comment.

Newdow, contacted in his Sacramento office, said Monday he mainly wants to clear his name.

"I think many people think that what he wrote was true," he said. "I'd like to restore my reputation."

The case is Newdow v. Miles, A109660.

Navy Chaplain Guilty Of Disobeying An Order (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

A Navy court decided yesterday to reprimand and dock the pay of an evangelical Protestant chaplain after finding him guilty of disobeying an order by appearing in uniform at a political protest in front of the White House in March.

The chaplain, Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, said he intends to "appeal by all means possible all the way to the Supreme Court."

Klingenschmitt, 38, who belongs to a small evangelical offshoot of the Episcopal Church, has been a vocal critic of the Navy's policies on prayer in ceremonial settings. He has accused his superiors of pressuring chaplains to offer generic, nonsectarian prayers, and he has gained wide attention and sympathy among religious conservatives.

Over the past year, Klingenschmitt worked closely with Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.) and other members of Congress to push the Bush administration to issue an executive order guaranteeing the right of chaplains to pray "in the name of Jesus." So far, the White House has rebuffed the request.

On March 30, Klingenschmitt wore his uniform at a news conference in Lafayette Square in which former Alabama chief justice Roy S. Moore and others decried President Bush's lack of action on the chaplain's complaints. Klingenschmitt maintained that his only participation in the event was to offer public prayers and that he had prior written permission to wear his uniform when conducting "a bona fide worship service or observance."

During court-martial proceedings this week at the naval base in Norfolk, a military prosecutor, Cmdr. Rex A. Guinn, said Klingenschmitt had received clear orders from his superiors not to wear his uniform at media events or political protests. The event in Lafayette Square, he contended, was not a true worship service or observance.

On Wednesday, a jury of five Navy officers found Klingenschmitt guilty of one misdemeanor count of disobeying a lawful order. Yesterday, the same jury determined his punishment: a formal reprimand and forfeiture of pay at the rate of $250 a month for the next 12 months.

That would amount to $3,000, or about 5 percent of his pay. But Klingenschmitt is unlikely to incur the full fine, for two reasons: The jury recommended that Rear Adm. Frederic Ruehe, commander of the Navy's Mid-Atlantic region, suspend the financial penalty, and Klingenschmitt doubts he will remain in the Navy for 12 more months.

"The letter of reprimand is actually the worst punishment because it will be used in a couple of months to kick me out of the Navy in a separate process called an administrative separation board," the chaplain predicted.

Kevin Copeland, a Navy spokesman, said that Klingenschmitt's prediction was "strictly hypothesis at this time" because "the ink isn't even dry on the court-martial yet."

But among the documents that Klingenschmitt introduced in his defense during the court-martial was a March 22 e-mail from Vice Adm. John C. Harvey Jr., the Navy's head of personnel, to Adm. Michael G. Mullen, the chief of naval operations, recommending Klingenschmitt's "involuntarily release" from the Navy "due to lack of career potential."

The e-mail noted: "This officer is the individual who conducted a hunger strike in front of the White House several months ago and has engaged in other actions concerning [Defense Department] and Navy Religious Ministry policies."

Klingenschmitt served as an Air Force officer for 11 years before becoming a chaplain four years ago. He said he believes the e-mail, which was sent eight days before he wore his uniform at the Lafayette Square protest, "proves this is a reprisal against me for my whistle-blower complaints to Congress and the press."

Jury Recommends Reprimand For Navy Chaplain Who Disobeyed Order By Appearing In Uniform (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sonja Barisic, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063357

(AP) - NORFOLK, Virginia-A jury on Thursday recommended that a Navy chaplain receive a letter of reprimand for disobeying an order by appearing in uniform at a political news conference at the White House.

The jury also recommended that Lt. Gordon Klingenschmitt forfeit $250 (â‚¬197) pay per month for a year but suggested that the monetary punishment be suspended.

Rear Adm. Frederic Ruehe, commander of the Navy's Mid-Atlantic Region, must decide whether to approve the recommendation.

The jury of five officers at Klingenschmitt's special court-martial determined Wednesday that he had disobeyed a superior officer's order prohibiting him from wearing his uniform during media appearances without prior permission.

The charge centered on a March 30 news conference protesting a Navy policy that requires nondenominational prayers outside of religious services.

Klingenschmitt had argued that he was allowed to wear his uniform if conducting a "bona fide worship service." He said he believes he was punished for making a political speech in uniform because he prayed in Jesus' name.

"Jesus was crucified, Peter and John were flogged and I got a minor reprimand," Klingenschmitt said in a telephone interview after court. "I have not yet become a martyr for the faith."

He said he would appeal the conviction and fight to remain a chaplain if the Navy tries to oust him. He said senior naval officials had already decided to fire him before the event.

Last December, the chaplain went on an 18-day hunger strike in front of the White House over the right to invoke Jesus' name outside such services.

Klingenschmitt had faced a maximum punishment of a reprimand and fines of $41,916 (â‚¬32,945), or two-thirds of his annual salary. He also could have been restricted to base for up to two months.

Military prosecutor Cmdr. Rex Guinn said the government had proved its case.

"Justice was done," Guinn told reporters.

Conservatives Say Religion Under Attack (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, September 14, 2006

Religious conservative leaders, sensing declining alarm over same-sex marriage, are warning that the debate over homosexuality has prompted attacks on religious freedom.

By expanding the discussion from marriage to religious expression, social conservatives say they will reconnect with religious voters and religious leaders who don't necessarily view same-sex unions as a threat.

"There are a number of pastors that said, 'Look, we don't get involved in politics, I'm not going to get involved in this issue, I just want to preach the gospel,'" said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council. "When they realize their ability to preach the gospel may very well be at stake, they may reconsider their involvement."

Perkins and others are building a case file of anecdotes where they say religious people have spoken out against gay marriage only to be punished. Perkins specifically cited the decision by Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich in June to fire his appointee to the Washington area transit board after the board member referred to homosexuals as "persons of sexual deviancy."

The board member, Robert J. Smith, said he was expressing his personal beliefs as a Roman Catholic.

The subject of religious expression will be the main theme of an Oct. 15 gathering in Boston of conservative religious and political leaders that will be broadcast to churches nationally.

Many social conservatives credit the furor in 2004 over gay marriage for mobilizing voters in key states who voted for President Bush. Since then, however, 16 states have passed initiatives or legislation banning same-sex marriage and several court decisions have upheld those bans.

"As the immediate threat has diminished so has the awareness," Perkins said.

Eight states have ballot initiatives in November to prohibit gay marriage, including some states with closely contested congressional races. Perkins said religious conservative groups planned to use direct mail and the Internet to alert voters about the stands candidates have taken on the marriage issue.

DOJ_NMG_0063358

ANTITRUST:

Exelon Abandons PSEG Acquisition, Faults New Jersey (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Prospects for big utility mergers dimmed with Exelon Corp.'s announcement yesterday that it has abandoned its acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc., a deal valued at about $17.7 billion that would have created the nation's largest utility company by serving 18 million people.

Exelon blamed its decision, which was expected, on "insurmountable" obstacles, chiefly rate concessions and power-plant divestitures sought by public officials and consumer advocates in New Jersey, where PSEG is based. Exelon, of Chicago, spent more than $100 million pursuing PSEG in a deal announced in December 2004.

The longer the approval process became, the more costly the transaction was for Exelon shareholders. What started out as a $12 billion deal became a $17.7 billion transaction as Exelon's stock price appreciated. Yesterday, Exelon closed down 50 cents at $57.77 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, up from $43.05 when the deal was announced. PSEG's shares rose one cent to $66.15. In after-hours trading, PSEG's shares dropped $5.85, or 8.8%, to $60.30, while Exelon stock rose $1.73, or 3%, to $59.50.

Many industry economists say such combinations can make companies more skillful operators and reduce geographic risk caused by weather. New Jersey officials feared the loss of local oversight. Exelon sought to allay fears by promising to keep PSEG's headquarters in Newark, N.J.

The combination moved forward smoothly. It won approvals from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, Pennsylvania state regulators and the Justice Department, which weighs potential anticompetitive issues. The approval process bogged down at the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities. Many participants argued that the combined company would have unacceptable leverage over wholesale-power markets in the Midwest and mid-Atlantic area and that power-plant divestitures ordered by the federal government were insufficient to fully protect consumers against unfair prices. The companies offered $600 million in rate concessions.

Jeanne Fox, president of the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities, said the relationship between state regulators and PSEG would be constructive despite the failed merger.

The termination will cost PSEG "strategic benefits and the ability to spread risk geographically, but the impact on our earnings is not that significant," spokesman Paul Rosengren said. He said PSEG's earnings next year should go up about 30% from a range of $3.45 to $3.75 a share in 2006 to a 2007 range of $4.60 to $5 a share.

Exelon, PSEG End Merger Over Differences With NJ (MRKTWTCH)

By Matthew Dalton

Market Watch, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Exelon Corp. (EXC) and Public Service Enterprise Group (PEG) announced late Thursday they were breaking off their merger due to insurmountable differences between the two utilities and with New Jersey regulators.

After 19 months of negotiations between the utilities and New Jersey, Exelon and PSEG said the state's conditions for approving the $17 billion deal were too costly. The New Jersey Board of Utilities' approval was the last obstacle to the deal.

The companies said they could not reach an agreement on how many power plants the combined company would be allowed to own and how much New Jersey residents would pay for their electricity and natural gas.

"We are very disappointed that the merger cannot be completed," said John W. Rowe, Exelon's chief executive.

"We simply could not achieve agreement on issues ranging from market power mitigation to electric and gas rate concessions," said E. James Ferland, chairman and chief executive of PSEG.

PSEG's shares dropped 8.9% in after-hours trading to $60.25, while Exelon stock rose 3% to $59.50.

A driving force behind the merger was the hope that Exelon, a highly regarded operator of nuclear power plants, could improve the performance of PSEG's two troubled nuclear plants, Hope Creek and Salem. The plants have improved dramatically since Exelon began operating them following the announcement of the merger in December 2004. Some investors have been concerned that the plants' performance might regress if the deal fell apart.

DOJ_NMG_0063359

PSEG has an option to continue Exelon's operation of the plants for another three years starting in 2007. PSEG said Thursday it would still be a strong company without Exelon and reaffirmed its 2006 earnings guidance of $3.45-$3.75 per share.

"The company took strong steps over the last two years to improve our financial stability and reduce our international exposure," Ferland said.

The U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Justice Department, and Illinois and Pennsylvania regulators had approved the merger. But New Jersey consumer advocates and large industrial firms raised concerns that the combined company would own so many power plants in the state that it could effectively corner the electricity market and raise prices without fear of competition.

In early August, the two companies offered to give PSEG customers $600 million in cash through 2008 and credits against future rate increases for natural gas delivery. Staff of the New Jersey board responded with a counter-offer seeking $820 million through 2011 and the sale of two additional fossil-fueled power plants beyond what the companies said they would sell as part of an agreement with the Justice Department, which approved the deal in June.

The two utilities attempted the merger at a time of record electricity prices, an environment that many believe ultimately derailed the deal.

"One wonders whether the negotiation process would have been as contentious if wholesale power prices weren't so high," Paul Patterson, an analyst at Glenrock Associates.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

Exelon, Public Service Cancel Sale Over State Hurdles (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Jim Polson And Dan Lonkevich

Bloomberg, September 15, 2006

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Exelon Corp. abandoned its $17.8 billion purchase of New Jersey's Public Service Enterprise Group because of an impasse with state regulators over the plan to create the largest U.S. utility company.

The companies faced ``insurmountable gaps" with the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities, Chicago-based Exelon and Newark, New Jersey-based Public Service said today in a statement. The board was the last regulatory hurdle for the deal.

Exelon agreed to buy Public Service in December 2004. The company said Aug. 30 that completing the transaction was no longer ``more likely than not" as they tried to allay concern among the regulators that the combined company would be capable of inflating power prices.

``Most observers did feel the odds were getting longer as it took more time," said Tom Burnett, director of research at Wall Street Access in New York and a specialist in tracking acquisitions. ``The companies and the folks in the New Jersey regulatory office were just too far apart."

Exelon Chief Executive Officer John W. Rowe had argued that his company would run Public Service's plants, particularly their nuclear units, more efficiently. He said that would increase the electricity supplied to New Jersey's competitive wholesale market, benefiting customers.

Public Service stock fell $6.18, or 9.3 percent, to $60 in after-hours trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of Exelon rose as much as $1.73, or 3.1 percent, to $59.50 in after- hours trading.

``The deal was enormous and it scared a lot of people," said Daniele Seitz, an analyst for Dahlman Rose & Co. in New York, who rates Exelon shares ``buy" and doesn't own them. ``For the regulators it was a bit much."

No Agreement

Exelon on July 31 offered $600 million in cash, with additional rate concessions, if New Jersey would agree to approve the acquisition. New Jersey's board made an undisclosed counter proposal on Aug. 17.

The companies had offered to sell power plants and place output from nuclear plants under long-term contracts to win approval from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0063360

New Jersey ``apparently feels that the commitments we had to make to FERC and DOJ, those divestiture obligations, were not enough," Public Service Enterprise Group Chief Executive E. James Ferland said in an interview today. ``We don't agree with that."

The regulators demanded further plant divestitures and constraints on sales from generators the companies would keep, he said.

Not Enough

``We did not believe the companies offered enough direct and real rate relief," Ronald K. Chen, New Jersey Public Advocate said in a separate statement. ``The companies also would not agree to measures that our experts, and the Board of Public Utilities staff, believed were necessary to ensure that the merged company could not manipulate regional energy markets."

To win federal approval for the acquisition, Exelon previously agreed to sell six power plants in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, as well as place 2,600 megawatts of nuclear-power capacity under contract for as long as 15 years.

The Justice Department on June 22 gave antitrust approval to the deal, provided Exelon sell 5,600 megawatts of power plants. FERC had given approval a year earlier, based on a smaller divestiture and long-term nuclear-output sales.

Blocked Deals

Four of the nine largest U.S. utility takeovers announced in the past three years have been blocked by state officials. The largest deal pending, FPL Group Inc.'s $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy Group Inc., stalled May 31 amid a rate dispute in Maryland that prompted a new state law on utility mergers.

Exelon, owner of utilities in Chicago and Philadelphia, withdrew an offer for Dynegy Inc.'s Illinois Power Co. in 2003 after Illinois lawmakers rejected its terms.

Oregon's Public Utility Commission blocked the $1.4 billion sale of Portland General Electric Co. in March 2005, declaring its acquisition by Texas Pacific Group from Enron didn't benefit customers.

Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Wachovia Corp. in 2004 abandoned an $800 million bid for Tucson utility owner UniSource Energy Corp. after the Arizona Corporation Commission demanded the buyers put up more money, reducing the planned borrowing to finance the transaction.

Duke Energy Corp. closed on the $9 billion acquisition of Cincinnati-based utility owner Cinergy Corp. on April 3, less than 11 months after announcing the deal, after winning regulatory approval by five states as well as federal officials.

``If you can fly below the radar screen, you're fine," Seitz said. ``Look at the Duke-Cinergy merger. It went like a letter in the mailbox. Nobody cared."

To contact the reporter on this story: Jim Polson in New York at jpolson@bloomberg.net ; Dan Lonkevich in New York at dlonkevich@bloomberg.net

US Urges European Regulators To Lay Off Apple DRM (IDG)

By Nancy Gohring, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, September 15, 2006

DOJ official argues European policy is aimed at helping competitors instead of consumers

A U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) official has joined the debate surrounding Apple Computer's proprietary digital music technology by criticizing European antitrust activities, but groups attacking Apple are defending their actions.

Speaking in Washington, D.C., on Wednesday, Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general at the DOJ's antitrust division, warned that forcing companies to reveal their intellectual property stifles innovation. He used Apple as an example, in a nod to growing discontent in Europe regarding the way that music purchased from iTunes is tied to the iPod.

Architects of complaints against Apple in Europe say he's got it wrong. "We're not attacking intellectual property rights but saying they should be implemented in a way which doesn't dictate which player you use," said Torgeir Waterhouse, a senior advisor with the Norwegian Consumer Council.

His organization filed a complaint to Norway's consumer representative, or ombudsman, arguing that it's illegal for Apple to limit iTunes customers to playing music from the store exclusively on iPods. Along with similar representatives in Denmark and Sweden, the Norwegian ombudsman asked Apple to defend its policy. In a written reply, Apple said it won't budge on the issue but the company plans to meet representatives from the countries later this month to further discuss the issue. If Apple won't open up, the ombudsman will take the company to court.

Waterhouse suggests that Apple could solve the problem by licensing its digital rights management technology to other device makers so that iTunes customers could choose among devices or opt for an open standard that would be compatible with more devices.

Barnett's criticisms of European antitrust policy, including comments that the policy is aimed at helping competitors instead of consumers, are generally in line with comments from U.S. officials since the Bush administration came to power, said Scott Megregian, a partner and head of the European competition group in the law firm McDermott Will & Emery UK.

He disagrees with the argument that requiring companies to open up some of their technology stifles innovation. "That's an argument without support," he said. "Microsoft hasn't stopped innovating that I can tell despite regulations and attack by the E.U."

So far, the European Commission has likely communicated with the countries that are pursuing Apple and has probably expressed an opinion on the matter, he said. While no official complaints have been filed with the Commission, if one is, the result will have the makings of a historical battle. "This has the potential to be the next big high-profile dispute," Megregian said.

Rent-A-Center Deal Gets Antitrust OK (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

PLANO, Texas --Rent-A-Center Inc., the largest U.S. furniture rental chain, and Rent-Way Inc., a rent-to-own chain operator, said Thursday that Rent-A-Center's planned acquisition of Rent-Way has gotten government antitrust clearance.

The waiting period for the deal, required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust improvement Act of 1976, expired Sept. 13.

The acquisition is expected to be completed in the fourth quarter.

Plano, Texas-based Rent-A-Center will pay about $576 million to buy Rent-Way of Erie, Pa., in a deal announced in August.

The acquisition marks an end to Rent-Way's six-year turnaround after a scandal.

Rent-Way, founded in 1981, was rocked by an accounting scandal six years ago when founder and CEO William Morgenstern announced that some executives had cooked the company's books to meet Wall Street earnings expectations in the late 1990s.

A federal investigation confirmed that three company officers acted on their own, improperly writing down $98 million in operating expenses. Rent-Way closed a $25 million settlement with shareholders in 2004.

Wright Strategy Plotted (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

Dallas Morning News, September 15, 2006

Antitrust provision is 'just a bump in the road,' Granger says

WASHINGTON – Facing a delicate negotiation over their Wright bill, Texas lawmakers said Thursday that they were moving ahead to get the North Texas compromise through the full House as early as next week.

Some indicated they were unwilling to accept a revision to the House bill removing antitrust immunity as the final word for the legislation to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field.

"It's just a bump in the road," said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth.

Getting the Wright bill passed in time depends largely on how successful members are in quickly reconciling competing versions of the legislation that have passed two House committees.

House members have only nine more voting days before they're scheduled to return home to campaign for the November elections.

Lawmakers also must find a way to steer the legislation through obstacles in the Senate.

"We're trying every creative way to get to the goal of preserving the balance of the agreement, protecting the interests of all the parties and getting it through the Congress," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who is leading the effort in the upper chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0063362

The House Judiciary Committee on Wednesday removed an antitrust exemption sought by Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport in the legislation to lift the 1979 Wright law.

The five parties fear a long court battle, if the deal isn't given protections by Congress.

"What we're trying to do is stop the lawsuits that have gone on for 20-plus years and work this out so we move ahead," Ms. Granger said.

The bill would implement a June agreement by the five North Texas parties to lift limits on long-haul flights at Love in 2014. It would allow immediate one-stop flights across the U.S., as long as passengers first stopped in one of the nine states in the Wright perimeter.

The legislation would cut the number of available gates at Love Field to 20 from 32, a move that has sparked complaints that competition would be diminished. Nineteen gates at the airport are now operational.

The bill passed the House Transportation & Infrastructure Committee in July and appeared to be on a fast track to passage before the antitrust concerns surfaced.

Getting the Transportation Committee's version as the final vehicle on the House floor will require careful maneuvering with the chamber's leadership to overcome the changes implemented by the Judiciary Committee chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis.

Rep. Joe Barton, R-Ennis, a senior House member who chairs another committee, said that "it's not unique" to sidestep another committee's changes in legislation moving through the chamber.

The original legislation was sponsored by Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, another powerful member and chairman of the Transportation Committee.

"You have one bill that's totally supported – the transportation bill – and another bill which the stakeholders totally oppose," Mr. Barton said. "So which bill would you try to get through the rules committee?

"If we need to reach an accommodation with Chairman Sensenbrenner, we're certainly open to that," he said.

Several members said they were deferring to Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Dallas, the only Texan on the 13-member House Rules Committee. The small but powerful panel negotiates changes in legislation from House committees and decides how bills will be handled on the House floor.

"I'm confident that we are going to find a way to move the language that was contained in the transportation bill," Mr. Sessions said.

Even if House members get their version through next week, the legislation would face a significant obstacle in the Senate.

The leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee have objected to the same antitrust exemption that slowed the bill in the House.

The House Judiciary Committee's version of the legislation – without the antitrust exemption – would satisfy the Senate detractors as well. But the parties to the North Texas agreement don't appear willing to give up the protection yet.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who met with Ms. Hutchison this week to discuss the issue, said he thought the Texas interests could be accommodated but declined to detail how that would happen.

"I think we're getting closer," Mr. Leahy said. "My biggest concern and only concern is that we not interfere with or rewrite the antitrust laws."

Ms. Hutchison said she's constantly trying to find new language to get the legislation through Congress.

"We're trying to work different words and different approaches that satisfy the balance of the agreement and will take the antitrust issue out of it," she said.

Lawyer Says FCC Ordered Study Destroyed (AP-Y)

By John Dunbar

AP, September 14, 2006

The Federal Communications Commission ordered its staff to destroy all copies of a draft study that suggested greater concentration of media ownership would hurt local TV news coverage, a former lawyer at the agency says.

The report, written in 2004, came to light during the Senate confirmation hearing for FCC Chairman Kevin Martin.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif. received a copy of the report "indirectly from someone within the FCC who believed the information should be made public," according to Boxer spokeswoman Natalie Ravitz.

Adam Candeub, now a law professor at Michigan State University, said senior managers at the agency ordered that "every last piece" of the report be destroyed. "The whole project was just stopped — end of discussion," he said. Candeub was a lawyer in the FCC's Media Bureau at the time the report was written and communicated frequently with its authors, he said.

In a letter sent to Martin Wednesday, Boxer said she was "dismayed that this report, which was done at taxpayer expense more than two years ago, and which concluded that localism is beneficial to the public, was shoved in a drawer."

Martin said he was not aware of the existence of the report, nor was his staff. His office indicated it had not received Boxer's letter as of midafternoon Thursday.

In the letter, Boxer asked whether any other commissioners "past or present" knew of the report's existence and why it was never made public. She also asked whether it was "shelved because the outcome was not to the liking of some of the commissioners and/or any outside powerful interests?"

The report, written by two economists in the FCC's Media Bureau, analyzed a database of 4,078 individual news stories broadcast in 1998. The broadcasts were obtained from Danilo Yanich, a professor and researcher at the University of Delaware, and were originally gathered by the Pew Foundation's Project for Excellence in Journalism.

The analysis showed local ownership of television stations adds almost five and one-half minutes of total news to broadcasts and more than three minutes of "on-location" news. The conclusion is at odds with FCC arguments made when it voted in 2003 to increase the number of television stations a company could own in a single market. It was part of a broader decision liberalizing ownership rules.

At that time, the agency pointed to evidence that "commonly owned television stations are more likely to carry local news than other stations."

When considering whether to loosen rules on media ownership, the agency is required to examine the impact on localism, competition and diversity. The FCC generally defines localism as the level of responsiveness of a station to the needs of its community.

The 2003 action sparked a backlash among the public and within Congress. In June 2004, a federal appeals court rejected the agency's reasoning on most of the rules and ordered it to try again. The debate has since been reopened, and the FCC has scheduled a public hearing on the matter in Los Angeles on Oct. 3.

The report was begun after then-Chairman Michael Powell ordered the creation of a task force to study localism in broadcasting in August of 2003. Powell stepped down from the commission and was replaced by Martin in March 2005. Powell did not return a call seeking comment.

The authors of the report, Keith Brown and Peter Alexander, both declined to comment. Brown has left public service while Alexander is still at the FCC. Yanich confirmed the two men were the authors. Both have written extensively on media and telecommunications policy.

Yanich said the report was "extremely well done. It should have helped to inform policy."

Boxer's office said if she does not receive adequate answers to her questions, she will push for an investigation by the FCC inspector general.

EU Antitrust Chief Says Her Commission Is Investigating Microsoft Office (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- The European Union's antitrust commission plans to investigate complaints regarding Microsoft Office, said EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes Thursday.

Kroes, speaking at the Fordham Annual Conference on International Antitrust Law & Policy, did not elaborate on the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0063364

Microsoft Corp. has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format. Microsoft claimed it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the ability to save Office documents in either the popular Portable Document Format or Microsoft's new, competing XPS format.

The EU has a long-running antitrust action against Microsoft, which dates to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling that came with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July.

Kroes said the Commission's actions on Microsoft "will result in benefits in terms of industrial competitiveness and will result in more innovation and lower prices for consumers."

European Union officials warned Microsoft on Tuesday not to shut out rivals in the security software market as the company plans to launch its Windows Vista operating system with built-in protection from hackers and malicious programs.

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said that the European Commission is "ready to give guidance to Microsoft" concerning Vista but added that it was up to the U.S. software maker "to accept and implement its responsibilities as a near monopolist to ensure full compliance" with EU competition rules.

EU Antitrust Chief Eyes US-Style Private Damage Lawsuits (DOW)

Dow Jones, September 15, 2006

BRUSSELS -(Dow Jones)- European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Thursday that she plans to devise a way to encourage private damage suits by early next year.

Speaking at the Council of Foreign Relations in New York, Kroes said the U.S. "has traveled much further down this road than we have in Europe" and that the E.U. needed to catch up. "Watch this space because we'll try to draw some conclusions from the debate early next year," she said.

Kroes has long said private action, including lawsuits, can increase competition without adding to regulators' workload.

The European antitrust chief said regulators were now considering how to draft regulations that would "make sure that private cases are actually brought to court, in other words, that the benefits of bringing proceedings outweigh the costs." She also said any new regulation must ensure "that our public and private enforcement systems are complementary."

Kroes said regulators on both sides of the Atlantic were working well together to crack down on cartels.

She said she had created a dedicated cartel-busting office with 60 officials, with powers to levy increased fines, and had implemented a U.S.-style "carrot and stick approach" by letting informers escape fines.

On Wednesday, her office fined 14 companies, including Royal Shell PLC (RSDA), a total of EUR266.7 million for fixing prices in the Netherlands of a material used in road construction.

One large difference in U.S. and E.U. antitrust enforcement that remains is how to reign in dominant companies. U.S. practice says only monopolies should be constrained, while E.U. law insists on "dominance."

"It's true, of course, that dominance requires a lower market share than a monopoly and some people like to make much of this difference," she said. "But let's not overstate things. Our respective enforcement approaches are rather convergent."

-By William Echikson, Dow Jones Newswires; 32-2-285-0134; william.echikson@ dowjones.com

Apollo Buys GE Unit For $3.8bn (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

General Electric has sold its low-margin materials unit to the private equity firm Apollo Management for $3.8bn in cash and shares. It marks the latest attempt by the conglomerate to focus on high-growth businesses and revive its share price.

The deal – announced on Thursday – is part of GE's strategy of exiting low-growth markets and underlines the appetite of buy-out groups for industrial businesses that require substantial investment and restructuring.

People familiar with the deal said the boom in leveraged buyouts by cash-rich private equity groups was key to GE's decision to sell a business that was being squeezed by tough markets and increased competition.

"We negotiated an attractive price for the deal, and we will use the proceeds to fund growth and restructuring in our industrial businesses," said Lloyd Trotter, recently appointed chief executive of GE's industrial unit.

DOJ_NMG_0063365

The deal gives Apollo, the New York-based fund run by the former investment banker Leon Black, a unit with more than 5,000 employees and $2.5bn in sales, and adds to Apollo's collection of industrial businesses.

The disposal of the unit, which makes silicones and quartzes for adhesives and sealants, was praised by Wall Street analysts as further evidence that GE was moving away from the slower-growing parts of its portfolio.

"We believe this is an attractive transaction," commented Jeffrey Sprague at Citigroup. "GE is selling a non-core business with low margins . . . at an attractive valuation."

Since taking over from Jack Welch in 2001, Jeffrey Immelt has tried to reshape GE to achieve double-digit earnings growth and high margins. But in spite of several disposals and acquisitions and a string of positive financial results, the share price has underperformed, partly because of concerns over GE's structure.

To complete the deal, GE had to buy out two joint venture partners; Germany's Bayer and Japan's Toshiba. Those purchases means GE will receive net proceeds of $2bn, which will largely go to pay for the shake-up of its other industrial businesses.

However, GE will retain a 10 per cent stake in the advanced materials business as well as $400m in notes – an arrangement that will give it a share of profits if Apollo sells or lists the business over the next few years.

JPMorgan and UBS advised GE and JPMorgan will lead the financing of the acquisition, which is likely to be made up of high-yield debt and loans.

Reshaping GE, Immelt Sells Unit (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

General Electric Co. continued its transformation under Chairman Jeffrey Immelt, agreeing to sell its silicone and quartz business for $3.4 billion to private-equity firm Apollo Management LP.

GE also has been weighing the future of its plastics business, where former Chairman Jack Welch cut his teeth and where Mr. Immelt once worked, according to people familiar with the matter. It isn't clear whether GE is considering selling the unit, which generates annual sales of $6.6 billion.

The unit it agreed to sell yesterday makes silicone used in adhesives and sealants and quartz used in semiconductor manufacturing and in tubing for fiber-optics and lamps. The unit, with annual sales of roughly $2.5 billion and 5,000 employees, has its headquarters in Wilton, Conn. GE doesn't disclose its earnings.

GE, Fairfield, Conn., said it would retain a 10% stake in the operation, which it called its advanced-materials group. It will also hold $400 million in debt obligations that yield interest payments.

GE said it would buy out minority partners in two joint ventures, GE Toshiba Silicones and GE Bayer Silicones, as part of the sale to Apollo. GE said it would receive about $2 billion in net proceeds from the deals.

The sale highlights the continuing changes to GE's portfolio since Mr. Immelt took over in September 2001. Since then, GE has completed transactions valued at more than $100 billion to buy and sell various units. Among other moves, GE sold most of its insurance businesses and several other industrial units.

Apollo, a large private-equity firm founded by financier Leon Black, has invested more than $16 billion in companies around the world. Over the past year, Apollo has been investing in the special-materials industry, including BPC Holding Corp., the parent of Berry Plastics Corp., and the plastics and adhesive business of Tyco International Ltd.

The sale is expected to close by the end of the year. Wayne Hewett will remain as president and chief executive, GE said.

With respect to the plastics unit, people familiar with the matter say Mr. Immelt has stated in company meetings that the business is ripe for review. The unit has been struggling with raw-material inflation while combating stiff competition for many of its offerings. In the quarter ended June 30, sales at the plastics unit increased 3% to $1.68 billion, while operating profit dropped 12% to $183 million.

Analysts and investors have also speculated about the unit's future. In a note yesterday, Credit Suisse analyst Nicole Parent wrote that GE "could be exploring strategic alternatives for its plastics unit."

GE spokesman Russell Wilkerson declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0063366

Also yesterday, another analyst, David Bleustein of UBS Investment Research, downgraded GE to neutral from buy in a move unrelated to the divestiture. Mr. Bleustein said in a report that GE's earnings next year "may be challenged" by a number of factors, including higher tax rates, continued problems at its NBC television network and slowing services business at its aircraft-engine unit. Mr. Bleustein also wrote that GE may need to increase reserves at GE Capital, the funding arm for its financial-services businesses, after "bottoming out of reserves" there over the past few years. UBS has done investment banking with GE.

Mr. Wilkerson declined to comment on the downgrade, saying, "we expect to have a strong second half of the year and into 2007."

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, GE shares were down six cents at $34.78 apiece.

Iamgold To Buy Cambior For $1.2 Billion In Stock (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Iamgold Corp. has agreed to acquire Cambior Inc. for US$1.2 billion in stock, a premium of nearly a third to Cambior's market capitalization.

The companies said the new Iamgold will be the 10th largest publicly traded primary gold producer in the world, with 1.1 million ounces of gold production annually, reserves totaling 9.7 million ounces and a market capitalization of US$3 billion.

Under the transaction, shareholders of Cambior will receive 0.42 of an Iamgold share for each share held, worth about C$4.83, a 31% premium to Cambior's shares at Wednesday's close in Toronto. Cambior's U.S.-listed shares jumped 24% in premarket trading Thursday on Inet. Iamgold's shares were unchanged.

Current Iamgold shareholders will own about 57% of the merged company, while current Cambior shareholders will own about 43%. Shareholders are expected to vote on the arrangement, which has been approved by the boards of both companies, no later than early November.

Cambior has agreed to pay a break-up fee of C$45 million to Iamgold under certain circumstances if the transaction isn't completed.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

In Gamble, Calif. Tries To Curb Greenhouse Gases (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

SACRAMENTO — In the Rocky Mountain States and the fast-growing desert Southwest, more than 20 power plants, designed to burn coal that is plentiful and cheap, are on the drawing boards. Much of the power, their owners expected, would be destined for the people of California.

But such plants would also be among the country's most potent producers of carbon dioxide, the king of gases linked to global warming. So California has just delivered a new message to these energy suppliers: If you cannot produce power with the lowest possible emissions of these greenhouse gases, we are not interested.

"When your biggest customer says, 'I ain't buying,' you rethink," said Hal Harvey, the environment program director at the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation, in Menlo Park, Calif. "When you have 38 million customers you don't have access to, you rethink. Selling to Phoenix is nice. Las Vegas is nice. But they aren't California."

California's decision to impose stringent demands on suppliers even outside its borders, broadened by the Legislature on Aug. 31 and awaiting the governor's signature, is but one example of the state's wide-ranging effort to remake its energy future.

The Democratic-controlled legislature and the Republican governor also agreed at that time on legislation to reduce industrial carbon dioxide emissions by 25 percent by 2020, a measure that affects not only power plants but also other large producers of carbon dioxide, including oil refineries and cement plants.

DOJ_NMG_0063367

The state's aim is to reduce emissions of climate-changing gases produced by burning coal, oil and gas. Other states, particularly New York, are moving in some of the same directions, but no state is moving as aggressively on as many fronts. No state has been at it longer. No state is putting more at risk.

Whether all this is visionary or deluded depends on one's perspective. This is the state that in the early 1970's jump-started the worldwide adoption of catalytic converters, the devices that neutralize most smog-forming chemicals emitted by tailpipes. This is the state whose per capita energy consumption has been almost flat for 30 years, even as per capita consumption has risen 50 percent nationally.

Taking on global warming is a tougher challenge. Though California was second in the nation only to Texas in emissions of carbon dioxide in 2001, and 12th in the world, it produced just 2.5 percent of the world's total. At best, business leaders asked in a legislative hearing, what difference could California's cuts make? And at what cost?

California, in fact, is making a huge bet: that it can reduce emissions without wrecking its economy, and therefore inspire other states — and countries — to follow its example on slowing climate change.

Initiatives addressing climate change are everywhere in California, pushed by legislators, by regulators, by cities, by foundations, by businesses and by investors.

Four years ago, California became the first state to seek to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide from automobile tailpipes. Car dealers and carmakers are challenging the law in federal court.

In late August, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed a measure requiring builders to offer home buyers roofs with tiles that convert sunlight into electricity. Homeowners in some communities are already choosing them to reduce their electric bills.

California, which has for decades required that refrigerators, air conditioners, water heaters and other appliances become more energy efficient, just added to the list: first, chargers for cellphones or computers; second, set-top boxes and other remote-controlled devices. Those categories consume up to 10 percent of a home's power.

Last fall, California regulators barred major investor-owned electrical utilities from signing long-term contracts to buy energy unless the seller's greenhouse-gas emissions meet a stringent standard.

"We are dealing with it across the board," said Michael R. Peevey, the president of the Public Utilities Commission. By contrast, the Bush administration has been averse to any legislative assault on climate change.

Opponents say California may hurt its own residents with its clean-energy mandate. Scott Segal, a lawyer for Bracewell & Giuliani who represents electric utilities, summarized California's policy as: "All electrons are not created equal. We're going to discriminate against some of them, and create artificial barriers in the marketplace for electricity." California consumers could end up paying more for their energy and struggling to find enough, Mr. Segal said.

Is California dreaming? Can its multifaceted approach become a toolkit for other states? Will investors make the state the incubator for clean-energy technologies that will reduce its energy bills and buoy its economy? Or will all this turn California into a stagnating economic island of ever-rising electricity prices and ever-rolling blackouts?

One thing is certain: The issue will not go away. This summer, a brutal California heat wave killed roughly 140 people. A 2004 National Academy of Sciences report predicted that, at the current growth rate of emissions, there would be at least five times as many heat waves in Los Angeles by 2100 compared with the current historical average, and twice as many heat-related deaths.

The study predicted that at least half the state's alpine forests would disappear by century's end, and that the Sierra snowpack — crucial to California's water supply — would decline by at least 29 percent and as much as 70 percent.

There seems to be political support, in California and nationally, for action on climate change. Statewide, a July 26 poll from the Public Policy Institute of California showed that 79 percent of 2,051 people surveyed said that global warming was a "very serious" or a "somewhat serious" threat to the state's economy and quality of life. The findings mirrored those of a national poll of 1,206 people conducted in mid-August by The New York Times and CBS News.

But polling organizations have asked little about the potentially painful sacrifices that may be required.

The Car Culture

Back in the 1950's, when the movie director George Lucas was growing up, cars rocked around the clock in Modesto, and they were so enshrined in his 1973 hit, "American Graffiti." The movie reaffirmed what much of the nation knew — there was no car culture like California's. Sleek convertibles? Muscle cars? Sport utility vehicles? Many were hatched in the design studios of Detroit, but popularized by Hollywood movies and celebrities, and by plain old California consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0063368

Fast forward to August. In the middle of the sales lot at Modesto Toyota sat a long row of sport utility vehicles the dealership had acquired as trade-ins in previous weeks. Leaning on a 2006 Ford Expedition, George S. Ismail, a sales manager, said, "We're getting a lot of people trading in their sport utility vehicles for smaller cars." Even heavily discounted, the used S.U.V.'s sit for weeks.

Yet Modesto Toyota is breaking records, Mr. Ismail said, selling about 400 vehicles a month, up from 260 a year ago. Most are small cars — Camrys and Corollas. Some are hybrid vehicles that use even less fuel, like the Prius. One-quarter of 200,000 new hybrid vehicles registered nationwide in 2005 belonged to Californians, according to the automotive analyst R. L. Polk.

With smaller cars increasingly popular, California now burns less gasoline per capita than all but six states. Burning less gasoline cuts carbon dioxide. Tailpipes account for more than half the state's carbon dioxide emissions, federal figures show.

Much of this change in driver taste is attributable to the higher price of gasoline. But what if gasoline prices fall again and bigger, less efficient vehicles become more popular? California has an answer.

It came from Assemblywoman Fran Pavley, a Democrat and former schoolteacher who drives a Prius and whose South Coast district has a bird's-eye view of the smoggy Los Angeles basin. Four years ago Ms. Pavley wrote the first state law regulating carbon dioxide emissions from cars and trucks. It requires vehicle makers to eventually reduce the average emissions of carbon dioxide of the mix of cars it sells in California by 30 percent, beginning with the 2009 model year. Light trucks, including sport utility vehicles, must meet the same standard by the 2016 model year.

Ten states, including New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, have followed suit. Canada instituted voluntary emissions reductions at similar levels, which major automobile manufacturers have agreed they can meet. "We think that, coupled with Canada, we're now over one-third of the market," Ms. Pavley said in an interview.

But automobile manufacturers and some dealerships have vowed to wipe her law from the books. Their lawsuit's central assertion is that, by regulating carbon dioxide emissions, California is using a backdoor means to control fuel efficiency, which, under the federal Energy Policy and Conservation Act, is the exclusive preserve of the federal Transportation Department. To produce less carbon dioxide, cars would have to be more fuel efficient.

On Sept. 15, Judge Anthony W. Ishii of Federal District Court in Fresno will hear arguments on California's request to dismiss the case. If the lawsuit survives, the first hearing is set for January. This schedule overlaps with that of another case with direct bearing on this issue. The Supreme Court, petitioned by a dozen states, led by Massachusetts, and three cities, including New York, will decide whether the law requires the Environmental Protection Agency to declare carbon dioxide a pollutant and to regulate it. The Bush administration contends it has no authority to do either.

If the Supreme Court accepts the administration's arguments, it will not help California in its legal fight against Detroit, because a key to the state's case is the contention that carbon dioxide is in fact a pollutant under the Clean Air Act.

Hungry Electronics

Imagine all the small electronic devices in a modern home — iPods and handheld organizers, cellphones and laptops — charging at a power strip.

Arthur H. Rosenfeld, a member of the California Energy Commission, knows how much electricity is wasted when people unplug the devices but leave the charger plugged in. Dr. Rosenfeld estimates that such chargers — along with appliances like televisions that draw power even when they are off because they are designed to respond to remote controls — use up to 10 percent of an average home's power.

He calls them "vampires" — things with teeth that suck power at night.

Recently, Dr. Rosenfeld proudly held up a small green cellular phone charger that consumes less than half a watt of electricity — a fifth as much as its predecessors — when left plugged into an outlet. It meets state standards that take effect in 2007. The same standards will require sharp power cutbacks from audio and video equipment, both when the devices are in use and when they are standing by for a remote signal.

DOJ_NMG_0063369

Since the 1970's, California's energy-efficiency standards have reduced electricity consumption by the equivalent of the output of more than 20 average power plants, Dr. Rosenfeld said. And the standards have become templates for other states and Washington. Nationally, Dr. Rosenfeld added, energy-efficiency policies have saved the economy $700 billion since the 1970's.

But why would utilities, which sell electricity, have any interest in seeing sales diminish? In 1982, the Public Utilities Commission decoupled utilities' sales and their profits by allowing rate increases for utilities that helped customers cut energy use.

The logic was that for every dollar the consumer did not spend on energy, the utility would get real income — say 15 cents, which would exceed the profit the utility could have made on that dollar. For consumers, efficiency savings more than offset the rate increases. "Even though rates go up, bills go down," said Mr. Harvey of the Hewlett Foundation.

Ralph Cavanagh, the co-director of the energy program at the Natural Resources Defense Counsel, said: "Every other state in the country rewards utilities for selling more energy. It's a perfectly perverse incentive."

Mr. Peevey, of the utilities commission, said he expected new efficiencies to absorb half the increase in demand as the state grows to 40 million people, from 38 million.

Mr. Peevey's commission has also been a prime mover in increasing state support for residential solar power. Solar energy remains four times as expensive as electricity produced by conventional fuels. But, he said, "the idea is to make the solar industry a self-sustaining, economically viable industry," and to make the cost come down.

California businesses and investors, public and private, are getting into the act. The state's huge pension fund, Calpers, is committing just under $1 billion to renewable-energy investments. Among the early incentive-driven ventures in solar power are the homes in the Carsten Crossings subdivision in Rocklin, a Sacramento suburb. In August, Mr. Schwarzenegger signed legislation making solar panels a standard option for new-home buyers by 2012 and ensuring that utilities reduce homeowners' bills based on the electricity returned to the grid.

Some of those incentives were available when construction started. Now four families have moved in. They see themselves as pragmatists, not crusaders. "This is the next logical step" in construction, said one of the homeowners, Lt. Col. Thomas Sebens, a specialist in drone aircraft at Beale Air Force Base.

Their roofs show how public and private decisions, markets and government, have meshed. T. J. Rodgers, a fiercely anti-regulatory entrepreneur, underwrote the solar cells' production. The PowerLight Corporation, based near San Francisco, bought the cells from Mr. Rodgers's company, the SunPower Corporation, and turned them into roof tiles. The tiles ended up on houses built by Grupe Homes, based in Stockton, because state utility regulators established a $5,500 state-financed rebate for builders who install similar systems, which cost $20,000. Federal law gives home buyers a $2,000 tax credit; state law guarantees lower electric bills as utilities buy back power homeowners do not need.

The July utility bills, the new homeowners' first, were the talk of the neighborhood.

Larry Brittain, an office products salesman with a four-bedroom, 2,400-square-foot home, was the winner at $73.27 for electricity in the month ending July 25 — the hottest July on record. For the last 10 June days in a similar house nearby, his bill was $103.

"This is a bet with a winning hand," Mr. Brittain said. "You can't lose."

Pressure on Suppliers

In Gerlach, Nev., 100 miles north of Reno, a high desert butte was made ready two years ago for its wedding to the Granite Fox Power Project, a plant designed to burn pulverized Western coal. Electrical transmission lines were close by.

But, like Miss Havisham in Dickens's "Great Expectations," Gerlach waits for a groom that may never arrive. The plant was a certain source of significant new carbon dioxide emissions. Mr. Cavanagh predicted that it "would wipe out all the carbon dioxide savings from California's spectacularly successful efforts to save electricity during 2001 and 2002."

Southern Californians would likely be the eventual customers. But last fall, the California Public Utilities Commission barred the investor-owned utilities it regulates from signing long-term contracts for electricity if the emissions exceeded those of the cleanest gas-driven plants. The only technology that could accomplish that with coal is expensive and has not been perfected.

DOJ_NMG_0063370

Said Mr. Peevey of the commission, "All we're saying is, Fine, you send it here, but it has to be, in terms of air quality and greenhouse gas emissions, it has to be comparable to the newest combined-cycle gas turbine." One fifth of California's electricity comes from coal, the vast majority of it from outside the state.

This past winter, Sempra Energy, the parent of San Diego Gas & Electric and Sempra Generation and the developer of Granite Fox, put the project up for sale. Neal E. Schmale, Sempra's president, said the ruling had had a negligible impact on the decision. High natural gas prices prompted the company to invest in gas storage and terminals instead, Mr. Schmale said.

Among California environmentalists, however, the "for sale" sign on Granite Fox was taken as a victory for a pioneering policy that reaches beyond the state's borders. V. John White, an environmental lobbyist in Sacramento, compares building a Southwestern power plant to building a mall: California is a desirable anchor tenant.

But California is also the state where electricity deregulation foundered in 2000; bills soared and an economic crisis ensued. Even without a crisis, Californians' electricity rates are about 40 percent above the national average.

Robert McIlvaine, a coal industry consultant from Northfield, Ill., said, "If you are going to generate electricity from gas, the cost of doing so is going to be considerably greater than coal — 50 percent more or 100 percent more."

But, Mr. Harvey said: "People don't pay rates. They pay bills. You can have twice the rate and half the consumption and be just as happy."

On Aug. 31, legislators enacted the bill sponsored by the State Senate president, Don Perata, Democrat of Oakland, and extended the commission's rule to all power providers.

Business people ask if this could provoke another crisis. Power-plant siting experts, like Thomas A. Johns, the vice president of development at Sithe Global Power, a New York company, say that, in the short term, the loss of California business may not matter much to the merchants of power in the Southwest. Fast-growing cities like Phoenix and Las Vegas are ready markets.

In the long run, however, "California is a big piece" of the total consumption in the West — 40 percent, Mr. Johns said. "If 40 percent of the Western load will not buy coal, you will have less coal."

The risk, both Mr. Johns and Mr. Schmale said, is in increasing the state's reliance on natural gas, whose price has been extremely volatile in recent years. (California law bars construction of nuclear plants until the questions of waste disposal are resolved.)

"When you exclude coal and nuclear from your base load," Mr. Johns said, "you've only got one option, and that's natural gas." Another measure awaiting the governor's signature toughens standards by requiring that by 2010, 20 percent of the energy sold in California comes from a portfolio of renewable sources, like geothermal and wind. Last year, 10.7 percent of California's power came from renewable sources.

New renewable energy sources could make prices less volatile, but Mr. Schmale of Sempra said California's policy makers need to muster "the political will" to build transmission lines and "all those other things that would be necessary to make the environmental things work."

Caps, Costs and Credits

Perhaps the most ambitious measure California has undertaken is the newly mandated 25 percent reduction in carbon dioxide emissions. "If we do it right," Mr. Schwarzenegger said at a news conference, "it can be an example for the rest of the world and the rest of the country to see." If not, the concept could be discredited.

The law, sponsored by Ms. Pavley and the Assembly speaker, Fabian Núñez, Democrat of Los Angeles, gives the California Air Resources Board authority to set industry-specific targets for emissions reductions, effective in 2012, and to establish mechanisms — including the creation of emissions allowances that companies might trade or bank — to facilitate compliance. These targets would be adjusted from 2012 to 2020 to meet the 25 percent goal.

Those who have studied the question agree that the new system will cost consumers more. "A cap-and-trade system will raise the cost of electricity to consumers to some degree," said Lawrence H. Goulder, a professor of environmental and resource economics at Stanford University.

As the European Union found after the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, figuring out how to assign emissions credits is not easy.

DOJ_NMG_0063371

Whatever the decisions, chances are that they will be met by a lawsuit. Margo Thorning, the chief economist at the American Council for Capital Formation, a group supporting business interests, argues in a study that "sharp cutbacks in California's energy use would be necessary to close the 41 percent gap in 2020 between projected emissions" and the cuts the law requires. Dr. Thorning added in an interview, "The technologies that will enable us to move quickly in a cost-effective way away from fossil fuel just aren't there yet."

Allan Zaremberg, president of the state Chamber of Commerce, predicted that businesses would flee to unregulated areas and continue to emit climate-changing gases.

Dr. Thorning's study was countered in mid-August with a study by David Roland-Holst, an adjunct professor of agricultural and resource economics at the University of California, Berkeley. Professor Roland-Holst argued that the new law would add $60 billion and 17,000 jobs — in fields like alternative energy — to the California economy by 2020 by attracting new investment.

James D. Marston, the head of state global warming programs for Environmental Defense, the New York group that helped lead the fight for California's new carbon cap, said, "We'll look back in 10 years and say this was the final breakthrough and the final political consensus that we have to do something meaningful on global warming."

US To Cut Funds For Two Renewable Energy Sources (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

Out at the Wanapum Dam on the Columbia River, a new turbine is being tested that generates more electricity, but won't kill so many fish - thanks to research dollars from Uncle Sam.

Down in California's Long Valley, on the Sierra Nevada range, federal researchers are working to boost efficiency of geothermal energy, which uses the earth's natural heat to generate power.

But renewable energy advocates may have to kiss goodbye those and other research projects. The US Department of Energy (DOE) is quitting the hydropower and geothermal power research business - if Congress will let it.

Declaring them "mature technologies" that need no further funding, the Bush administration in its FY 2007 budget request eliminates hydropower and geothermal research, venerable programs with roots in the energy crises of the 1970s.

"What we do well is research and funding of new, novel technologies," says Craig Stevens, chief spokesman for the DOE. "From a policy perspective, geothermal and hydro are mature technologies. We believe the market can take the lead on this at this point."

Still, "zeroing out" such research could end up being a penny-wise, pound-foolish move, some energy advocates say. Any savings from the cuts would be nil since all of the nearly $24 million ($1 million from hydropower and $23 million from geothermal) research funding would go to other programs such as biofuels.

"I'm just astonished the department would zero out these very small existing budgets for geothermal and hydro - it makes no sense at all," says V. John White, executive director of the Center for Energy Efficiency and Renewable Technologies, an environmental group based in Sacramento, Calif. "These are very important resources for our energy future that could replace the need for a lot of coal-fired power plants."

Indeed, the costs of lost opportunities from dropping such research could be enormous in the long run, recent federal studies suggest.

Geothermal is a case in point. Its power plants need water, heat, and permeable rocks no deeper than about three miles beneath the surface to generate affordable electricity, says Karl Gawell, executive director of the Geothermal Energy Association, a Washington trade group.

Today more than 60 geothermal plants with the capacity of about three big coal-fired power plants produce less than 1 percent of the nation's electricity.

Yet geothermal holds vast potential - at least 30,000 megawatts of identified resources developable by 2050 and more unidentified resources, much of it in Western states, the National Renewable Energy Laboratory reported in May.

Research aims at new technologies that can use underground zones with good heat but little water and those with lower temperature rocks deeper in the earth.

DOJ_NMG_0063372

"The idea that geothermal is a mature technology that doesn't need further research doesn't even pass the laugh test," says Mr. Gawell. "What they're saying is that if your program doesn't have to do with biofuels, wind, or solar, you won't have a program."

Meanwhile, the more than 5,400 potential "small hydro" power projects could produce about 20,000 megawatts of power, a DOE study in January found. And most would require no new dams at all, shunting a portion of a small river's flow to one side to make electricity. Others would add turbines to dams that don't have them yet.

Together, high-tech hydropower and geothermal resources could contribute at least enough power to replace more than 100 medium-size coal-fired power plants with emissions-free electricity - about the number now on the drawing board.

There have been moves in the Senate to restore DOE funding for geothermal, but far less support in the House, leaving uncertainty about the outcome, Gawell says. For hydropower, matters are worse. Though $4 million in funding has been proposed in the Senate, nothing has emerged from the House, observers say.

"There's this view that hydropower is a technology that's been around a long time, and there's not much more we can do to improve it - but we've got the next generation of hydropower - ocean, tidal, wave and conduit energy coming on," says Linda Church Ciocci, executive director of the National Hydropower Association, a Washington trade group.

Even those focused on environmental damage from dams worry about lost funding. "We'd like to see federal funding continue for new research on hydrokinetic systems and damless hydro," says Robbin Marks, director of the hydropower reform campaign at American Rivers, a Washington environmental group. "We're interested in understanding more about the environmental impact of those systems."

Power from tidal flows, waves, and irrigation canals are expanding the definition of hydropower - none of which are likely to get DOE research funding if the hydropower budget gets whacked, some observers say.

Others remain skeptical. "I find myself agreeing with the DOE argument that hydropower is a mature technology," says Jerry Taylor, the Cato Institute's director of Natural Resource Studies. "If there's economic merit to this area, then venture capitalists will put their money into it."

But that kind of waiting game would be a shame, says Trey Taylor, cofounder and president of Verdant Power in Arlington, Va. Two weeks ago his company received venture capital funding for its program. Next month, Verdant will deploy its first two underwater turbines in New York City's East River, the first step in an experimental technology that attempts to harness the tidal currents to create power.

But more firms would be competing to get into tidal power today - if the government shouldered more of the environmental research costs, Mr. Taylor says.

The current high cost of researching areas such as a technology's environmental impact makes it likely that a company will fail. He and his partners remortgaged their homes and begged friends for funds.

"I can understand the tight situation DOE is in," he says. "But what they're not seeing is that a whole new breed of technology has come on right now. The push for sustainable power is sweeping the globe."

Interior Near 2 New Pacts In Oil Leases (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The Interior Department, struggling to prevent the government from losing billions of dollars in royalties for oil and gas produced in publicly owned waters, said Thursday that it was close to agreement with 2 of the 56 companies that hold lucrative drilling leases in the Gulf of Mexico.

The two companies, Royal Dutch Shell and BP-Amoco, are among the biggest producers along the outer continental shelf.

But even as Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed outrage that the government could lose more than $10 billion over the next decade, the Bush administration said it flatly opposed House bills that would pressure oil companies into renegotiating flawed leases that the government signed in the late 1990's.

The 56 companies hold leases that allow them to extract billions of dollars in oil and gas from the Gulf of Mexico without paying any royalties, regardless of how high energy prices or the industry's profits might climb.

DOJ_NMG_0063373

Of those 56 companies, Interior officials told lawmakers on Thursday, 20 have responded in some way to pleas from the administration to voluntarily give up the incentives in times of high prices. But only 10 companies, including Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have actually begun negotiating and only 2 are near a pact.

At a rancorous House hearing, administration officials insisted they had to respect the "sanctity of contracts'' and should not do anything to force companies into a renegotiation.

"The administration believes that the federal government must be a reliable business partner and must honor its contractual obligations, even when, in retrospect, the terms of those contracts appear unfavorable,'' said Lynn Scarlett, deputy secretary of the Interior, at a hearing of the House Committee on Government Reform.

Ms. Scarlett opposed a bill that the House passed last May. That legislation would give the Interior Department more bargaining power by prohibiting the government from giving additional leases to companies that refuse to trim back benefits.

She also opposed an alternative bill, sponsored by House Republicans, that would impose a stiff "conservation fee'' on companies that refuse to give up some of the incentives.

That prompted a furious attack from Democratic lawmakers, who argued that the House bill would do nothing to breach valid contracts and simply gave the government more bargaining power with the oil companies.

"From the taxpayers' point of view, I think it is irresponsible to refuse to support additional leverage that would encourage these companies to come to table,'' said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts and a co-author of the House bill.

"What you're telling us is that, right now, you've got only 20 percent of the oil companies renegotiating their leases,'' Mr. Markey continued. "One out of five isn't bad in some areas, but when you're talking about potentially billions of dollars in taxpayer dollars, one in five isn't very high."

In what has now become a major scandal, the Interior Department inadvertently signed 1,100 drilling leases in the late 1990's that offered lucrative incentives to deepwater drillers, regardless of how high energy prices might climb.

Officials then covered up the mistake for nearly six years. In that time, the prices for oil and gas soared and the magnitude of the potential loss to taxpayers escalated to more than $10 billion.

But Interior officials are under fire for more than just the botched leases and the cover-up that followed. On Wednesday, the Interior Department's independent investigator for examining possible misconduct scathingly accused senior officials of repeatedly tolerating cronyism, ethical violations and cover-ups of incompetence.

"Simply stated, short of crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, charged at a subcommittee hearing of the House Government Reform Committee.

Mr. Devaney said the problems had preceded the Bush administration, but he bluntly criticized Mr. Bush's first Secretary of the Interior, Gale A. Norton, of perpetuating a culture of "denial, defense of the indefensible and delay."

On Thursday, Ms. Scarlett told lawmakers that "the department disagrees" with Mr. Devaney's critique and said he had made "broad and serious, yet vague allegations."

Ms. Scarlett said that the Bush administration had corrected scores of "material weaknesses" that it had inherited from the Clinton era; that its ethics office had "grown in stature" and that Dirk Kempthorne, who took over as Secretary of the Interior in May, had imposed a new emphasis on ethics as soon as he arrived.

But few lawmakers seemed convinced. Representative Darrell Issa, a California Republican who has held four hearings on the leasing disaster, complained that Interior Department had done little or nothing to improve the solicitor's office, which gave final approval to the leases but provided almost no documentation to explain why crucial restrictions were missing.

"There are no e-mails, nothing in writing, no paper trail," Mr. Issa said.

Democrats were far harsher. "This looks like an agency that has been captured by the industry it is supposed to oversee, with American taxpayers picking up the bill," said Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California.

Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York, noted that the Interior Department was recovering less than $50 million a year on average as a result of auditing and enforcement of oil and gas leases. By contrast, she said, the government recovered about $176 million a year from 1989 through 1998.

"We're missing billions and billions of dollars owed to American taxpayers," Ms. Maloney said. "It is inexcusable."

DOJ_NMG_0063374

As Border Crackdown Intensifies, A Tribe Is Caught In The Crossfire (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

ALIR JEGK, Ariz. -- Elsie Salsido was breast-feeding her baby when Border Patrol agents walked into her house unannounced this summer. "Are you Mexicans?" they demanded.

Salsido's four other children cowered on the bed of her eldest, a girl in second grade. Night had fallen on this village on Arizona's border with Mexico, nestled in a scrubland valley of stickman cactuses hemmed in by mountains that look like busted teeth. The agents explained their warrantless entry into Salsido's house as "hot pursuit." They said they were chasing footprints, she recalled, of illegal immigrants sneaking in from Mexico, just 1,000 feet away. But the footprints belonged to Salsido's children -- all Americans.

As the United States ramps up its law enforcement presence on the border with Mexico, places like Alir Jegk, a village of 50 families in south-central Arizona, are enduring heightened danger, as they are squeezed between increasingly aggressive bands of immigrant and drug smugglers and increasingly numerous federal agents who, critics say, often ignore regulations as they seek to enforce the law.

Alir Jegk's experience is complicated by the fact that it is on the second-biggest Indian reservation in the United States, belonging to the Tohono O'odham, or Desert People, who hunted deer and boar and harvested wild spinach and prickly pear in this region before an international border was etched through their land in 1853. Now, the Tohono O'odham Nation occupies the front line of the fight against drug and immigrant smuggling -- costing the poverty-stricken tribe millions of dollars a year and threatening what remains of its traditions.

"We have the undocumented and drug smugglers heading north and law enforcement heading south. We're smack in the middle," Vivian Juan-Saunders, chairwoman of the tribe, said in an interview at the tribal headquarters in Sells, Ariz. "We are being squeezed."

In testimony to the U.S. Senate, the tribe's vice chairman, Ned Norris Jr., described a "border security crisis that has caused shocking devastation of our land and resources."

About 11,000 Tohono O'odham live on a 2.8 million-acre reservation, the size of Connecticut, with a 75-mile-long border with Mexico. A rickety four-foot-tall, three-strand barbed-wire fence delineates the border, which is punctuated by 160 trails and four cattle crossings. For decades the nation saw little or no illegal traffic from Mexico. The main movement was members of the Tohono O'odham who live in the Mexican part of the reservation trickling into the United States for health services in Sells.

In the mid-1990s, however, the Clinton administration cracked down on illegal crossings in San Diego and El Paso. Instead of stopping illegal immigration and drug running, however, the operations simply rerouted traffic through the deserts of the Southwest. And in Arizona, Tohono O'odham land, bisected by State Highway 86 -- an easy link to Phoenix to the north and California to the west -- became ground zero.

The flow of drugs and undocumented immigrants through the reservation has caused a host of problems. Juan-Saunders estimated that about 1,500 illegal immigrants cross reservation land each day, depositing on average six tons of trash. Some well-traveled knolls have been renamed "Million Backpack Hill" because of the refuse.

The tribe routinely devotes more than 10 percent of its budget to coping with the crisis. Annually, Juan-Saunders said, the 71-member Tohono O'odham Police Department spends $3 million on problems related to illegal immigrants and drug traffickers. The reservation pays an additional $2 million each year to provide emergency health services for undocumented travelers. Since 2002, 315 crossers have died on the reservation's land, including, this year, a 3-year-old boy and an 11-year-old girl.

The Tohono O'odham are a poor nation, with an average per capita income of $8,000 a year, well below the U.S. average of $23,000 and the Indian average of $13,000. Forty percent of the families on the reservation live below the federal poverty line, and unemployment is at 42 percent. Juan-Saunders said an increasing number of nation members are sucked into the drug- and immigrant-smuggling business.

DOJ_NMG_0063375

Two of Juan-Saunders's relatives have been arrested on drug-related charges, tribal officials said. And in Alir Jegk, drug smugglers have plied Elsie Salsido's sister with so many narcotics over the years in their attempts to turn her into a mule that the woman has never been the same, residents say.

"The pressures have dramatically increased on the tribe over the last five years," said Robert A. Williams, a law professor at the University of Arizona who works as a judge in the tribe's courts. "The community is fairly well isolated, so they are very vulnerable to coyotes [immigrant smugglers] and drug runners. We've seen signs of gang activity coming from L.A. and Mexican gangs coming up."

Fifteen years ago, the nation, invoking its limited sovereignty, barred the Border Patrol from the reservation because its agents harassed the population, said Eileen M. Luna-Firebaugh, an expert on American Indian policy at the University of Arizona. But that policy changed after drug and immigrant smuggling skyrocketed, although the tribe was always more focused on narcotics, she said.

The tribe is home to the Shadow Wolves, a storied, largely Indian unit of U.S. Customs and Border Protection that uses ancient tracking techniques to chase down drug smugglers. But after the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, the Border Patrol has run the Shadow Wolves and has shifted their focus away from drugs and toward immigrant smuggling, prompting several senior officers to quit.

Nonetheless, under Juan-Saunders's leadership, which began in 2003, the tribal council has welcomed more federal law enforcement. It has allowed the Border Patrol to establish two permanent facilities on its land. It recently agreed to the construction of a 75-mile vehicle barrier, costing more than $1 million a mile, to replace the wobbly fence.

The tribe has complied with Border Patrol wishes to close one traditional gate connecting the American side of its land to the Mexican side. It has also recently consented to allow the National Guard to operate on the border, on the condition that the Guard repairs roads and "respects the people and the laws of this land," Juan-Saunders said.

Winning that respect, however, has not been easy. Tribal members are routinely harassed by federal agents, Juan-Saunders said. "They cross property without asking. They enter homes without knocking," she said.

In March, Juan-Saunders was driving her 8-year-old son in her Jeep, going 45 mph in a 55 zone, when she was ordered to pull over by a Border Patrol officer. She stopped by the side of the road, and the officer leapt out of his vehicle and pointed his gun at her. "Now I know what my constituents are experiencing," she said.

Juan-Saunders acknowledged having mixed feelings about ceding more of her nation's sovereignty to federal agencies. "But we are in dire straits here," she said.

Chuy Rodriguez, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in Tucson, said relations between the Border Patrol and the tribe are "getting better and better over time."

"There's a lot more dialogue with folks in positions of power," he said. He said that Border Patrol community relations officers make regular visits to the reservation and that his agency has established a process for complaints. Tribal representatives instruct Border Patrol agents about the tribe and its traditions.

"We can't go into anyone's property," he said. "We have to get someone from the Tohono O'odham police to come. However, if it's hot pursuit, it's a different story."

Back in Alir Jegk, Margaret Garcia, 68, and an older neighbor, Francisco Garcia, sum up the pressures facing the tribe.

Margaret Garcia, who lives in a two-room shack with, at last count, 19 cats and six dogs, said she awoke late one night to discover that Border Patrol agents, with shotguns and night-vision goggles, had established an observation post in her yard.

Francisco Garcia, on the other hand, used to live in Mexico. He was kicked out of his village by drug dealers, so he moved to the American side of the line. "I didn't want to die," he said.

"A long time ago there was no one but us," Margaret said. "It was peaceful. When the cactus was ripe, my daughters would go out with a stick to harvest the fruit. Now if we go out, the Border Patrol follows us. Everyone is a suspect."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Bring Charges Against Four (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

BINGHAMTON, N.Y. (AP) — A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted one man on a murder charge and three others for racketeering and narcotics conspiracy.

The men were part of a drug-trafficking ring that operated in the Ithaca area, New York City, Pennsylvania and North Carolina, said U.S. Attorney Glenn Suddaby.

Guillermo Payano, 30, of Ithaca, was charged with the murder of Alexander Miller, 24.

Miller was discovered in May 2000 on a partially overgrown service road leading into Buttermilk Falls State Park. He had been shot in the head.

Benoni Bryant, 29, Darnell Shepherd, 29, and Pablo Lopez, 25, all of Ithaca, were charged with conspiracy and racketeering.

Payano, Bryant and Shepherd are in custody. Lopez is still at large.

If convicted of the charges in the indictment, each defendant faces a possible sentence of life imprisonment and a $4 million fine.

The U.S. Justice Department has not yet determined whether it will seek the death penalty for Payano, Suddaby said.

5 Of 12 Suspects In Massive Drug Ring Appear In Court (AP)

By WILLIAM McCALL

AP, September 15, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — Five of the dozen suspects in what federal prosecutors say is a $20 million international drug ring started by high school friends made their initial appearance in court Thursday in the first step toward an expected trial in Idaho.

U.S. Magistrate Janice Stewart delayed reading of the charges in the 196-page indictment until attorneys could be appointed or retained for the five men.

They were among the 11 men arrested Wednesday by federal agents in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Colorado. One man, from California, remained a fugitive.

The five who appeared Thursday in federal court were: Mark Daniel Kitzman, 49, Lake Oswego; Damon John Marsh, 37, Portland; Mark M. Alders, 54, Lakeside; and Mark William Pursley, 32, and Kent Allen Jones, 51, Vancouver, Wash.

All wore blue prison clothing as they appeared separately to request lawyers through Ruben Iniguez, an attorney for the Federal Public Defender's office in Portland. Marsh was represented at the appearance by Mark Cross, an attorney who said he had known Marsh for years.

Stewart told each man they would face trial in U.S. District Court in Idaho and warned them they would have to reimburse the government if it was determined they could afford their own attorneys, rather than having a defender appointed by the court.

Prosecutors say the drug operation involved smuggling cocaine, marijuana and chemicals to make methamphetamine from Mexico and South America. They estimated that hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of tons of drugs were brought into the country over 30 years.

The indictment was issued by a federal grand jury in Boise last June and sealed until the arrests began on Wednesday.

The case began with the arrest of a suspected drug dealer, Lee Lang, and led to the indictment during what U.S. Attorney Tom Moss in Boise called "a classic case of 'follow the money.' "

The indictment seeks $24 million in cash and real estate forfeitures, including property in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Colorado, Hawaii and California.

23 Charged In Drug Raid (CHIT)

By Tony C. Yang

Chicago Tribune, September 15, 2006

Police today announced charges against 23 people after raiding a suspected drug house on Chicago's South Side Wednesday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0063377

During the raid, a police SWAT team used a power saw to cut through wrought iron and chain link fences barricading the home in the 5100 block of Honore Street in Chicago's Englewood neighborhood. The suspects threw bags of crack cocaine out the windows as officers closed in, police said today at a news conference.

Investigators said they targeted the house because it is located within 1,000 feet of several churches and schools.

Authorities said the suspects are all members of the Gangster Disciples street gang and they pedaled small packages of crack cocaine worth $5 each, earning $10,000 to $15,000 a day in drug sales. Also known as "nicks," the knotted plastic bags were often hidden inside and distributed from drug dealers' mouths, police said in a news release.

Several houses in the neighborhood were used as stash houses, where larger amounts of drugs were stored, according to the release.

Investigators said the gang had a counter-surveillance system to keep police at bay. Members with binoculars were posted to watch for police, and they would block the street by playing a card game so that only their customers could get by, police said.

Undercover officers from the Chicago Police Department and members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration worked on their investigation, dubbed "Operation Sith," for 2 ½ months before raiding the home, police said. During that time, investigators made 38 undercover purchases and five covert seizures of both narcotics and cash, according to the release.

Seven individuals have been arrested on federal drug conspiracy charges, and arrest warrants were issued for three others who also face federal charges.

In addition, nine suspects are charged with delivery of a controlled substance and four are charged with possession of a controlled substance, police said.

The DEA is currently analyzing the drugs confiscated during the raid, and has not yet estimated their total worth, police said.

Edgerton Case Gets Attention Of Feds (QCT)

By Deirdre Cox Baker

Quad-City (IA) Times, September 15, 2006

Federal officials decided late Wednesday to take up the case against David Robert McMenemy, the Michigan man who is accused of crashing his car into a Davenport medical center Monday because he thought it was an abortion clinic.

The case will be pursued through the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of Iowa, Davenport, and the Rock Island office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, or ATF.

Police say McMenemy, 45, came to Davenport from the suburbs of Detroit, and drove his compact car into the Edgerton Women's Health Center, 1510 E. Rusholme St., early Monday morning.

The facility was founded in 1972 to provide prenatal care and medical services to low-income and underprivileged women. It does not perform abortions, nor does it make abortion referrals, Center President Tom Fedje said.

After the car came to rest in the lobby area, Davenport police said McMenemy exited the vehicle and scattered gasoline over the car's interior before lighting it. He left the building and surrendered to Davenport firefighters, Fire Marshal Mike Hayman said.

Federal charges are appropriate in the case because McMenemy traveled across three states to commit the act of violence, Scott County Attorney Bill Davis said.

Local authorities have leveled a charge of second-degree arson against McMenemy. It's a Class C felony punishable by a maximum prison term of 10 years and a fine not exceeding $10,000. He is scheduled to be arraigned on that charge Oct. 5 in Scott County District Court, Davenport.

Deirdre Cox Baker can be contacted at (563) 383-2492 or dbaker@qctimes.com

'Dog The Bounty Hunter' Arrested (AP)

By Mark Niesse

AP, September 15, 2006

HONOLULU - TV reality star Duane "Dog" Chapman and two co-stars on his show were arrested Thursday in Hawaii on charges of illegal detention and conspiracy in the bounty hunters' capture three years ago of a cosmetics company heir.

DOJ_NMG_0063378

Chapman, son Leland Chapman and associate Timothy Chapman -- who is not related to the other Chapmans -- were taken into custody and did not resist arrest, said Mark Hanohano, U.S. Marshal for the district of Hawaii. "It went down without incident," Hanohano said.

Mona K. Wood, a publicist for the star of the popular cable series Dog The Bounty Hunter, said Chapman would be vindicated. "He arrests the bad guys -- and he is definitely not one of them," she said.

The charges stem from Chapman's capture of Max Factor heir Andrew Luster on June 18, 2003, in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, said Marshals spokeswoman Nikki Credic in Washington.

Chapman's capture of Luster, who had fled the country while on trial on charges he raped three women, catapulted the 53-year-old bounty hunter to fame and led to the reality series on A&E.

Chapman, shackled at his ankles and wearing a blue muscle T-shirt at his first court appearance Thursday, said the government was jealous of his success in hunting down criminals.

"You see what the American government is doing to us? They throw us in jail," Chapman said in a federal courtroom. ``I'm so upset about this."

The three are being held in Honolulu. Bail has not been set. They will face an extradition hearing to Mexico under terms of treaties between the U.S. and Mexico, Credic said.

Chapman's son Leland, 29, and Timothy Chapman, 41, assist Chapman in exploits chronicled for the TV show around the Hawaiian Islands. The show focuses on Chapman's family as much as the bounty hunting, which generally involves tracking down bail jumpers, often creating emotional scenes with repentant captives.

Charges have been pending against the three since local police in Mexico arrested them shortly after they roped in Luster. They posted bail but never returned to Puerto Vallarta for their court hearing on July 15, 2003, Credic said.

Mexican authorities demanded that the Chapmans transfer Luster to Mexican police. Their refusal to do so led to their initial arrest.

A U.S. warrant for their arrest was signed by a federal judge in Honolulu on Wednesday.

Chapman's wife, Beth, said he didn't do anything wrong.

"If Duane has to return to Mexico to take care of any misunderstanding, then that's what he will do," she said outside the courthouse.

Bounty Hunter Arrested In ’03 Case (NYT)

By David Carr

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Duane Chapman, a bounty hunter and the star of a reality television series, was arrested by federal marshals yesterday morning on charges stemming from a capture three years ago in Mexico.

Mr. Chapman captured Andrew Luster, the Max Factor heir who was convicted of raping three women.

Mr. Chapman, 53, was arrested at his house in Hawaii along with his son Leland Chapman, 29, and Timothy Chapman, 41, no relation.

The charges have been pending since they were arrested in Mexico after the capture.

In a twist that will not be lost on fans of Mr. Chapman’s program, “Dog the Bounty Hunter,” on the A&E cable network, Mexico is seeking to extradite him for posting bail and then failing to appear to answer criminal charges in July 2003.

He was held at the federal detention center in Honolulu.

His wife, Beth Chapman, also a star in the series, said Mr. Chapman left Mexico on the advice of his lawyers, who feared for his safety in the Mexican prison system.

Mexico is requesting extradition under treaties with the United States that allow one country to remand prisoners to the other.

Bounty hunting is illegal in Mexico, and the authorities there had demanded that Mr. Chapman transfer Mr. Luster to the local authorities, which he refused to do.

DOJ_NMG_0063379

IMMIGRATION:

Nervous Employers Re-Examine Practices In Wake Of Immigration Raids (LAW)

By Rebecca Riddick, Daily Business Review

Miami Daily Business Review, September 15, 2006

Federal immigration officials recently arrested 55 undocumented workers in a raid in Tallahassee. The workers from Mexico, Honduras and Guatemala, were employed by General Building Maintenance, which had a contract to clean state government buildings. They face deportation.

Federal officials declined to say how U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) found out about the illegal immigrants, or whether any company executives would face criminal charges.

Some South Florida labor and employment lawyers warn that such federal raids signal that companies here must take serious steps to ensure that they are not employing undocumented workers -- either directly or through subcontractors. That could have a major impact on Florida's economy, which quietly has depended on illegal workers.

Many employers in the state's large agricultural, tourism and construction industries are nervous. And so are immigrant workers.

Congress has hit an impasse in its debate over whether and how to crack down on illegal immigration. But ICE and its parent agency, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, have decided not to wait for new legislation. Relying on existing law, ICE has engaged in high-profile raids of worksites employing undocumented workers.

ICE also has proposed a plan to take action against employers based on their failure to respond to letters notifying them that their employees' Social Security numbers don't match information in government data bases.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has asked Congress for greater leeway in accessing and using evidence against employers. Under current law, ICE does not have access to information possessed by the Social Security Administration. Chertoff wants to allow data sharing so immigration agents can use nonmatching Social Security information as a lead to find illegals -- not just as evidence once illegals are found.

Unlike in the past, ICE isn't just seeking to assess civil monetary fines against companies found to have employed illegal aliens. It's also seeking criminal sanctions against executives for failing to follow a 1986 federal law making it illegal to hire undocumented workers.

These moves have caused many South Florida employers to change business practices, experts say. Employment lawyers say they're working closely with employers to set up more rigorous vetting of employees to ensure that there are no illegals on the payroll.

Attorney Sarah Tobocman, the Miami-based immigration practice chair for Gunster Yoakley & Stewart, said that in the past, the worst penalty an employer could expect for hiring an illegal immigrant was a civil monetary fine. Many companies built such fines into the cost of doing business. But the prospect of criminal charges against executives will cause companies to take serious precautions, she said.

Some Florida employer groups, particularly agricultural growers and builders, are looking to expand their reliance on immigrant workers brought into the United States on guest worker visas. They would like Congress to increase the number of such visas and ease the federal requirements on wages and benefits.

With the tougher enforcement by ICE, employers increasingly find themselves facing a Catch-22 situation. That's because while ICE is enforcing immigration laws, the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is enforcing anti-discrimination laws. Employers cannot discriminate in hiring based on the possibility that an applicant is an illegal alien.

Legal experts say the situation is dicey. In Florida, tourism, agriculture and construction -- three of the biggest industries -- all use lots of immigrant labor. Some employers in these industries long have employed workers without looking too carefully at their legal status. It's estimated that hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants are working in this state, including for large companies.

TEPID PUBLIC SUPPORT

DOJ_NMG_0063380

On the other hand, there's tepid public support in this state, particularly in South Florida, for a federal crackdown. Even many Florida Republican leaders favor a moderate approach, including a path toward legal residency for illegal immigrants currently living in the United States.

A recent Zogby International poll for the Miami Herald found that 65 percent of South Florida Republicans surveyed favor establishing a path to legalization for immigrants currently living illegally in the United States. The survey found that 77 percent of South Florida Democrats supported that approach.

Despite Floridians' relatively lenient views on immigration, some lawyers warn that South Florida employers soon may have to give up using undocumented workers.

Keil Hackley, the former deputy chief counsel of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and now a Weston-based immigration attorney with Hackley Serrone, said it's just a matter of time before Florida employers are targeted for stricter enforcement. ICE and DHS "are putting their warnings out there," Hackley said. "They are absolutely going after employers who are profiting from illegal aliens."

Others, however, dispute that the Bush administration's current efforts are sincere or will last for long. Gregory Schell, a Lake Worth employment attorney with the farmworker rights group Florida Legal Services, argued that the recent raids and enforcement actions are driven by the White House's election-year efforts to appease conservative, anti-immigration Republican voters. He said all will be forgotten after Nov. 8 -- election day.

Indeed, federal officials so far have gone easy in South Florida, considering the large population of illegal immigrants here. The state's citrus groves and tomato fields would be a rich harvest for ICE agents if the agency chose to conduct raids there.

Schell estimated that more than 95 percent of workers on citrus groves in Florida are undocumented. Ray Gilmer, of the Florida Fruit and Vegetable Association, a growers' trade group, said the industry did not have any estimates on the number of illegal workers employed by the industry.

So far there have been no reported raids on the growers. "It would be an easy target," said Anis Nouhad Saleh of Saleh & Associates in Miami, who serves as president of the South Florida chapter of the American Immigration Lawyers Association.

Barbara Gonzalez, a Miami-based ICE spokeswoman, said she could not discuss how companies are chosen for raids because that's "law enforcement-sensitive information."

LEGISLATION STALLED

Based on the most recent U.S. Census numbers, the Washington, D.C.-based Pew Hispanic Center estimates that there are more than 11 million illegal immigrants living in the United States. With between 800,000 and 950,000 illegal immigrants estimated to live in Florida, the state ranks third behind California and Texas in the number of illegals.

These immigrants fill jobs in citrus groves and tomato fields, on construction and roofing sites, in the hospitality and restaurant industries, and in janitorial and landscaping services.

Since Congress passed the Immigration Reform and Control Act in 1986, it has been illegal for employers to hire undocumented workers. The act prescribes civil and criminal penalties for employers convicted of knowingly hiring unauthorized workers. Those with a pattern and practice of violating the law are subject to criminal sanctions.

The 1986 law made the I-9 form a key enforcement document. Employers must fill out the I-9 and verify an employee's employment status within three days of the person starting work.

For most of the past 20 years, however, these rules have not been rigorously enforced. The Immigration and Naturalization Service -- the predecessor of ICE -- sometimes would slap civil fines on noncompliant employers. But for the most part, the rules were dead letters.

"Years ago, things could slide," Saleh said.

Then, over the past year, President Bush and conservative Republican leaders spearheaded a national debate over how to address illegal immigration.

Last December, the Republican-controlled House of Representatives passed a hard-line immigration bill that would make it a felony to be in the country illegally, substantially increase border patrols, order the construction of a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, and boost civil and criminal penalties against employers for violations.

DOJ_NMG_0063381

The House bill would require employers to shoulder more of the enforcement burden. The bill would set up a telephone- or electronic media-based employment verification system. That system would allow employers to verify the immigration status of new hires within three days.

In contrast, in May, the GOP-controlled Senate passed its own immigration bill. That bill, which has President Bush's support, would set up an amnesty program for undocumented immigrants already living in the United States and establish a path to legal residency. Like the House bill, the Senate measure also would require employers to take greater steps to ensure their workers are legal.

Even though there's broad agreement that something needs to be done about illegal immigration, the House and Senate have been unable to reach a compromise.

NO-MATCH LETTERS

In the absence of legislation, the Department of Homeland Security and ICE have charged ahead with their own enforcement policies.

Over the past six months, ICE has conducted raids on industrial pallet producer IFCO Systems North America and Midwest Airport Services, among others.

The raid on IFCO followed a yearlong probe that found more than half of the company's employees in 2005 had Social Security numbers that did not match identifying information in the Social Security Administration data base. The raid apprehended 1,187 illegal alien employees at 40 worksites around the country.

Seven current and former IFCO managers have been charged in Albany, N.Y., with harboring illegal aliens for financial gain. In addition, two managers at Midwest Airport have been sentenced to nine and 15 months in federal prison and fined a total of $750,000.

Under current agency rules, ICE cannot use no-match letters from the Social Security Administration to go after employers for hiring undocumented workers.

A no-match letter informs an employer that an employee's recorded Social Security number, which the employee submitted on an I-9 form, does not match the name listed for that number in the Social Security Administration database.

But in June, ICE proposed a new rule that would put employers on constructive notice from the time they received a no-match letter.

Homeland Security estimates that as many as 10 percent of the 250 million W-2s the Social Security Administration receives each year belong to workers whose names do not match their Social Security numbers.

Experts caution that there are many causes for no-matches, including typographical errors and name changes. But no-matches also result from illegal immigrants falsely using other people's Social Security numbers or providing bogus federal work permits to employers.

The proposed rules would allow ICE officials to use no-match letters as proof that employers "knowingly" employed illegal immigrants. It would require the employer to take certain actions within a set period of time.

The proposal also would close the subcontractor loophole. Currently, employers can hide behind subcontractors who hire undocumented workers for their projects. Employers could claim that they did not know that their subcontractors were employing illegal labor. Without proof of actual knowledge on the part of the employer, the government couldn't charge the employer with a crime.

Under the proposed rule, once an employer receives a no-match letter for employees -- even if they are hired through a subcontractor -- ICE would consider the employer on notice that it employed an illegal immigrant.

Lani Kahn Drody, president of the Builders Association of South Florida and Lowell Homes, said her organization considers it unreasonable to expect employers to check the legal status of all their subcontractors' employees.

Ray Gilmer, of the Florida Fruit & Vegetable Association, said it's not unusual for Florida growers to receive no-match letters. Farmers cannot turn away potential employees who submit legitimate looking documents. Gilmer said his industry's initial reaction to the new no-match safe-harbor proposal was not all positive.

It will "require a lot of the [employer's] time to hold the hand of the employees in question," he said. "But if they have to do it, they have to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0063382

WORKER INSECURITY

Bruce Nissen, director of research at the Center for Labor Research and Statistics at Florida International University, said the national immigration debate has created a strong feeling of insecurity among immigrant workers.

Gilmer said even the rumor of an immigration raid will cause immigrant workers, both legal and illegal, to scatter and not go to work. This leads to major worker shortages for growers.

Homeland Security officials said they did not know when the agency would issue a final regulation.

"One thing [ICE and the DHS] could do is sit on it until after the Nov. 7 election and then rule," he said. "Then [they can] water it down or come down hard. But people's ballots have already been cast."

In the past, employers often were advised by their attorneys not to worry about receiving a no-match letter, because there are many reasons a no-match can occur.

But now, South Florida employment attorneys say local employers are taking no-match letters more seriously.

Hackley said she advises employers that receive no-match letters to determine the true immigration status of the employee while at the same time not jumping to any conclusion.

When the no-match letters first started going out in 2002, she said, thousands of workers resigned or were fired because employers were unsure of their employees' immigration status. If ICE steps up enforcement based on no-match letters, she cautioned, that problem could be major in South Florida because of its large population of immigrant workers.

"This use of the no-match letter is premature and a potentially dangerous enforcement tool," Hackley said. The Social Security Administration database is "notoriously error-prone and will undoubtedly result in wrongful terminations."

In addition, some employment lawyers complain that the 63-day time frame proposed in the new ICE regulation for resolving discrepancies in Social Security information is unreasonable. Tobocman said that would leave employers little choice but to fire the worker.

Tobocman said she is working with clients to set up internal training programs for the proper completion of employment verification forms and for detecting fraudulent green cards, work permits and Social Security cards.

"Now more than ever, it's essential that employers have written policies in place" for when they receive a no-match letter, she said. She advises her clients that they also should have policies in place for employee compliance and what to do in case of a government audit or document request.

LOOKING FOR ALTERNATIVES

Drody, of the Builders Association of South Florida, contended that most builders and developers don't know how many illegal workers they employ. She said builders and developers need to make sure they work with reputable subcontractors to reduce the number of illegal workers.

Edie Ousley, a spokeswoman for the Florida Home Builders Association in Tallahassee, said many employers don't know how to detect fraudulent documents.

Both of their groups favor an expanded guest worker program that would allow skilled workers who already are in the United States illegally to continue working in the construction industry. Undocumented workers "want to pay their taxes and be a part of the system instead of hiding in the crevices," Drody said.

In the agricultural industry, Fritz Roka, a University of Florida agricultural economist, said stepped-up enforcement against illegal workers and employers that hire them may push growers to further explore mechanized farming techniques.

Roka said there also is increasing interest among growers in guest worker programs.

Through the federal H-2A guest worker visa program, Los Angeles-based agricultural staffing company Global Horizons provides farm workers for growers. Gregory Schell said he has heard that growers in the South Florida area have used the company to bring in workers under the H-2A program.

Merle Dautrey, a spokesman for Global Horizons, estimated that between 2 percent and 4 percent of farmworkers nationwide are in the United States on H-2A visas. As immigration enforcement tightens, that percentage is likely to increase, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0063383

The United Farm Workers union has supported the guest worker visa program, said union spokesman Marc Grossman. The UFW has signed a contract with Global Horizons requiring that all guest workers brought in by the company will become members of the union.

But workers don't come cheap under guest workers' visa program. Under the H-2A visa, temporary guest workers can come into the country for a specified maximum period of time, and employers are obligated to provide housing and pay at least the Adverse Effect Wage Rate for the state. For 2006, the AEWR in Florida was $8.56 an hour. There is no cap on the number of workers who come in under the H-2A program.

Gilmer said the agricultural industry is working to modify the H-2A program to make it a more attractive choice for farmers and growers by allowing growers to provide housing vouchers instead of actual housing for workers. Growers also seek to speed up the approval process for bringing in guest workers.

Grossman said that if farmers cannot find legal workers at affordable wages, farming will move overseas.

'MASSIVE IMPACT'

Employment and immigration experts are split on whether the Bush administration's recent moves signal that employers need to seriously change how they do business.

That uncertainty arises because the country is split on how to handle the immigration issue.

Miami pollster Sergio Bendixen of Bendixen & Associates wrote in March that "an overwhelming majority of legal immigrants think that the undocumented 'take jobs that legal residents and citizens do not want to do.' These legal immigrants also feel that the undocumented have a positive impact on the quality of life of Americans and 'help the economy by providing low-cost labor.' "

FIU's Nissen said that if federal officials were serious about cracking down on South Florida employers and their illegal workers, "it would have a massive and very serious impact." But he predicted that the administration will engage in "a selective, showy, sporadic set of arrests to create fear, but not to the point of harming farming or industry."

Sarah Tobocman disagrees. It's no secret that South Florida businesses have a high percentage of undocumented workers, she said. Businesses should expect to see greater federal enforcement of immigration laws. "Employers need to be prepared for a change," she warned.

2 Polish Nationals Plead Guilty In US To 'Leasing' Illegal Workers (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

(AP) - FORT LAUDERDALE, Florida-Two Polish nationals have pleaded guilty to leasing out illegal immigrants from eastern Europe to work on U.S. farms, dairies and factories, prosecutors said. A third was sentenced to prison a year after pleading guilty to similar federal charges.

Jaroslaw Sawczuk, 39, and Jozef Bronislaw Bogacki, 43, pleaded guilty Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra to federal charges of fraud and conspiracy to transport, house and otherwise encourage illegal immigrants to remain in the United States.

Pavel Preus, 39, pleaded guilty to similar charges in September 2005. Marra sentenced him to 37 months in prison, followed by three years of supervised release. Preus was also ordered to pay $950,000 for unpaid payroll taxes.

Sentencing for Bogacki and Sawczuk was scheduled Dec. 15. Both face a maximum of 20 years in prison and fines up to $500,000. The U.S. government is also seeking the forfeiture of Bogacki's assets.

E-mails sent to the individual attorneys representing Sawczuk and Preus were not immediately returned. The after-hours recording for Bogacki's federal public defender in Tampa would not accept an incoming message, the phone at the office of Sawczuk's attorney rang unanswered late Wednesday and Preus' attorney did not immediately return a message left at his office.

Sawczuk is a Polish citizen and lived in Coral Springs. Bogacki was born in Poland but became a naturalized U.S. citizen and lived in Clearwater. Preus is a Polish citizen and lived in Pompano Beach.

The three men were arrested in April 2005. Three citizens of the Slovak Republic also named in the original 26-count indictment are believed to be overseas, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0063384

The indictment alleged that the employee-leasing ring, beginning in 1995 provided American companies in the Midwest and Southeast with more than 550 unauthorized workers from Hungary, Czech Republic and Poland, among other countries. The workers entered the U.S. on tourist visas.

The six defendants named in the indictment failed to pay $6 million in payroll taxes and laundered more than $20 million, prosecutors said.

Congress Passes Major Security Measures (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — Congress is scrambling to pass long-delayed domestic and border security bills, as Republicans and the Democrats try to control the issues ahead of the midterm elections — and to blame each other for blocking progress.

The most far-reaching action on Thursday was in the Senate, which voted, 98 to 0, to approve a six-year port security package costing more than $5 billion that includes deadlines to install radiation detectors at the largest ports and encourages shippers and ports worldwide to improve guarding containers against stowaway weapons.

Earlier, the House approved, 283 to 138, a bill that calls for a two-layer fence along 700 miles of the border with Mexico, a measure advertised as an immigration enforcement and antiterror initiative.

Negotiations were under way on measures to tighten security at chemical plants and revamp the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The Senate port bill included language for mass transit and rail security programs, including random passenger and baggage screening at certain stations and fire-safety improvements for Amtrak tunnels in the Northeast corridor.

With just two weeks before Congress plans to begin its election recess, the debate has been intensely partisan. Democrats have tried to force Republicans to consider expansions that could add billions of dollars in costs in the port security bill by adopting, for example, all the outstanding recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission.

"Let's see if they vote against this," Senator Henry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the minority leader, said this week.

Republicans have generally succeeded in blocking such last-minute amendments, after condemning them as not-so-subtle efforts to kill or delay the bills.

"This is politics at its very worst," Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, said on the floor Thursday. "If Democrats spend half as much time fighting terrorists as they do this administration, America would win this war a lot faster."

Democrats say it is the Republicans who are to blame for the delay.

"It is not about us,'' Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House minority leader, said. "It is about the president of the United States and this Republican Congress, and is our country as safe as it could be. Republicans are in charge of everything."

The Senate port bill, which the Bush administration supports and which is similar to a measure that the House has passed, would require installing radiation detection equipment by the end of 2007 at 22 ports that receive 98 percent of the incoming cargo, a goal that the Homeland Security Department has set.

It also writes into law two programs to give accelerated clearance to cargo from ports that pre-screen containers for weapons or containers shipped on behalf of companies that have agreed to assure their security from the factory until they being loaded onto ships.

The bill would authorize $5.5 billion for port security over six years, including adding 1,000 customs and border officers and $400 million in port security grants. It would also authorize $1.2 billion for rail security and $2.4 billion in grants for security on mass transit.

The bill would extend some port user fees to pay some of the costs, but it remains unclear whether Congress will appropriate enough money to finance the rest or whether the fees will be set aside for security.

DOJ_NMG_0063385

The fence proposal represents a last-minute push by Republicans for at least part of their border security agenda. A similar requirement was included in December in broader immigration measures in the House. That bill stalled after a dispute with the Senate over a temporary-worker program to let some illegal immigrants remain here.

House Republicans also promised on Thursday to increase the number of Border Patrol agents, increase prosecutions of smugglers of immigrants and criminalize the building of tunnels under the border.

More than 60 Democrats joined with Republican House members to vote for the fence bill. Other Democrats in the House and Senate ridiculed it, saying that the fence alone would not solve the border problem and that the bill did not provide the more that $2 billion that it would cost to build.

Republican leaders are hoping to insert language into the larger budget bill for domestic security that is in a conference committee to address chemical plant security, FEMA restructuring and, perhaps, additional provisions.

The rules on chemical plants have support of the administration as well as Democrats and Republicans in Congress. The negotiations are trying to compromise on how demanding they should be.

A proposal backed by Republicans and opposed by environmentalists would let the owners of chemical plants decide what safety measures to adopt. It would prohibit the federal government from mandating that they consider using inherently safer chemicals.

House Passes Border Fence (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

The House yesterday easily approved building 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border in an effort to get major border-security legislation on President Bush's desk before November's elections.

"The time to address the border-security emergency is now, before Congress leaves for the November election," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, applauding the Republican-backed measure and introducing a slate of new border-security measures that he hopes to pass this month.

Yesterday's border-fence bill was approved on a 283-138 vote. The vast majority of House Republicans were joined by 64 Democrats to support the measure. Six Republicans voted against it.

In addition to building double-layered fences along 700 miles of the southern border, the Secure Fence Act also changes Border Patrol policy to allow agents to forcibly disable fleeing vehicles along the border. The measure would also deploy cameras, ground sensors and unmanned aerial vehicles to monitor the border.

Democrats dismissed the vote as "another political gimmick" by House Republicans who passed a tough border-security bill last year but have since been unable to persuade the Republican Senate to take it up. The Senate remains intent on its own bill that tightens border security but at the same time grants citizenship rights to some 10 million illegal aliens and creates a guest-worker program that will usher hundreds of thousands more foreign laborers into the U.S.

Yesterday, House Democrats called the 700-mile fence a new "Berlin wall" and expressed concern that it would drive illegal crossers deep into the dangerous desert in search of an unimpeded crossing. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, California Democrat, added, "It does nothing to secure our northern border."

Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican, strongly supported the measure. "It's about a thousand miles short of where it ought to be," he said, "but I'll take 700 miles."

When the House last year approved its border-security legislation, it included almost exactly the same fencing. The fence came to symbolize what many Democrats said was an unforgiving bill. They said the fence proved that Republicans harbored a hostility toward immigrants.

But by yesterday, more than 20 Democrats had switched their position to support the border fence -- including several who face tough elections this fall.

Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Tennessee Democrat who is running for the Senate, said, "For the country to be secure, we have to have control over who gets in and who's allowed to stay."

DOJ_NMG_0063386

Asked why he opposed the fence last year, he said the current proposal was "more comprehensive." Mr. Ford bristled at the question of whether his change of heart had anything to do with his upcoming statewide election in a state that polls show supports tough immigration policies.

After the vote yesterday, Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat who also switched his vote, was waiting in an out-of-the-way hallway beside a bank of elevators.

When asked by a reporter why he switched his vote, Mr. Mollohan first responded, "How did you find me?"

After gathering his thoughts for a moment, he said he supported yesterday's fence bill because it "makes a statement for consideration" of increased funding and even tougher illegal-immigration enforcement measures. Mr. Mollohan, who faces a challenge from the right this fall, not only voted against the fence last year but also voted against the entire House border-security bill.

Asked if his election in two months had anything to do with his position switch, Mr. Mollohan replied: "The election two months away has something to do with everything we do up here."

Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, also supported yesterday's bill after opposing the fence and the border-security bill last year.

During the August recess, he said he attended four town-hall meetings where the issue of illegal immigration dominated voter concerns. "The people who spoke up were almost unanimously opposed to illegal immigration."

Still, he said, the upcoming elections had nothing to do with his change of heart on the issue.

"Voting against the fences would have helped me more politically," Mr. Moran said.

After yesterday's House vote, Senate Republicans remain uncommitted to bringing the measure to the floor for a final vote, where many think it would be approved. Republican leaders said they are considering attaching the bill to other must-pass legislation to get it through the Senate.

House Approves U.S.-Mexican Border Fence (AP-Y)

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP, September 15, 2006

The House voted for the second time in a year to erect a fence along a third of the U.S.-Mexican border, part of a Republican effort to keep illegal immigration an issue before voters.

A new 700 miles of double-layered fencing won approval on a 283-138 vote, a bigger margin than last December when the House passed it as part of a broader bill that also would have made being an illegal immigrant a felony. The nearly 2,000-mile border now has about 75 miles of fencing.

Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said the separate fence bill was needed to show Americans "we can take meaningful action to secure the border."

The House's bill last December and one passed by the Senate last May are so far apart on issues that Republican leaders haven't even tried to negotiate a compromise.

The main difference is that the Senate bill would provide legal status to millions of illegal immigrants already in the U.S., a concept supported by President Bush but opposed by most House Republicans. The Senate bill calls for 370 miles of fencing along the Mexican border.

Supporters of the new House bill said the new fencing would let Border Patrol agents focus more on apprehending illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico rather than having to man the entire border.

"We have to come to grips with the fact that our Border Patrol agents need a border fence on our southern border ... where we're now facing infiltration by members of terrorist organizations like Hezbollah," said Rep. Ed Royce, R-Calif.

The bill passed Thursday doesn't pay for the fence. Republicans, estimating the cost at more than $2 billion, said that will be covered in a later spending bill. Democrats estimated the fence would cost $7 billion, based on information from the Department of Homeland Security on costs per mile of a double-layer fence.

"This is nothing more than political gamesmanship in the run-up to the midterm elections. Sounds good. Does nothing," said Rep. Alcee Hastings, D-Fla.

DOJ_NMG_0063387

Democrats accused Republicans of playing upon voters' fears to score political points. Rep. Lloyd Doggett, D-Texas, said Republicans were trying to confuse Americans into thinking "Osama bin Laden is heading north in a sombrero."

The bill also directs the Homeland Security Department to take control of the border in 18 months and gives border agents new authority to stop fleeing vehicles. It also calls for a study of the need for a fence on the U.S.-Canadian border.

Meanwhile, the House Administration Committee approved a bill to require states to ask for photo identification from voters by November 2008 and proof of citizenship by 2010. The full House could vote on it as early as next week.

House leaders unveiled other border security bills addressing immigrant gangs, speedier deportations and other issues they plan to consider.

Senate Republicans said its unlikely the fence proposal would pass in that chamber as a single bill, but might win approval if attached to spending bills.

The House fence bill is HR 6061; the voter ID bill is HR 4844.

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov

House Votes To Boost Border Security; Broader Immigration Issues Remain (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House on Thursday easily passed a bill calling for construction of lengthy sections of double-layered fencing along the U.S. border with Mexico, sending the legislation to a Senate that appeared inclined to approve that and other security measures.

The 283-138 vote demonstrated that even as Capitol Hill remained deadlocked over what to do about the millions of illegal immigrants already in this country, bipartisan support existed for significantly toughening border security, especially as the November election neared.

And though House Republicans emphasized that enforcement should come first, they gave no indication of when — or even whether — they'd support broader immigration measures, such as a guest worker program, that are supported by the Senate, President Bush and farmers and other businesspeople.

House Republicans promoted the fence bill as the first phase of a larger border-security package they unveiled Thursday. It includes a measure that would make it a crime to dig border tunnels and another that would end a provision in immigration law that protects Salvadorans from deportation.

In the Los Angeles area, and increasingly in other parts of the nation, gangs with roots in El Salvador are a significant crime problem.

The fence bill mandates the construction of 700 miles of fencing along several sections of the 2,000-mile border: around Tecate and Calexico, Calif., along most of the Arizona stretch, and in heavily populated areas of Texas and New Mexico.

The bill requires the Department of Homeland Security to prevent "all unlawful entries into the United States" within 18 months after the bill is enacted; urges the department to allow Border Patrol agents to use greater force against smuggler vehicles; and orders a study on security at the northern border with Canada.

The California delegation split mostly along party lines; only two Democrats, Dennis Cardoza of Atwater and Jim Costa of Fresno, joined all 20 Republicans in supporting the bill.

House leaders said they were working with the Senate to determine how to get the measures to Bush as quickly as possible. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Congress should finish considering all of them by the end of September.

"Republicans believe we can have a no-penetration border," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Of the fence proposal, he said: "If we build it, they will no longer come illegally."

Asked when the House might back a guest-worker program or other nonenforcement measures, Hastert said: "If we get a virtual no-penetration program on the border, then we can look at a lot of things."

DOJ_NMG_0063388

Debate on overhauling immigration laws has been deadlocked for months.

Enforcement is a priority for the Senate, but many senators believe it cannot work effectively unless it is accompanied by a guest worker program to help meet the labor needs of the agricultural and hospitality industries, and a program to draw the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S. into the legal system — a position favored by Bush. Those provisions were in a bill approved by the Senate in May.

Many senators in both parties argue that if this year's Congress ignores these issues and focuses only on border security, it will have shirked its responsibilities and ultimately failed to adequately address the complexity of the immigration problem.

Even so, some senators expressed cautious support for the House border security package, even as they pointed to elements they thought it lacked.

"I'm not going to take a position against it," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who helped write the Senate-passed bill. But, he added, the House bill is "not comprehensive immigration reform … it's just security."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who wrote a bill criminalizing the construction of tunnels under the border, said she was delighted to see a similar measure in the House border security package. But she expressed disappointment that there was no provision to help California farmers get access to workers.

With California in the middle of its peak harvest season and Florida's orange harvest set to begin next month, agriculture is a concern for lawmakers of all political stripes. Rep. Adam H. Putnam (R-Fla.), who chaired the all-Republican meeting that led to the border security package, appeared Wednesday at a rally organized by farmers, restaurant owners and other businesses dependent on immigrant labor.

With the administration increasing crackdowns on employers who hire illegal workers and an emphasis in Congress on enforcement, growers are getting nervous, lawmakers said.

"The status quo is killing farmers," said Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.). "They are desperate. I've never seen anything like it."

On Thursday, Putnam said the House wanted to restore confidence in the government's ability to secure the border before addressing labor needs. But with oranges left unpicked because of labor shortages last year and the new harvest season approaching, he said he didn't "see any way to get this resolved before the fall harvest."

Democrats in both chambers dismissed the border measures as a political ploy, particularly considering that the House had already passed many of their provisions, including the fencing requirement.

"I think it's sad when House leadership has sought to take an important issue and turn it into a political platform," said Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee (D-Texas), who noted that thorny issues such as Medicare, Iraq and the Gulf Coast hurricane recovery were getting little attention from the GOP.

Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Texas) accused House Republicans of using immigration as a scare tactic, conflating terrorists with immigrants looking for work so that Americans would think that "Osama bin Laden is heading north in a sombrero."

House Passes Border-Fence Bill, Changes To Rules On Earmarks (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Wrapping big bows on small packages, House Republicans advanced two modest pre-election initiatives hoping to blunt public anger at Congress's failure to address illegal immigration and lobbying abuses.

Back-to-back bills yesterday would add hundreds of miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border and establish new House procedures to try to fence in lawmakers' appetites for adding pork-barrel projects to annual appropriations bills.

In both cases, the leadership's primary concern was to try to help its vulnerable members shore up support among conservatives ahead of the Nov. 7 elections. But the gap between the two bills' provisions and what had been promised months ago is so great that the exercise could bolster Democrats' call for more change in Washington.

"We've been awash in talk of reform," said Rep. David Obey (D., Wis.) "But now seven weeks before the election, we see the majority has labored long and produced a mouse."

The so-called "Secure Fence Act" sailed through on a 283-138 vote, even though it was introduced only 24 hours earlier and provides no money to actually build the 700 miles of double-layered reinforced fencing along five stretches in California,

DOJ_NMG_0063389

Texas, Arizona and New Mexico. At a cost of $9 million to $10 million a mile, the total federal investment would run $6 billion to $7 billion altogether, but Republicans are betting the political dividends will be immediate in November.

"It is essential to do this today to tell the American people we have got the message," said Rep. Peter King (R., N.Y.), chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. "A fence is not the only answer, but an essential part of the answer."

Democrats denounced the measure as more "pontification" than legislation, yet the sharpest criticism came from departing Rep. James Kolbe (R., Ariz.), who has tried unsuccessfully to convince the House to take a more comprehensive approach -- akin to the Senate's -- to overhauling immigration policy.

"What we need to do is...walk 100 yards across the Capitol to the other side and negotiate" with the Senate, Mr. Kolbe said.

President Bush, at a meeting with House Republicans, also restated his support for a broader bill that will address the millions of undocumented workers in the U.S. But the House leadership believes the safer political course is to focus before the elections only on border-security measures such as the proposed fence, which is popular with conservative voters.

The second measure adopted yesterday -- by a 245-171 vote -- is also tailored to appease conservatives, who have complained about the growth of government spending under Republican rule and the explosion in the number of special-interest spending "earmarks" added by both parties to annual appropriations bills.

In many instances this reflects traditional pork-barrel politics to win votes at home. But amid the lobbying scandals of the past year, earmarks also have been exposed as almost a new political currency in which members steer money to projects and are rewarded with favors and campaign contributions financed by the lobbyists involved.

The rules changes do more to promote transparency rather than guarantee an end to the practice. As a practical matter, the real impact won't be felt until after the election. "The politics of earmark reform is a lot bigger than the substance of earmark reform," said Rep, Jack Kingston (R., Ga.).

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R., Calif.) urged support even as he admitted that his party hadn't reached "the goal line" of what is needed to address abuses.

Fred Wertheimer, a longtime activist for tighter ethics rules in Congress, offered a scathing critique. "The earmark rules changes are an illusionary trick being offered up in the hopes that the public will ignore the miserable failure by the House to address the worst congressional corruption scandals in decades," he said.

House Votes To Build 700 Miles Of Fence Along The U.S.-Mexico Border (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The House voted 283-138 on Thursday to construct more than 700 miles of two-layered fencing along the porous Southwest border, but most Democrats denounced the plan as blatant political posturing in advance of the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Afterward, House GOP leaders unveiled a package of other relatively non-controversial border-security initiatives, expressing confidence that they could win passage in the Senate and advance to the president's desk before lawmakers quit work at the end of the month to campaign for re-election.

But the Senate outlook remained quite uncertain, as senators of both parties and President Bush have insisted that tough border security measures should be passed only if part of more-comprehensive legislation.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., hinted that House leaders might be willing to consider more-contentious elements of immigration legislation - including Bush's proposed guest-worker program - if they are satisfied that Congress first has moved aggressively to secure U.S. borders.

"If we get a virtual no-penetration program on the border, then we can look at a lot of different things," Hastert said.

But other lawmakers said that, with time running out, it appears virtually impossible for the House and Senate to find common ground on divisive immigration issues that have kept them deadlocked for months.

House leaders have refused to consider a comprehensive Senate-passed bill that would put millions of illegal immigrants on a path toward permanent legal status and U.S. citizenship. The measure also includes a version of the president's guest-worker plan, as well as stiffer border-enforcement measures.

DOJ_NMG_0063390

Bush, who met Thursday morning on Capitol Hill with Republican House members, this week renewed his call for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. His administration has embraced limited fencing as a partial solution to strengthening the border, but not to the extent proposed by the House.

The fence proposal is identical to one that was included in an immigration enforcement bill that the House passed last December. With that measure sidelined in the stalemate with the Senate, House leaders resurrected the proposed $2.2 billion barrier as the first element of their latest border security package.

The "Border Security Now" agenda recycles several provisions from the stalled House and Senate bills, including $2.3 billion for 1,200 new Border Patrol agents next year, a crackdown on smugglers and criminal aliens and stiff penalties for the construction of border tunnels.

Sixty-four Democrats joined 219 Republicans in voting for the fence; 131 Democrats and six Republicans voted against it.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who sponsored a similar tunnel provision in the Senate, said she welcomed the House version of her proposal but withheld judgment on other provisions until she takes a closer look. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a leading architect of the Senate bill, said he would support proposals to strengthen the border but also said he wants to study the House initiatives before taking a position.

The largest section of fencing in the House bill would reach 361 miles from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz. A 22-mile section would be built near a port entry in Tecate, Calif., in east San Diego County. Three sections would be in Texas - a 51-mile stretch from Del Rio to Eagle Pass; 176 miles from Laredo to Brownsville and 88 miles stretching from El Paso westward to Columbus, N.M.

The bill also urges the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to study the feasibility of erecting similar barriers along the country's northern border with Canada.

It also requires the DHS to achieve operational control over both borders through a "virtual fence" that includes cameras, ground sensors, unmanned aerial vehicles and integrated surveillance technology. Five industry teams are competing for a multibillion-dollar contract to assemble the virtual fence, and the DHS expects to announce a winner by Sept. 30.

Republican leaders said the proposed barriers would have support in the Senate, which already has endorsed 370 miles of fencing and authorized $1.8 billion to fund it.

But Democrats said Republicans are trying to show conservative constituents that they are getting tough on immigration to bolster support in the elections.

"This is the same bill they passed before - the same monstrous bill," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "We're not going to play their silly little games."

Republicans argued that the fence, when coupled with their other initiatives, would answer public demands for urgently need safeguards to shore up the borders against illegal immigration and potential terrorism. Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, called it "the first long step" in a comprehensive border security plan.

"The American people expect us to secure the border," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Overstating Border Reform's Price (WP)

By Robert Greenstein And James Horney

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Would offering undocumented immigrants a path to legalization bust the federal budget? Critics of the Senate immigration bill, which seeks to crack down on illegal immigration while giving many currently undocumented workers a chance to work legally in this country, tout a Congressional Budget Office study that they say shows the bill would cost a whopping $126 billion over 10 years. A fair reading of that study, however, suggests that the bill's actual impact on the deficit would be close to zero and that it could even be beneficial.

Critics add up the bill's increased tax-credit and entitlement costs while ignoring the increased tax revenue it would produce. They also substantially inflate the increased discretionary government spending that would result and overlook the bill's expected positive effects on the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0063391

Let's start with revenue. The CBO found that the Senate bill would boost tax revenue by $44 billion over 10 years by increasing the size of the workforce and the number of immigrants working "above ground" and paying taxes. This would roughly offset the $48 billion in increased entitlement costs that the CBO projects under the bill. Indeed, it estimated that after the first few years, new tax collections actually would exceed new entitlement spending.

The CBO also predicts that this increase in the size of the workforce would produce benefits for the economy. Both the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget expect a slowdown in economic growth in coming decades as the population ages and growth in the supply of workers grinds nearly to a halt. The CBO estimates the Senate bill -- because it would expand the workforce -- would boost the economy, possibly by enough to produce an additional $100 billion or more in revenue over 10 years.

This means that the Senate bill would probably reduce long-term deficits, not enlarge them. Similarly, the Social Security actuaries have found that the Senate bill would reduce the Social Security trust fund's long-term deficit and extend the program's solvency by two years.

So how did critics of the Senate bill arrive at the sensational $126 billion figure, which appears nowhere in the CBO report? First, they counted all of the bill's spending increases while ignoring all of its increases in revenue. For example, they counted the increased costs of Social Security and Medicare benefits for those additional immigrants who would qualify for them, while ignoring the increased Social Security and Medicare payroll taxes the immigrants would pay to qualify for those benefits.

They also incorrectly assumed that the Senate bill requires $78 billion in added discretionary spending. To be sure, the bill would authorize future appropriations of roughly that amount over 10 years. But none of these funds would actually be spent unless Congress provided them in future appropriations bills. The federal budget contains hundreds of programs that Congress funds below -- often far below -- the authorized amounts.

In addition, each year Congress must fit appropriations within an overall appropriations limit, as set in the congressional budget resolution. Funding increases for one set of programs often must be offset by reductions in other programs. Consequently, any increase in discretionary spending arising from the Senate bill is likely to be offset, at least in part, by cuts in other areas. For each of the past four years Congress has made across-the-board cuts in discretionary programs to accommodate new priorities while remaining within the prescribed limits. The CBO itself did not include the $78 billion figure in its estimate of how much new spending the Senate bill actually provides.

Finally, whatever portion of the $78 billion ultimately shows up in future appropriations will probably be provided whether Congress passes the Senate bill or not. That is because more than 90 percent of the authorized discretionary spending would go toward the kind of enforcement measures the bill's critics strongly support, such as expanded border security and stronger measures to identify immigrants illegally seeking employment. Republican congressional leaders have made clear their intention to increase funding for enforcement activities by billions of dollars in appropriation bills that they will consider this month. Indeed, Rep. Harold Rogers, a key Appropriations subcommittee chairman, declared this week that the leadership will provide "tons of money" for this.

Because it is a subject that stirs strong emotions, debates over immigration policy demand fact and solid analysis. As Congress searches for agreement on immigration legislation, mistaken claims that the Senate bill would bust the budget only make this already difficult job harder.

Robert Greenstein is executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. James Horney is a senior fellow at the center and former chief of the budget projections unit at the Congressional Budget Office.

Immigrants Turn Utah Into Mini-melting Pot (USAT)

By Haya El Nasser

USA Today, September 15, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY — In the shadow of the Mormon faith's majestic headquarters, the fountain at the center of the Gateway Plaza outdoor mall is a popular backdrop for weddings. On a scorching day, Hispanic and Anglo children run side by side through the pulsating sprays of water.

DOJ_NMG_0063392

Marriage and kids: They're the pillars of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS), which dominates many facets of life in Utah. But diversity?

Immigration is changing the complexion of communities across the USA. As it sweeps through Utah, traditionally one of the least diverse and most conservative states in the nation, its impact is particularly dramatic. About 98% white until 1970, Utah is becoming a mini-melting pot.

While conservative Republicans in the U.S. House of Representatives are pushing to tighten borders and make illegal immigrants felons, factors unique to Utah are attracting Hispanics to this reddest of red states. Among them: the Mormon Church's philosophy of outreach and its embrace of large families.

These influences have helped give the state a reputation of being warm and welcoming to immigrants. Utah allows the undocumented to drive legally with a "driving privilege card." They can attend public colleges and universities and pay in-state tuition. Minorities — mostly Hispanics — make up 16.5% of the population, up from 8.8% in 1990. They could reach 20% by 2010. Hispanics are driving the growth among minorities here. The state's black and Asian populations also are growing but more slowly.

The changes are visible — and audible. Sounds of up to 70 languages reverberate in school hallways, cantinas are sprouting in the suburbs, and Spanish-speaking religious congregations are multiplying — scenes that are more Los Angeles and Miami than Salt Lake City.

"Word has gotten out that it's a place where immigrants are welcome," five-term Utah Republican Rep. Chris Cannon says.

Utahans in 2004 gave President Bush his biggest margin over Democrat John Kerry in any state — 72% to 26%. How can one of America's most conservative places be so receptive to immigrants?

"The LDS faith believes you can be conservative and yet be compassionate," says Marco Diaz, past chairman of the Utah Republican Hispanic Assembly, which tries to attract more Hispanics to the party. "Help thy neighbor and love thy neighbor and still try to be fiscal conservatives."

How long Utah will embrace this philosophy remains to be seen. Frustrations are mounting over rising dropout rates and classrooms crammed with non-English speakers. Pressure to cut benefits to undocumented residents and crack down on employers who hire them is growing. About 100,000 of Utah's foreign-born residents — about half — are here illegally, says Pamela Perlich, senior research economist at the University of Utah.

Diaz says time may be running out on the state's welcome mat.

"Never have we seen so much uproar on immigration," Diaz says. "A lot of Utahans want some change. … There's a feeling from constituents that something needs to be done."

Utah has been overwhelmingly Mormon since Brigham Young and thousands of followers settled in the Great Salt Lake Valley in the mid-1800s after fleeing persecution 1,300 miles away in Illinois. Utah remains mostly Mormon — about 62% — but that share of the population is declining.

The state ranks 34th in population at 2.5 million. It's insular, yet cosmopolitan.

Utah boasts one of the highest rates of adult residents who have passports and speak more than one language. Brigham Young University teaches more advanced foreign-language courses than any other U.S. university. About 85% of its seniors speak a second language.

That's the Mormon influence.

"This is a missionizing church," says Jan Shipps, a scholar of Mormonism at Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis. At age 18 or 19, Mormons "receive a call to go on a mission and spend two years at their own expense making converts." They learn a foreign language and go abroad. "They experience another culture," she says. "That tends to make Utah … a very cosmopolitan place."

Two forces at play are causing some tension in Utah and within the church, says Kathryn Daynes, a BYU assistant professor of history. "Latter-day Saints … want to reach out on an individual level, but politically, they're very conservative."

Family values and the church's worldwide proselytizing and mission work in Latin America have attracted immigrants and potential converts to Utah. The church offers English classes throughout the state. It has held dinners for Hispanic leaders and has 114 Spanish-speaking congregations in Utah.

DOJ_NMG_0063393

Church leaders generally have avoided commenting on the immigration debate and declined to be interviewed for this story.

They reacted in May, however, to comments by CNN commentator Lou Dobbs, an outspoken advocate of strict enforcement of immigration laws, on the eve of Mexico President Vicente Fox's visit to Utah and other states.

Dobbs said the Mormon church "has a vigorous enthusiasm for as many of Mexico's citizens as they possibly could attract to the state of Utah, irrespective of the cost to taxpayers."

The church's website called Dobbs' statement unfounded. It said the church has more than 1 million members in Mexico and owns nearly 1,000 buildings there but "does not encourage them to move to Utah or anywhere else."

Immigration has struck a nerve this year in Utah. When up to 25,000 people marched in a pro-immigration rally here in April, "I think it frightened people," says Maria Garciaz, executive director of Salt Lake Neighborhood Housing Services, a non-profit group that finances and builds affordable housing on the increasingly diverse west side of Salt Lake City.

Incumbent congressman Cannon, who narrowly won the Republican primary in June, says, "The whole race was about immigration." His opponent was political newcomer and millionaire real estate developer John Jacob, who favored sending illegal immigrants home before giving them a chance at citizenship and punishing employers who hire them.

Cannon is far from liberal on the issue. He voted for a bill that would make helping illegal immigrants a crime and illegal residency a felony. But he supports President Bush's proposed guest-worker program. Cannon and Jacob are Mormon.

"It's better for America to be proud of America and not take harsh views of the world," Cannon says. "I hope Utah is one of these places where we dampen the harshness."

Frustration is rising, however. The Utah Minuteman Project, whose mission is "to secure our homeland" from immigrants here illegally, is pushing to repeal driving privilege cards and in-state tuition for undocumented immigrants.

"Schools are an issue, highway crowding is an issue and the crime rate has gone way up," says Alexander Segura, Utah Minuteman board chairman. "It's issues like that that people are just fed up with."

Immigrants didn't flock here until the late 1990s as the state began preparing to host the 2002 Winter Olympics. Through much of the 1990s, non-agricultural jobs in Utah grew twice as fast as in the nation as a whole. A housing boom feeds the surge. Construction jobs grew 12.4% in 2005 and are expected to jump 15.3% this year.

About two-thirds of Utah's new immigrants came from abroad and the rest from other states, mainly California. The state's Hispanic population soared to about 270,000 in 2005, up 33.1% since 2000. Hispanics contributed about a quarter of the state's growth in the 1990s.

Utah has long had unusual demographics. It has the highest share of married households of any state, the youngest marrying age, the highest birth rate, the largest average household size and the youngest median age. The state is on its third post-World War II baby boom and is bracing for another one because of immigrants.

Hispanic fertility rates in Utah not only exceed those of non-Hispanic whites here but also those of Hispanics nationally and even of women in Mexico, says Perlich, the University of Utah demographer.

Many Utah immigrants are recent arrivals who come from rural Latin America where birth-control education is non-existent. They're now in a state where large families are the norm and birth control is not part of the public discussion.

Immigrants come first for jobs. Many are lured by the lifestyle.

Rosalia Gutierrez, 32, came from Mexico 15 years ago. She is not a Mormon but enjoys the serenity the family-friendly church instills across the state. "It's a nice place," says Gutierrez, a mother of three who works for a container manufacturer. "It's calm and peaceful."

Immigration has created new challenges for the state, from multilingual classrooms to more unwed teenage mothers.

Public school enrollment increased by 30,000 in the 1990s and another 30,000 in the past two years, says state demographer Robert Spendlove. "We're projecting increases of 150,000 in school-age population in the next 10 years."

Minorities account for about 75% of the school enrollment growth since 2000 and Hispanics for 58%.

The Utah State Office of Education has formed an English-language learning task force. The first "newcomer school" will open in Ogden this year to help children adapt while they learn English.

DOJ_NMG_0063394

"It gives the child a fighting chance to do well," says Patti Harrington, state superintendent of public instruction. She says there's no political support to fund programs to help immigrants, such as teaching non-English speakers.

Centro de la Familia, a 30-year-old agency here, changed its focus from mental health and runaway youths to education to help counter high Hispanic dropout rates.

Immigration also is reshaping Midvale, a working-class Salt Lake City suburb with downtown signs in Spanish from the Tortas and Tacos stand to Comunidades Unidas, a community center.

Inside, men, women and children mill about brightly decorated rooms. They're here for prenatal care, diabetes education and other health and social services. The volunteers are friends and neighbors. Peer education works best when up to 80% of the people the center serves are undocumented, says Sabrina Morales, executive director and a native of Guatemala.

Claudia Gonzalez, mother of two, came to Utah in 1999 from San Diego. She cleaned houses, got referrals from the center and eventually volunteered. Now, she's the program director.

Midvale Mayor JoAnn Seghini created the Community Building Community program that brings volunteers and local agencies together to help immigrants. "Immigration is always going to be part of America," Seghini says. "Once they're here, they're us. And once they're us, we're in it together."

TAX:

Anti-Abortion Group Loses Tax Exemption (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

The Internal Revenue Service this week revoked the tax exemption of an anti-abortion group, Operation Rescue West, after receiving a complaint that it had violated prohibitions on electioneering by nonprofits in 2004.

The group had promised tax deductions for contributions to help defeat the Democratic presidential candidate, Senator John Kerry.

The organization said the agency's ruling would have little impact on its operations.

"We have reorganized as simply Operation Rescue," said Cheryl Sullenger, the group's outreach coordinator. "Losing our tax exemption doesn't have much of an effect on us, one way or the other. We have learned some lessons through this whole thing, and I think we're in a better place now than we were before the I.R.S. investigation."

The role of churches, religious organizations and charities in elections drew attention in the 2004 presidential campaign and has already become an issue as the midterm elections approach. Charities and churches are generally prohibited from campaigning for candidates but may take stands on issues and hand out voter guides, among other things.

Politicians across the political spectrum are courting churches this year as never before. The latest example is Attorney General Phill Kline of Kansas, a Republican who recently sent a memorandum to his campaign staff directing them to get him in front of as many congregations as possible at receptions and church services and to get ministers to introduce him to their wealthy congregants.

In a four-page memorandum dated Aug. 8, which was first reported by The Lawrence Journal-World, in Lawrence, Kan., Mr. Kline lists several churches that have agreed to distribute campaign literature. He also mentions the need to create lay campaign committees in each church and to collect church members' e-mail addresses.

"Please try to get literature into everyone's hands," he wrote. "Check and work with pastor to see what is comfortable. In most instances, we should be able to place materials under the windshields of cars."

Mr. Kline's memorandum ends with a directive to give churches "I.R.S. rules guidance regarding what they can and cannot do (this should not take long — no use of church assets — can show in church as long as they do not deny opposition of showing their own video — no need to invite the other, just cannot deny — etc.) sign up sheets, show to give money contributions, etc."

Marcus S. Owens, a lawyer who formerly headed the I.R.S. division that oversees charities, said some of the suggestions in the memorandum would cause churches to violate the law.

DOJ_NMG_0063395

"Assume you're a pastor who doesn't know a lot about the law, and here's the attorney general of the state coming to you and telling you it's O.K.," said Mr. Owens, who represents several nonprofits that the I.R.S. is investigating for possible political infractions. "Who's going to be in a position to refute the attorney general?"

Sherriene Jones, Mr. Kline's communications director, said the attorney general was well aware of laws proscribing the political activity of churches. Ms. Jones said that although the memorandum listed churches participating in political activities that might be seen as prohibited, Mr. Kline was referring only to the churches' pastors, and to recruiting volunteers for his receptions, not for his campaign.

"The attorney general would never ask a church to do anything illegal," she said.

In February, the I.R.S. said it had noticed a sharp increase in prohibited activities by charities and warned that it planned to reverse the trend. At the time, it said it was seeking to revoke the exemption of three organizations but did not name them, pending an appeals process.

Whether Operation Rescue West, which was also known as Youth Ministries Inc., was one of those charities is unclear. The I.R.S. does not comment on its reasons for revoking tax exemption, a step that Commissioner Mark Everson has characterized as "the nuclear option" to be used only as a last resort.

Catholics for a Free Choice, a nonprofit group that advocates on behalf of a woman's right to choose abortion, filed a complaint against Operation Rescue West in 2004, citing its activities during the Democratic National Convention in Boston.

It noted an advertisement Operation Rescue West placed in the July 15, 2004, edition of The Wanderer, a Roman Catholic weekly, seeking tax deductible contributions to help "defeat'' Mr. Kerry, thus enabling President Bush to appoint Supreme Court justices who would overturn the Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion.

At the Democratic convention, members of Operation Rescue West drove around a truck featuring a large photo of a late-stage aborted fetus and the words "Kerry's Choice."

"It could not have been a more clear or blatant violation of the I.R.S. rules," said Frances Kissling, president of Catholics for a Free Choice.

Ms. Kissling said she had no way of knowing whether her group's complaint had prompted the I.R.S. investigation of Operation Rescue West. Catholics for a Free Choice has also filed complaints alleging prohibited political activity against Priests for Life, a religious order on Staten Island, and Catholic Answers, a lay Catholic evangelical group.

Jerry Horn, media director of Priests for Life, declined to comment "because this a common tactic of Catholics for a Free Choice to try to intimidate people into not exercising their rights under the federal laws."

Catholic Answers responded to the complaint against it by forming a separate organization, Catholic Answers Action, under a different section of the tax code. Catholic Answers Action is tax exempt but cannot offer its donors tax deductions for their gifts.

Troy Newman, Operation Rescue's president, said he did not know what structure the new organization, which was created a year ago, had been organized under.

"Whatever structure we have,'' Mr. Newman said, "we are going to speak out, we're not going to be intimidated, we're not going to be muzzled and we're not going to be gagged."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

High Court To Provide Same-Day Argument Transcripts Online (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 15, 2006

Starting in October you won't have to be inside the marble chamber of the Supreme Court to gain a same-day understanding of the thrust and parry of a particular oral argument.

The Court announced Thursday that it will be posting on its Web site the transcripts of oral arguments on the same day they occur -- far faster than the previous practice of releasing them up to two weeks afterward.

DOJ_NMG_0063396

The announcement may seem like a small step that falls well short of opening the Court to television or radio broadcasting. But at an institution that still hands out quill pens to lawyers who argue before it, the change is significant. And access advocates hope it signals a new climate of openness under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr.

"I am pleased to see that the Supreme Court has moved into the 1990s with its same-day release of oral-argument transcripts," says Northwestern University political science professor Jerry Goldman, who posts the audio of oral arguments on his online Oyez Project. "But reading a transcript is like reading a libretto. It's a poor substitute for the real performance. Surely better than nothing, but still inadequate for a pillar of American government."

Roberts' predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, experimented with same-day release of the audio of oral arguments to accommodate the public interest in the Florida presidential election cases of 2000. Similar releases have occurred sporadically ever since, and all the justices who have spoken publicly about the practice have said they approve.

But oral-argument transcripts have posed different issues, including the Court's relationship with the Alderson Reporting Co., which has long provided transcripts to the Court for free -- but at a more leisurely pace, usually a week or more after the argument. For a fee, Alderson would also provide transcripts late in the same day or overnight to interested lawyers and other parties, including the press. Alderson officials on Thursday declined to comment on the new arrangement and how it may affect the company's sales of Court transcripts to private parties.

News media organizations have pressed the Court for years to accelerate the release of transcripts to aid in reporting on the often fast-paced arguments. They noted that at the White House, transcripts of remarks by the president and other top officials are made available almost immediately.

To aid the transcribing process, officials said, high-speed technology will be used, and a court reporter will be stationed in the court chamber for the first time. Previously, transcripts were made off site from audiotapes; the Court has audiotaped oral arguments since the 1950s.

High Court To Post Same-Day Transcripts (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The Supreme Court announced yesterday that it will make same-day transcripts of its oral arguments available free on its Web site, the quickest and most complete public access to its proceedings the court has ever offered.

There is no sign that the court is about to yield to calls for live television coverage, which the justices have steadfastly refused. But, in the quiet, tradition-bound world of the Supreme Court, yesterday's decision was almost revolutionary, court analysts said.

"It's a tremendous opening to the outside world," said Richard Lazarus, a professor of law at Georgetown University and co-director of the school's Supreme Court Institute.

It was the biggest step the court has taken in the direction of greater public access since John G. Roberts Jr., himself a former Supreme Court oral advocate, took over as chief justice almost a year ago.

Coupled with another recent innovation, the identification in the transcripts of which justice is asking a particular question, the court's new policy "creates the potential for more intelligent speculation by more people than just those who were in the courtroom about how a particular case is going to come out," Lazarus said.

Previously, free transcripts were not posted on the court's site, http://www.supremecourtus.gov , until two weeks after oral argument. The only exceptions were certain recent high-profile cases, such as the 2000 presidential election cases, in which the court released same-day audiotapes of oral argument. There were just three such occasions in the 2005-2006 term.

Anyone who wanted a same-day transcript had to pay hundreds of dollars to the court's transcription service, Washington-based Alderson Reporting. That effectively limited access to a handful of law firms.

But recent progress in digital technology and a new arrangement with Alderson made it possible for the justices to adopt the new policy, which law professors, lawyers and reporters have been urging for years.

Formerly, Alderson provided services to the court free and recovered its costs by selling the transcripts. Now, the court will pay Alderson and give away the transcripts on its Web site, court spokeswoman Kathy L. Arberg said.

DOJ_NMG_0063397

House Passes New Ethics Rule (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 15, 2006

The House changed its rules Thursday to require lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into legislation, a modest step toward restoring the reputation of Congress in a year of ethical lapses and scandals involving relations with lobbyists.

"We are making a commitment to changing the culture of this institution," said House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif.

The change, in effect only through year's end, is aimed at curtailing a practice whereby lawmakers anonymously insert "earmarks" — narrowly tailored spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district — into bills.

President Bush said in a statement the bill make sure "lawmakers and the public are better informed before Congress votes to spend the taxpayers' money."

Democrats disparaged the measure, citing the failure of the Republican-led Congress to pass more comprehensive legislation to clean up lawmaker relations with lobbyists.

The rules change "will do little more than to get Republicans through the November elections," said Rep. Louise Slaughter of New York, top Democrat on the House Rules Committee.

GOP Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona, a leading critic of special interest spending, said, "I'm under no illusion that this legislation, which deals only with the issue of transparency, will solve the problem of earmarking. But this bill does represent an important first step."

Citizens Against Government Waste, a taxpayer watchdog group, said there were 9,963 such projects in the spending bills for the 2006 budget year, costing $29 billion.

The 245-171 vote on the rule change came a day after Congress sent to President Bush a bill intended to make government spending more open to public scrutiny.

Under that bill, the government will set up by 2008 a Google-like search engine so people can track hundreds of billions of dollars in grants and contracts that the government awards every year.

But there is currently no prospect for progress on more comprehensive lobbying and ethics overhaul. That had been highlighted as an urgent task at the beginning of the year after several lawmakers were tied to illegal or unsavory actions, particularly with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The House and Senate last spring passed bills that would have required lobbyists to be more open about their activities; put limits on gifts and meals from lobbyists and travel involving lobbyists; slowed the movement of lawmakers leaving office for lobbying jobs; provided ethics training to staff and members; and ended anonymous earmarks.

The effort at a compromise stalled over a House provision to limit donations to independent political groups known as 527s for the section of tax law under which they are registered. Such groups tend to be more helpful to Democrats; Senate Democrats objected to a lobbying bill that also takes up campaign finance limits.

Democrats and clean government groups were quick to point out that earmark rules were no substitute for a larger ethics overhaul.

"It is tragic that Congress is failing to address in any meaningful way the corruption sweeping Capitol Hill in recent years," said Laura MacCleery, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch division.

Even getting the earmarks rule through the House was a struggle for GOP leaders. Republican members of the House Appropriations Committee complained their spending bills unfairly have been targeted, and that the disclosure rules should apply equally to bills from other committees.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, told Republican appropriators that they had listened to their concerns and "we believe we have fulfilled our commitment" to equal treatment. House Republicans, they said, made it clear they wanted such. "It is now time to put this reform into our rules."

To meet objections, the final rules change stipulates that earmarks must be listed not only for bills from committees but also when such projects are added to House-Senate conference reports or included in amendments in the full House.

DOJ_NMG_0063398

The measure defines an earmark as "a provision that allocates funds outside of the normal formula-driven or competitive bidding process and targets those funds to a specific entity, state or congressional district."

Appropriators objected to language that would limit tax earmarks to a tax deduction, credit, exclusion or preference to only one beneficiary. Of the 24 Republicans who voted against the rules change, 22 were members of the Appropriations Committee.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., top Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, said that this rule would not cover a huge tax break for two multinational oil companies.

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense said the disclosure requirement leaves out thousands of earmarks directed toward a federal agency such as the Pentagon, the Army Corps of Engineers or national laboratories.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has directed the top Republican and Democrat on the Rules and Administration Committee to develop similar rules changes.

___

On the Net:

Information on the bill, H.Res. 1000, can be found at http://thomas.loc.gov/

House To Require Names On Pet Projects (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The House of Representatives took a modest step on Thursday to illuminate the practice of inserting special-interest provisions into major tax and spending bills by passing an internal rule that would require lawmakers to sign their names to some of the items they sponsor.

The resolution would address only a small fraction of such provisions and, as an internal rule, would expire at the end of the current session in just a few weeks.

Despite its limited reach, the passage of the resolution was in doubt until the last minute. Democrats called it meaningless. Members of the powerful House Appropriations Committee complained that it unfairly required more disclosure of their pet projects — known as earmarks — than it did of special-interest tax loopholes.

The resolution passed 245 to 171, with 24 Republicans and 147 Democrats voting against it.

House Republican leaders pushed ahead with the rule change because it was the last element of an all-but-abandoned package of lobbying and ethics reforms that they announced at the beginning of the year, pledging to cleanse the House of the scandals surrounding the lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Representative Randy Cunningham.

“Everybody complains about it, but when it ultimately gets to the floor, how can you vote against it?” said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois.

House Votes To Disclose Earmarks (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The House voted yesterday to shed more light on narrow-interest tax and spending legislation called earmarks, an incremental step toward openness that ended the prospect for a more sweeping overhaul of federal lobbying laws this year.

With a 245 to 171 vote, the House reacted to a year of congressional scandals by requiring its members to own up to the thousands of earmarks they sponsor each year.

Earmarks have been at the center of corruption investigations involving several lawmakers and lobbyists, and a public outcry against them helped spur a high-priority effort this year to devise ethics legislation that would have restricted contacts between lobbyists and members of Congress.

Instead, the House simply changed its internal rules to require that these targeted programs and their sponsors be disclosed in every type of bill, a procedure that does not currently exist. The measure, like any such rule change, could expire at the end of the year, but it is likely to be re-adopted along with the House's many other rules, Republican leaders said.

"We are blowing away the fog of anonymity," said Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Rules Committee. "The goal is to pull back the curtain on earmarks to the public."

DOJ_NMG_0063399

The rule change shelves a wider ethics bill, however, at least until next year. That bill became bogged down amid disagreements between the House and the Senate, and the reluctance of lawmakers from both parties to limit their interactions with lobbyists. The earmarks measure was brought up as a passable way to address voter unrest over the scandals, aides said.

"This bill represents the death of lobby reform," said Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), a former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

The Senate is working on its own change in earmarks rules, which its leaders also hope to approve in lieu of broad ethics legislation this year, top staffers said. The staffers added that subjecting earmarks to more sunshine will allow lawmakers to tell their constituents that they addressed their ethics concerns even though the broad overhaul bill failed.

The larger ethics effort began with fanfare in January, prompted by a series of congressional scandals that started with the guilty plea of former lobbyist Jack Abramoff on fraud and conspiracy charges.

The ethics bill faltered, however, after being gradually diluted, at least compared with the initial promises made by congressional leaders. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), for example, advanced a plan that would have prohibited lawmakers from accepting privately funded travel. But lawmakers rejected that provision along with many others that would have restricted lobbyists or would have done more than improve disclosure about lobbyists' encounters with Congress.

The House and the Senate did endorse separate lobbying-overhaul bills this spring, but efforts to reconcile them stalled over a disagreement about a House-passed provision that would restrict independent campaign organizations called 527s. Senate Democrats and a handful of Republicans refused to accept the provision, but the House insisted that it be included in the final bill.

Lawmakers from both parties and both chambers also lost their enthusiasm for the bill as lobbying groups pressured them to water down the legislation and voters remained silent about its diminishing prospects.

Democratic leaders complained about the earmarks change yesterday. Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.) called it "shameful" and "a sham." She said that the measure would not end the abuse of the earmarking process and was filled with loopholes that would still permit anonymous projects to be inserted into law without public scrutiny.

Obey called the measure a "trivial pursuit," saying it would do little to alter federal spending while blocking a serious updating of federal ethics laws. "The majority has labored long and produced a mouse," Obey added, "or a fig leaf at best."

Not all Republicans are fans of the proposal. The rule change was opposed by several Republican members of the House Appropriations Committee, who have said they resent that the change would affect them more than it would members of other committees. Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), the Appropriations Committee chairman, and some of his most senior Republican members voted no.

This defiance of GOP leaders came despite a letter written by Hastert and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) urging the appropriators to relent and to vote in favor of the earmarks change. The earmark bill, Boehner said on the House floor, will bring the process "out of the shadows."

House OKs Measure To Curb Pork Spending (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

Members of Congress wanting to secure taxpayer cash for pet projects back home would no longer be able to do it secretly under a measure passed by the House yesterday, a reform effort leaders hope will severely curtail a practice known as earmarking.

The election-year change to House rules passed 245-171, with many calling it a step in the right direction to ultimately curbing earmarking, also known as pork-barrel spending. Members also said it would shine more light on the process to prevent bribery scandals like those that rocked Washington in the past year.

"If you aren't willing to put your name on the project, you shouldn't expect the American people to pay for it," said Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0063400

"We are blowing away the fog of anonymity so the public can have a clear picture of what the projects are, how much they cost and who is sponsoring them," agreed House Rules Chairman David Dreier, California Republican who authored the change.

Many yesterday evoked the $223 million "bridge to nowhere," nicknamed for a bridge in a sparsely populated area in Alaska. It was stripped from the highway-spending bill last year after its exposure prompted public outcry. That and other earmarks such as $90,000 for the Cowgirl Hall of Fame in Fort Worth, Texas, are examples of pork projects often tucked away in lengthy legislation. Before yesterday's change, the authors of such earmarks did not have to be disclosed.

Watchdog groups estimate the nearly 10,000 earmarks submitted this year cost taxpayers $29 billion.

Rep. Jeff Flake, one of the biggest critics of earmarking, called the bill a "little dose" of accountability and transparency, but said he doubts earmarking will cease.

"You kind of have to have a third element, and that's shame, and we have too little of it here," the Arizona Republican said. "As long as you can stand up with a straight face and say, 'I just got an earmark for the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame,' then it's tough to say we're going to change anything with this bill."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, dismissed the earmarks bill as a "political gimmick to make it look as if something is happening."

The change to House rules would require all earmarks in a committee-passed bill to be clearly listed with the requesting member's name attached. The rule, which does not apply to the Senate, is subject to renewal when a new Congress is inaugurated in January.

Democrats said because the rule does not apply to "manager's amendments" that leaders usually push to the floor or to bills that bypass committee, the changes wouldn't prevent the "bridge to nowhere" or some of the more objectionable pork projects.

"This is a joke, it is a fraud ... it focuses on the minutiae instead of the big problems," said Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat.

Members of the House Appropriations Committee also opposed the change because they think it unfairly targets them.

Republican leaders boast a 37 percent decline in earmarks in the past year, but critics note earmarks have skyrocketed since the 2,000 approved in 1994 when Republicans took over.

"A smaller government is less susceptible to influence peddling and corruption, and as Republicans we should champion that cause," said Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, who ran for majority leader earlier this year on an earmark-reform platform.

Lawmakers yesterday also hailed the Wednesday passage of a bill creating a Web-accessible database of the billions awarded in government contracts and grants. President Bush has said he will sign the bill, and lawmakers said yesterday it is a good first step to let taxpayers see how their money is spent.

House Takes A Cautious Step On Ethics (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nine months after House Republican leaders pledged to enact sweeping ethics reform in the wake of a series of scandals, a divided House on Thursday approved what critics described as a modest change in the system that lets members slip special "earmarks" into spending bills.

Earmarking, the largely secret process by which powerful members of Congress insert spending provisions into legislation without going through the normal budget process, has been widely used to do favors for business and other interests in exchange for political support, especially campaign contributions. It has also been at the center of several scandals, including the case of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

On Thursday, the Republican-controlled chamber voted 245 to 171 to require that the authors of earmarks be identified in spending bills, a rule that proponents said would help curb the practice.

DOJ_NMG_0063401

"We have seen a challenge here … and we've stepped up to the plate," said House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-San Dimas), who was tapped in January to help lead his party's push for what he said then would be "bold, strong reform initiatives."

Thursday's more limited measure was backed by 199 Republicans and 45 Democrats. Twenty-seven California representatives, including all but one Republican, supported the measure; 24 opposed it. Two did not vote.

After the vote, President Bush praised the bill, which he said would "shine a brighter light on earmarks."

But critics charged that the House bill left gaping holes. For one thing, it will not apply across the board to all legislation. Authors of some earmarks added to tax bills may still go unidentified. Indeed, Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the lone California Republican to vote against the bill, had said it unfairly singled out appropriations bills for the disclosure requirement.

Thursday's action also did not impose any new rules on the Senate, which still allows its members to insert spending provisions and tax breaks into legislation without identifying themselves.

And critics noted that the House vote did not advance broader ethics measures — such as limits on the free meals and travel that many members receive from lobbyists — that have been stalled in the House and Senate.

One reason adding greater transparency to the earmark process may not restrain the practice is that — though they have not been required to identify themselves in the past — many members have publicly boasted of the money they steered into their districts.

In North Carolina, for example, where Republican Rep. Charles H. Taylor is locked in a tough reelection campaign, he is highlighting his position as a senior member of the Appropriations Committee and inviting voters to check a map on his campaign website to "see how many of your taxpayer dollars Congressman Taylor has returned to your county."

Because of the limited nature of the House action, reform advocates dismissed it as little more than window dressing.

"There are major problems with this earmark reform," said Stephen Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "It doesn't capture every earmark. It doesn't make it easier to strip wasteful earmarks. It won't reduce the number of earmarks."

"The earmark rules changes will not fool the American people into ignoring the irresponsible failure by the House to address the worst House corruption scandals in decades," said Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer, a longtime champion of ethics reform.

With less than two months before the November elections, House Republican leaders have been under increasing pressure to produce some kind of reform. They have also been under pressure from conservatives to rein in "pork barrel" spending.

Democrats have hammered Republicans all year over ethics, repeatedly accusing the majority of presiding over a "culture of corruption."

Republican promises of reform in January followed scandals involving Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the Rancho Santa Fe Republican who pleaded guilty last year to accepting bribes from defense contractors in return for steering their way federal projects worth millions of dollars.

Abramoff once referred to the Appropriations Committee as a "favor factory."

An investigation is also underway into ties between appropriations chairman Lewis and a lobbying firm whose clients have received millions of dollars in earmarks. Lewis has denied any wrongdoing, saying that earmarks he sought benefited his district.

Democrats have had to contend with their own scandals this year, with Reps. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.) both forced from committees amid allegations of wrongdoing.

In a sign of how closely action on Capitol Hill is tied to this year's battle for control of Congress, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who chairs the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, invoked his party's campaign call for a "new direction" in his floor speech opposing the bill.

2 Republicans In Senate Vow To Block F.D.A. Pick (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063402

Two Republican senators have promised to block the nomination of Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, illustrating just how difficult filling the top job at the agency has become.

Senator David Vitter, Republican of Louisiana, said Thursday in an interview that the Bush administration must legalize imports of some prescription drugs before he would allow the nomination to proceed.

"It could be from Canada only, or for personal use only, or a pilot or limited program," Mr. Vitter said. "But it has to be meaningful."

Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, will block Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination unless the F.D.A. takes steps to remove the abortion drug RU-486 from the market, said Wesley M. Denton, Mr. DeMint's press secretary.

"Senator DeMint believes that a qualified F.D.A. nominee would publicly discourage RU-486's use and take immediate steps to remove it from the market," he said. "We've reached a breaking point here, and the senator's not going to budge until they wake up over at F.D.A."

The F.D.A. is unlikely to make any substantive moves in the coming weeks to fulfill either senator's condition, imperiling the nomination of Dr. von Eschenbach, the acting commissioner. Mr. Vitter predicted that the nomination would not be acted upon this year.

"We're running out of time," Mr. Vitter said.

Susan Bro, a senior communications adviser at the F.D. A., said, "We're certain both the Senate and F.D.A. are in mutual agreement that what's critical to ensuring the best interest of all Americans is permanent leadership at the F.D.A." She said the agency looked forward to seeing the nominee confirmed.

For the past year, a vote on Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination has been stymied by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, and Patty Murray, Democrat of Washington State, who insisted that the F.D.A. must make a decision on a three-year-old application to allow over-the-counter sales of Plan B, an emergency contraceptive.

The Democratic senators' objections were so firm that Senator Michael B. Enzi, Republican of Wyoming, the chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, refused even to schedule a committee vote on the nomination until it was resolved.

After prodding from Dr. von Eschenbach, the F.D.A. approved the Plan B application last month.

Mr. Enzi then scheduled a vote on the nomination for next Wednesday. The committee was widely expected to vote to send the nomination to the full Senate. But after the committee votes, any senator can issue a "hold" that blocks the Senate from considering a nomination approved by committee.

So little time is left before Congress adjourns that any holds, even brief ones, could scuttle Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination until next year. President Bush could renominate Dr. von Eschenbach next year, or he could decide to give him a recess appointment.

Recess appointments tend to generate ill will in Congress and may undermine authority within the agency, said Paul Quinn, a Washington lawyer.

If President Bush were to make a recess appointment this year, he would have to reappoint Dr. von Eschenbach next year. Either way, Dr. von Eschenbach could continue to lead the agency in the interim.

Drug companies and others who have business before the F.D.A. generally prefer that the agency have a confirmed commissioner because they say that acting leaders do not have the power to make difficult but needed decisions and changes.

Uncertain leadership can also affect employee morale, Mr. Quinn said.

The job of F.D.A. commissioner has been subject to Senate confirmation since only the 1990's, and it has become increasingly difficult to get the Senate to agree on a candidate.

The Bush administration has had a confirmed F.D.A. commissioner for less than two of nearly six years in office.

"The job is important enough that it should be subject to Senate confirmation, but unfortunately it's become so politicized that it's become a hard job to fill," said Dan Troy, a former F.D.A. general counsel. "You can and are attacked by both sides of the political spectrum."

Government Recovers Stolen Computer (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0063403

AP, September 14, 2006

The government said Thursday it had recovered a Veterans Affairs Department subcontractor's lost desktop computer containing personal data for 16,000 veterans.

The FBI and Veterans Affairs Office of Inspector General said Khalil Abdullah-Raheem was charged Wednesday on theft charges after the Unisys Corp. computer went missing in July.

The computer, which was taken from Unisys' offices in Reston, Va., contained personal data for veterans who received care at VA medical centers in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh.

Abdullah-Raheem, 21, of Washington, was employed by a company that provides temporary labor to Unisys. Investigators believe he did not target the data, and forensics experts were determining if the VA data had been compromised.

VA Secretary Jim Nicholson on Thursday praised investigators' work in locating the missing computer.

___

On the Net:

Department of Veterans Affairs: http://www.va.gov/

Paulson Positions Treasury As Policy Quarterback (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Two months into his new job, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is moving to restore clout and stature to the department, tapping top-level experts to fill senior positions, seeking alliances with influential White House officials and insisting on holding key meetings at the Treasury Building.

Mr. Paulson is trying to put into practice assurances he received from the White House before agreeing to take the secretary job -- that he would be the president's main driver of economic policy. Since coming to Washington, Mr. Paulson has held daily phone calls with the influential Allan Hubbard, chairman of the White House National Economic Council and a longtime friend of President Bush, and invited Mr. Hubbard to accompany him to China next week. He also talks frequently with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, hosts cabinet-level economic meetings at Treasury and is trying to reach out regularly to brief both Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill on Treasury happenings.

Mr. Paulson has been keeping longer hours than many in the government are accustomed to and is expecting his staff to do the same. Each day at 8:15 a.m., he and Deputy Secretary Robert Kimmitt, hold senior staff meetings. Mr. Paulson often invites staff to his house for weekend meetings. His first speechwriter, Matt Rees, has announced he is leaving to spend more time with his family.

Whether Mr. Paulson's efforts succeed -- and help him shape economic policy -- remains to be seen. No major policy initiatives are expected before the 2006 midterm elections. Future efforts could depend on who controls Congress after November.

But Mr. Paulson already commands high-level audiences, in good part because of his previous life as the chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. During his first official trip to China next week, he is expected to meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao and other senior Chinese officials.

While in Asia he will also hold private meetings to discuss Iran and terrorism financing, along with Stuart Levey, Treasury's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

So far, much of Mr. Paulson's efforts to bolster Treasury have been aimed at bringing in key staff from outside. Yesterday, the day after he gave a speech on the international economy, his choice for the top communications spot, Michele A. Davis, was endorsed by President Bush. Ms. Davis played a similar role during the tumultuous tenure of Mr. Bush's first Treasury Secretary, Paul O'Neill, and is expected to serve as a senior strategist under Mr. Paulson.

He also has tapped former Goldman Sachs vice chairman Robert Steel for the top domestic-finance post -- his Senate confirmation hearing could be as early as next week -- and is hiring China expert Deborah Lehr, of consulting firm Stonebridge International, as a senior adviser. Jim Wilkinson, a former senior adviser to Ms. Rice, is Mr. Paulson's chief of staff and another former State Department aide, Taiya Smith, is now deputy chief of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0063404

Proposal Would Make Retirement Benefits A Factor In Bidding (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The Bush administration continues to have a hard time selling its plan to turn more federal work over to the private sector.

In a move that has roiled federal contractors, the Senate has proposed making retirement benefits a factor when the Defense Department puts certain federal jobs up for bid.

The proposal would prevent contractors from obtaining an advantage if they provided less generous retirement benefits than the government does to its employees. Contractors said that would drive up the cost of bids by 24 percent.

This comes two years after Congress stipulated that private-sector bids include an amount for employee health benefits at least equal to the amount paid by agencies. Contractor associations said that drove up the cost of bids by 5.5 percent.

Federal unions, especially the American Federation of Government Employees, have lobbied Congress to curb job competitions with the private sector, contending that they lower morale in the workplace and often do not deliver the promised budget savings.

Contractor associations argue that the Senate's move, if agreed to by the House, would stop the Defense Department from trying to outsource work through a process set up by the Office of Management and Budget as part of President Bush's federal management agenda. That effort -- competitive sourcing -- is also known as A-76, after the name of the OMB directive that lays out the rules for the competitions.

Contractors find the health-care comparison and the proposed retirement benefit comparison especially onerous because the standard rules used in competitions require the contractor to save the government $10 million or 10 percent of agency personnel costs (whichever is less) or the work will be retained within the agency.

Although many agencies conduct studies to see whether federal work can be turned over to the private sector, the Defense Department has been the most active over the years in contracting out and has drawn the most attention from unions. The agency said in 2004 that job competitions that year were on track to produce about $740 million in savings.

Under the job competitions, agencies try to determine if the government's commercial work can be done more efficiently by a contractor. For decades, the government has followed a policy of buying goods and services in the marketplace rather than setting up operations that compete with business.

Where that line gets drawn, however, can be difficult. For example, Congress has debated whether airport passenger screening, collection of delinquent taxes and air traffic control operations should be performed by government employees or by contractors.

Projected cost savings are a key factor in job competitions, prompting congressional supporters of federal employees to back legislation, usually as a part of spending bills, aimed at creating what they call a level playing field.

Stan Soloway , president of the Professional Services Council, an industry group, called the Senate proposal "sound-bite legislation" aimed at discouraging the Pentagon from conducting job competitions. "The intent here is to put that nail in the coffin," Soloway said.

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) proposed the amendment to make retirement benefits a factor in contracting out decisions. Their provision was accepted on a voice vote shortly after Congress returned from the Labor Day recess. The fate of the provision will be decided by congressional negotiators later this year because the House did not include a similar provision in its Defense appropriations bill for fiscal 2007.

In introducing the amendment, Kennedy said more than 10,000 civil service employees at the Defense Department could be "at risk of unfair termination" through competitive sourcing. "This skewed privatization policy is fundamentally unfair to federal workers who lose contracts simply because they receive decent benefits," he said.Talk Shows

Michael Johnson , founder of Brightline Compliance and a former Justice Department lawyer, will be the guest on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Lisa Schlosser , chief information officer at the Housing and Urban Development Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

DOJ_NMG_0063405

Lawmakers Seek To Loosen Up Banking Proposal (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers and banking executives Thursday pushed federal regulators to relax proposed tougher standards for commercial real estate lending, saying they could hurt community banks and the overall economy.

"I understand there is an increase in lending, but by your own figures there is no increase in risky lending," Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass, said at a House Financial Services subcommittee hearing.

Frank said the standards could force banks to pull back on lending to revitalize downtown areas or build affordable, multifamily housing. While Frank is a Democrat, there was bipartisan concern.

Regulators, including the Federal Reserve and Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., generally defended their proposals. But John Reich, director of the Office of Thrift Supervision, said the guidance may go too far in some areas.

Other regulators said midsize banks are now carrying a higher concentration of commercial real estate loans on their books than during the boom years of the 1980s, when a number went bust.

"Although circumstances are different today … we know from the painful experience of just 20 years ago that commercial real estate lending has a real potential to fail banks," said John Dugan, comptroller of the currency.

Congress has not intervened on the legislative side, but lawmakers made it clear they want changes before a final version of the standards is issued. Regulators have gotten more than 1,000 letters since the proposal was unveiled in January.

The proposed standards generally call for bank examiners to perform a more strenuous appraisal of banks' commercial real estate loan portfolios when the concentration of such loans reaches certain thresholds. Banks could be required to make management changes and increase capital reserves. Commercial real estate is defined as housing as well as office buildings, malls and other commercial-type structures.

While regulators say the thresholds are merely guidelines, lenders and lawmakers feared they would turn into caps on lending. Community banks, which can't compete with big national banks in many areas, depend on real estate loans.

Banks said the proposal was overly broad, expensive to implement and that housing should not be lumped in with other real estate.

"The proposed guidance is seriously flawed and we have strongly urged the banking agencies not to go forward … in its current form," said James McKillop, CEO of the Independent Bankers' Bank of Florida.

Fed Gov. Susan Schmidt Bies testified that banks may be doing a good job evaluating individual loans, but better portfolio management is needed. Carefully run banks can be hurt if other lenders are allowed to make bad loans, depressing real estate prices, she said.

Laura Bush Aiding Clinton Conference (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, September 15, 2006

Another member of the Bush family is getting cozy with former President Clinton. First lady Laura Bush joins the former president as a keynote speaker opening his three-day Clinton Global Initiative in New York next week.

Clinton has famously formed a close friendship with the current president's dad. Clinton has been a repeat guest at the Kennebunkport, Maine, home of George H.W. Bush and his wife, Barbara.

Clinton also sparked curiosity when he was spotted at the White House last month. It turns out that he and the current president were having lunch, something White House aides said they do occasionally.

Now, aware of Laura Bush's involvement in issues that his foundation addresses, Clinton called several months ago to solicit her participation in the conference, said Anita McBride, her chief of staff.

Laura Bush agreed, hoping to tell people about the good that their tax dollars are doing and to persuade other nations of the United States' good intentions.

"We've got a good story to tell. We've got something to say," McBride said. "We've got something to show that we are not only as Americans a compassionate and generous country and she wants Americans to know that they're making a difference."

DOJ_NMG_0063406

This year's Clinton Global Initiative is a follow-up to the 2005 event that brought $2.5 billion in pledges to help solve challenges such as the HIV infection in Africa.

The first lady's speech next Wednesday will cover topics such as literacy and education, AIDS and women's rights that she has highlighted in her travels. They include 11 solo trips to 27 countries in the nearly six years of her husband's presidency.

She also is bringing a pledge of her own: the announcement of a partnership between the Bush administration and an American foundation to help provide clean drinking water in Africa — a key component to improving health on the poverty-stricken continent.

McBride would say only that the project involves providing water-cleansing equipment for some of sub-Saharan Africa's most problem-ridden areas. She would not disclose details such as the dollar amount or the foundation partner.

While accompanying her husband to New York for the U.N. General Assembly next week, Laura Bush is hosting her own conference, on global literacy. She is the United Nations' honorary ambassador for the Decade of Literacy.

In addition, the first lady is doing her part to promote the administration's agenda on Myanmar.

She is holding a discussion with U.S., U.N. and nongovernmental organization representatives on the situation in the Southeast Asian nation that the administration has criticized for its repressive policies and detention of a pro-democracy leader, Aung San Suu Kyi.

The country, also known as Burma, is known for violence against the ethnic Karen minority and a growing refugee problem.

U.S. officials, pessimistic about the prospects for Security Council action against Myanmar's military junta, hope Laura Bush's involvement can help.

Democrats Meander In A New New Direction (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, the woman who will become speaker of the House if Democrats get lucky in November, began her weekly news conference yesterday holding up a red-white-and-blue brochure.

"I hope you all received 'A New Direction for America,' " she said, standing at a lectern that bore the same slogan. She called the manifesto "a compilation of many of the initiatives taken by our House Democratic Caucus that encompasses our new direction for all Americans."

It was a handsome booklet, full of homey photographs and popular proposals, but there was a problem. Democrats have had more "New Directions" recently than MapQuest.

Among the party's campaign slogans this year: "Culture of Corruption," "Culture of Cronyism," "Do-Nothing Congress," "Rubber-Stamp Congress," "Together, We Can Do Better," "Together, America Can Do Better" and, most recently, "Six for '06."

For those keeping score at home, Democrats arrived at "New Direction" yesterday by downgrading one of the "Six for '06" issues (health care) and upgrading three others (honesty, civility and fiscal discipline), for a total of eight items on the contents page.

By contrast, Republicans have settled on a single, unofficial slogan, which essentially says: Vote Democrat and Die. And in politics, scary and scurrilous usually trumps elaborate and earnest -- something Pelosi has experienced firsthand in recent days.

The California Democrat has been the focus of the GOP attack since her remark last week that capturing Osama bin Laden wouldn't make us safer. It was similar to sentiments uttered previously by President Bush ("He's not the issue") and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld ("If he were gone tomorrow, the same problem would exist"). But it set off a flurry of Benedict Arnold charges from Republicans directed at Pelosi and her colleagues.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) wondered whether Democrats are "more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people." Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) stood next to a poster of Pelosi and her words about bin Laden and demanded: "Where do your loyalties lie?" House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said Democrats "are confused about who the enemy actually is."

DOJ_NMG_0063407

Pelosi, sitting on the sofa in her Capitol office yesterday, took the treason talk in stride. "I've been a traitor for five years," she quipped, pointing out that Republicans said much the same thing when she proposed a 9/11 commission. By now, she added, Democrats have neutralized the issue.

That's mostly true. Polls show a shrunken GOP advantage on terrorism. But the Republican attacks have shifted the debate to the one issue that benefits them -- as Pelosi witnessed in her news conference yesterday morning.

Her opening statement covered a full range of Democratic issues: fiscal responsibility. The minimum wage. The trade deficit. Student loans. Health care. Energy independence. Social Security. Medicare.

Then came the questions. "This is now the third election in a row in which they've raised security issues just before the election," the first questioner said of the Republicans. "Why won't it work for them a third time?"

"We won't be Swift-boated on the national security issue," the minority leader maintained.

"As you know," came the follow-up, Republicans "are citing past votes by you and other Democrats."

Pelosi was defensive. "I have five children," she said. "Five grandchildren, going on six. And I consider myself the ultimate security mom." By way of clarification, she felt compelled to add: "Democrats are committed to hunting down Osama bin Laden."

A third questioner pointed out that Republicans have regained the lead on national security. "This is what, I guess, campaigns will be about," Pelosi conceded with some reluctance. "It shouldn't be about national security."

It's not clear what more Pelosi could do to shift the debate back to friendly terrain. Ninety minutes after her "New Direction" news conference, she was in a teleconference with reporters to talk about Social Security. "We have serious concerns about the safety and security of Social Security," she warned.

But the journalists weren't nibbling; of the 15 people on the call, only one asked a question.

At about the time Pelosi was unveiling the "New Direction" brochures, Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) was out on the Senate floor, accusing Democrats of aiding the terrorists. "Al-Qaeda," he said, sees "the lack of resolve in some of our leaders, and they seek to exploit it."

The charge enraged Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), who had come to the floor to talk about education.

"America is not tired of fighting terrorism," she retorted. "America is tired of the wrongheaded and boneheaded leadership of the Republican Party that has sent $6.5 billion a month to Iraq when the front line was Afghanistan and Saudi Arabia, that led this country to attack Saddam Hussein when we were attacked by Osama bin Laden."

She continued: "And Americans are most certainly tired of leadership that, despite documented mistake after mistake after mistake . . . never admit that they ever do anything wrong."

It was angry and raw. But it was a new direction.

Costs Will Outstrip Savings (USAT)

By Shannon Benton

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Next year, for the first time, Medicare Part B premiums will be “means tested,” or based on income. Some proponents claim this will save the government money and perhaps even the ailing Medicare system itself.

Though their arguments might seem credible, they lack foresight. According to the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office, means testing will cut barely three-tenths of 1% from Medicare's total budget over the next 10 years.

But it will cost much more than it saves.

As healthier and wealthier seniors see their monthly premiums rise — in some cases from $88.50 today to, by our estimate, as much as $395 by 2009 for the top bracket — many are expected to abandon Medicare for private insurance. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services estimates that as many as 30,000 seniors will drop Part B in the next three years. That number will likely grow exponentially in future years.

Left behind will be the poorest and sickest — and most expensive to treat — who will be forced to pay higher premiums and deductibles, something they cannot afford. Worse, they might find themselves without a viable health coverage system, exactly what Medicare was created to prevent.

DOJ_NMG_0063408

No law prevents Congress from redefining "wealthy," now starting at $80,000 a year for individuals. With looming deficits, there is already talk in Congress about lowering the threshold to $60,000. Next could be $40,000.

Finally, the argument that CEOs should pay more than blue-collar workers is a red herring. The wealthy have been paying more all along. Workers and their employers pay a tax of $2.90 on every $100 they earn into the Medicare trust fund. So, a senior earning $200,000 contributes $5,800 into the fund annually, five times the $1,160 a senior making $40,000 annually contributes.

The most vulnerable members of our society — the poorest and sickest seniors, whose numbers are in the millions — should be protected. Means testing might inadvertently lead to poorer health care and increased expenses for those least able to afford the consequences of this costly mistake.

Shannon Benton is executive director of the Senior Citizens League, an advocacy group based in Alexandria, Va.

Sinking Secret Holds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Americans are rightly proud of their transparent government, one in which almost everything save vital national security information is open to scrutiny. So all credit to a group of Senators who have launched a campaign to get rid of one of the last bastions of government unaccountability, namely the Senate tradition of "secret" holds.

Republicans Chuck Grassley and Trent Lott and Democrats Ron Wyden and Chris Dodd this week announced their intention to force some of their more cloak-and-dagger colleagues to agree to legislation to eliminate secret holds. This practice -- which allows any Senator to block a nominee or legislation without revealing his or her identity -- has been around since at least the 1960s, though it has become a greater source of political harm with each passing year.

The most common Senate holds in recent years have been placed on presidential nominees, usually with the aim of winning some parochial policy battle. A few of the Bush appointees who have been held hostage (some with secret holds, some with open holds and some by members of the President's own party) include former U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman, former FDA Commissioner Lester Crawford, EPA head Stephen Johnson, and Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England. All were ultimately confirmed, though only after endless guessing games and delays.

Left hanging is the President, who is unable to have his appointees get on with the actual job of running the government. The holds don't help the credibility of the Senate, either, since many are used precisely so that Senators don't have to go public and acknowledge opposition to a piece of legislation. Ask Ted Stevens, who this summer put a secret hold on a bill to promote more transparency in public spending -- thus making it harder for Mr. Stevens to haul pork back home to Alaska. More often than not, secret holds are levied at the behest of outside special interest groups, the public never the wiser.

The four reformers are now pushing an amendment that would require any Senator who places a hold to make it public within three days. As Senator Grassley said yesterday, this is the right thing to do not only because a hold is "the public's business," but because "if you're a member of the Senate you ought to be man or woman enough to stand up and say what you're for and against, and why." Americans should expect nothing less.

OTHER NEWS:

US Retail Sales Post Unexpected Rise (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

US retail sales unexpectedly grew in August, as sales of automobiles were better than feared and lower petrol prices encouraged consumers to spend.

Economists had expected sales to fall by 0.1 per cent month-on-month, but in fact they rose by 0.2 per cent, after 1.4 per cent jump in July, a report from the Commerce Department said.

Observers were generally upbeat about the figures. "Consumers are sort of trucking along, although there is gradual slowdown under way," said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics.

DOJ_NMG_0063409

The sales data, combined with reports that jobless claims had fallen and business inventories are growing more slowly, suggest that the anticipated economic slowdown will be more modest than some fear, Action Economics said.

Automobiles and parts sales were largely responsible for the positive retail numbers, posting a small 0.4 per cent rise, rather than slipping sharply as had been expected.

Outside of automobile sales, however, the picture was murkier, as sales rose 0.2 per cent, slightly less than the 0.3 per cent analysts predicted, while July and June figures for non-auto sales were revised down. Clothing sales, furniture and electronic goods all fell.

Some were sceptical of the numbers after earlier reports showed that vehicle sales slowed in August.

"The headline is flattered by an inexplicable 0.4 per cent increase in auto sales, which cannot be squared with the 6.3 per cent drop in unit sales reported by the automakers," said Ian Shepherdson, chief US economist with High Frequency Economics. "Expect a downward revision."

But the figures do offer some comfort to the economy, which has been showing signs of strain particularly in the housing market.

"If the consumer keeps spending and the savings rate stays low, it's going to be hard for the economy to slow much," said Mr Englund.

Sales of petrol at gasoline outlets fell by 1 per cent from July, when oil prices reached a record high, keeping extra cash in consumers' pockets.

Falling gas prices may provide an explanation for the resilient levels of spending and a clue to the economy's outlook.

"Over the last month, gasoline prices have fallen ... significantly below September 2005 levels," said Peter Morici of the University of Maryland School of Business. "If sustained, lower gas prices will free up enough disposable income to ... give the economy a needed jolt."

Yields on benchmark 10 year treasurys rose before the data's release, before falling back.

Retail-Sales Growth Eases To 0.2% (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

American consumers tempered their shopping in August as the price of gasoline peaked at more than $3 a gallon, but a subsequent easing in fuel prices has led some economists to expect a rebound in coming months.

Sales at stores and food establishments in August rose 0.2% from July, after jumping 1.4% in July from June, the Commerce Department said. Excluding auto dealers -- whose sales in dollar terms rose slightly even though they sold fewer vehicles -- the August increase was also 0.2%, slightly below economists' expectations.

Further excluding gasoline stations, where a sharp price decline from the early August peak precipitated a drop in the dollar value of sales, retail sales rose 0.4%.

The August report contrasted with July's surprisingly strong data, which had cast doubt on the idea that slowing consumer spending would cool the economy and relieve inflationary pressures. "This shows that the July surge was not a true indication of what is happening," said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at consulting firm MFR Inc. "The consumer has ratcheted back."

The moderate pace of August sales could suggest that, aside from the effect of the summer spike in gasoline prices, a sagging housing market has begun to take a toll on consumers by reducing their ability to extract cash from their homes.

Spending at building-material and garden stores, which tends to track housing-market activity, rose a meager 0.1% in August. July's increase, initially reported at 1.8%, was revised down to 0.3%.

Sales at electronics and appliance stores rose 0.1% in August. Furniture and home-furnishings sales fell 0.3%. Clothing fell 0.3%.

Still, consumer spending overall remains on the rise, and some economists see grounds for a resurgence. Taken together, the retail-sales figures for July and August are consistent with inflation-adjusted consumer-spending growth of about 3.5% in the third quarter, up from 2.6% in the second quarter. Beyond that, gasoline prices have already fallen about 40 cents a gallon from their August peak.

DOJ_NMG_0063410

Each one-cent decline in the price of gasoline, if sustained for a year, frees up about $1 billion in extra spending money -- a direct boost to disposable income that could provide a powerful offset to declines in housing wealth.

"I think sales could come ripping right back," said Brian Jones, senior economist at Citigroup Inc. "Any talk about us having a soft holiday season is way premature."

Much of the benefit of lower gasoline prices would go to lower-income consumers, for whom gasoline bills make up a larger share of total spending. That, said Ira Kalish, director of consumer business at Deloitte Research, could bring about a shift in consumer behavior: While falling house prices could make more-affluent consumers turn frugal, relief on the gasoline-price front could open up the wallets of the poorer majority.

"It's bad for the department-store industry, it's bad for the home-related retailers, but it could be good for discounters," said Mr. Kalish.

Separately, the Labor Department said jobless claims fell in the week ended Sept. 9, putting the four-week average at 314,250. The Labor Department also reported that import prices rose 0.8% in August from July. Excluding a jump in the price of imported fuels, import prices were up 0.2%.

Retail Sales Take Wind Out Of Stocks' Sails (USAT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Stocks snapped a four-day rally Thursday after the government said retail sales excluding autos rose less than economists forecast and an increase in import prices revived inflation concern.

ExxonMobil, the largest publicly traded oil producer, lost 65 cents to $64.71 and led energy shares lower as oil fell 75 cents to $63.22 a barrel. A 0.8% rise in import prices in August caused speculation that today's consumer prices report will show that inflation remains a threat.

“The market is counting on a fairly precise path: growth that is not (so) strong (as) to be inflationary, but not so weak (as) to cause earnings misses,” says Vadim Zlotnikov, chief equity strategist at Sanford C. Bernstein. “That could happen, but it's a low probability.”

The Standard & Poor's 500 index dropped 1.79 points, or 0.1%, to 1316.28. The Dow Jones industrial average lost 15.93 points, or 0.1%, to 11,527.39. The Nasdaq composite index rose 1.06 points, or 0.1%, to 2228.73.

Stocks have risen this month: The S&P is up 1% and the Dow on Wednesday came within 180 points of a new high. Falling oil and signs that the Fed will keep interest rates unchanged drove the advance. The drop in commodity prices helped eclipse concern a housing slump will curb consumer spending.

Retail sales rose 0.2% in August, the Commerce Department said (story, 8B). Sales excluding automobiles were up 0.2%. Economists in a Bloomberg News survey forecast a 0.3% increase. The rise in import prices was led by increases in oil, natural gas and metals. Economists had forecast a 0.3% gain. Excluding oil, prices advanced 0.5%.

The data helped reignite concern that inflation may pick up, leading the Fed to resume raising borrowing costs after pausing at its last meeting on Aug. 8. Policymakers next meet on Wednesday. Futures contracts that allow investors to bet on the direction of interest rates signaled a 22% chance the Fed will boost its benchmark rate to 5.5% by year's end. The futures showed 19% Wednesday.

Today, the Labor Department will likely say consumer prices rose 0.2% in August excluding food and energy, a Bloomberg survey of economists shows. That would be half of July's pace.

“If (the) data show that inflation is not tamed and the economy isn't growing as investors hoped and we're in a stagflation environment, the markets will turn lower,” says Peter Boockvar, equity strategist at Miller Tabak & Co.

Wall Street Dips On Fears Over Inflation (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

US stocks dipped slightly on Thursday after retail sales data rekindled inflationary fears and pulled the main indices away from four-month highs.

DOJ_NMG_0063411

Commodities also resumed their slide, with oil, copper and gold all slipping after a minor rally on Wednesday.

The 10 worst performing stocks in the S&P 500 were all oil or mining groups.

Hess sank 2.6 per cent to $40.30 and oil services group BJ Services slid 4.2 per cent to $30.48. Gold miner Newmont Mining fell 3.5 per cent to $44.14, while copper producer Freeport McMoran slumped 4.3 per cent to $52.00.

Microsoft announced that its Zune digital music player – a rival to Apple's iPod – would be available for purchase at Christmas, which helped push its shares up 1.4 per cent to $26.33.

Sovereign Bancorp jumped 3.2 per cent to $21.21 after the company's chief executive said at a conference that he expected to sell the bank.

At the close, the S&P 500 was down 0.1 per cent, or 1.79 points, at 1,316.28, while the Nasdaq Composite was flat, up 1.06 points, at 2,228.73. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was 0.1 per cent, or 15.93 points, lower at 11,527.39.

Stocks turned lower after the latest economic data from the Commerce Department. Retail sales unexpectedly rose 0.2 per cent in August, compared with most analysts' expectation of a 0.1 per cent decline in sales.

Hugh Johnson, chairman and chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors, said the retail sales news was still not enough to change investors' mindsets.

"Today, I don't think we had news that was surprising enough to get the fence-sitters off the fence," he said. "That big question of whether we are heading towards a hard or soft landing is still very much unanswered. What is needed is news that is going to get investors committed to the bull case or the bear case."

Bear Stearns beat analyst expectations when it reported a 16 per cent rise in quarterly earnings.

Its shares rose 2.5 per cent to $139.68. Bear Stearns is the third investment bank this week – after Goldman Sachs and Lehman Brothers to report better-than-expected results.

Defence and aerospacegroup General Dynamics rose 2.4 per cent to $70.88, after it said it would increase aircraft production by 15 per cent next year due to rising international orders.

The lower fuel costs were a boon to industrial chemical makers, and DuPont gained 2.3 per cent to $41.43.

Genzyme gained 2.7 per cent to $68.35 after it said interim results from a drug trial showed that its multiple sclerosis drug performed better than Serono's Rebif.

XM Satellite Radio leapt 9.4 per cent to $13.69 after Credit Suisse raised its rating on the stock from "neutral" to "outperform".

Shares in chipmaker Xilinx fell 4 per cent to $22.41.

Stocks Slip As Natural Gas Hits Two-Year Low (WSJ)

By Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Stocks took a breather after a four-day winning streak, as oil prices fell again and investors digested data showing higher-than-expected growth in consumer spending and import prices.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average slipped 15.93 points, or 0.14%, to 11527.39. It is up 7.6% from the start of the year, and 196 points short of its record close of 11722.98 in January 2000.

Crude-oil futures rose early on, then fell in tandem with natural gas, which slid to a two-year low on reports of strong inventories. The October contract for natural gas plunged 10.2%, or 56 cents, to $4.89 per million British Thermal Units. That's down 68% from the closing high of $15.38 in December 2005.

Crude futures slipped 75 cents to $63.22 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.14%, or 1.79 points, to 1316.28, while the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index inched 1.06 points higher to 2228.73. Small stocks declined, with the Russell 2000 index falling 0.42% to 727.60.

The Commerce Department said retail sales grew 0.2% on a seasonally adjusted basis in August, mainly because of increased auto sales. Economists had forecast a decline of 0.2%. Import prices, meanwhile, rose 0.8% in August, exceeding expectations of a 0.2% rise.

DOJ_NMG_0063412

Analysts said there were concerns that the stronger-than-expected data might affect the Federal Reserve's views on interest rates, which it has left unchanged since June.

"There's still a debate as to whether the Fed is done, especially if we are not seeing a real slowdown," says Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. "The important numbers are still suggesting some inflation."

Bond yields edged up, pushing prices down, as investors awaited today's reading on another key measure of inflation, the Consumer Price Index.

Brokerage stocks extended their gains after Bear Stearns followed Goldman Sachs Group and Lehman Brothers Holdings by beating estimates for its quarterly earnings. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Bear Stearns shares were up $3.46, or 2.5%, at $139.68.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. On the Big Board, where 2.343 billion shares traded, 1,325 stocks rose and 1,952 fell.

Bonds fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 7/32, or $2.19 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.795%. The 30-year bond fell 10/32 to yield 4.918%.

The dollar weakened. Late in New York, it traded at 117.52 yen, down from 117.58, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2730 from $1.2697.

Some Lawyers Ranked 'Super' Are Not The Least Bit Flattered (NYT)

By Karen Donovan

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Word of mouth is one crucial marketing tool for a lawyer. Getting your name on a list of top lawyers can be another, unless the list is distributed to consumers in New Jersey.

In an opinion that has set off a nationwide discussion, an ethics committee appointed by the New Jersey Supreme Court concluded this summer that a magazine advertising supplement listing the state's top lawyers violated rules of professional conduct.

The focus of the opinion by the Committee on Attorney Advertising was an insert to New Jersey Monthly magazine called New Jersey Super Lawyers, which listed the top 5 percent of the state's lawyers (1,658 of 35,441) and then offered an opportunity to advertise.

The panel questioned the process used to compile the list, but it was also clearly troubled that the supplement was "designed for mass consumption" by New Jersey residents who may have been misled by what they read.

"These self-aggrandizing titles have the potential to lead an unwary consumer to believe that the lawyers so described are, by virtue of the manufactured title, superior to their colleagues who practice in the same area of law," the committee wrote of New Jersey Super Lawyers.

With that, New Jersey became the latest battleground in the long debate over how far lawyers can go to promote themselves. The New Jersey situation offers a snapshot of an issue that has divided lawyers since a 1977 United States Supreme Court ruling that allowed advertising. In this case, the concern is not so much the list as who reads it.

"It's a question of whether the kind of puffing and self-promotion that is everyday fare in mass advertising is absolutely forbidden for lawyers," said Rodney Smolla, dean of the University of Richmond School of Law. "The counterargument is that American consumers are very sophisticated and don't need this kind of protectionism from the government."

This spring, Mr. Smolla represented two personal-injury lawyers from Fort Lauderdale, Fla., who had appealed to the Supreme Court after being disciplined by the Florida bar for running a TV commercial urging accident victims to call 1-800-PIT-BULL; the ad featured the firm's logo — the head of a pit bull with a spiked collar. Justices rejected the petition.

Super Lawyers is not alone in offering lists said to include the top practitioners in an area of law. But unlike most of its rivals, which send their lists to law firms or corporations, Super Lawyers distributes its lists through supplements to mass media publications.

In its opinion, the ethics panel pointed out, for example, that ratings of lawyers in the Martindale-Hubbell legal directory are directed at other lawyers and are "likely to have minimal recognition to the public."

DOJ_NMG_0063413

While consumers are bombarded by ads from lawyers seeking clients for an endless list of possibilities, most complaints about the practice come from lawyers; the New Jersey case was no exception. In a letter to the ethics committee, Lloyd Levenson, who was selected as a New Jersey Super Lawyer in 2005, wrote that he was offended when the company told him of his selection and then informed him he could buy a full-page ad for up to $15,000.

"What the general public takes from that," Mr. Levenson said in an interview, "is that the people who have paid grand sums of money to buy full pages are somehow better than those who are named in the back pages who refused to shell out the dough. And furthermore, if you don't make the small print, you are not worth hiring at all."

William White, publisher of Law & Politics, which prints Super Lawyers, disagreed. "It's pretty clear," he said, that the profiles in the supplement are advertising because the contact information and logos of the law firms are included.

Editions of Super Lawyers appear in 21 states. Law & Politics, based in Minneapolis, is a division of Key Professional Media.

New Jersey is the first state to raise questions about its distribution. Its opinion came out as Super Lawyers: Manhattan Edition arrived in a glossy advertising supplement distributed with The New York Times on July 18.

Such lists have become so numerous that American Lawyer Media, a large legal publisher, offers Web conferences to coach law firms and their marketing staffs on how to manage them.

Large corporate firms view "Chambers USA,'' published by Chambers & Partners of London and distributed to 30,000 companies, as the gold standard.

The doyenne is "The Best Lawyers in America,'' a book distributed to law firms since 1981 to assist them in finding lawyers in distant locales. "Best Lawyers'' chooses its lists mainly by the voting of lawyers chosen in previous editions.

The New Jersey ethics committee faulted "Best Lawyers" in a passing reference for "trending towards" the Super Lawyers business plan. The publisher of Best Lawyers, Steven Naifeh, said his company had distributed its lists free to local publications, including New Jersey Monthly magazine, for many years.

In a footnote, the New Jersey committee also faulted the selection method used by Super Lawyers, calling it unclear, arbitrary and "lacking in empirical" or legally sanctioned support for the results.

Mr. White said the ethics committee never asked about the selection methods.

In New Jersey, the company sent ballots to 30,000 lawyers. To participate, Mr. White said, a lawyer must have practiced for five years or more. The company received responses from 4.8 percent of the ballots in New Jersey and 2.1 percent in Manhattan. After the balloting, Mr. White said, the company's research and a review by a panel produces the final list.

Super Lawyers is challenging the ethics committee's decision at the New Jersey Supreme Court, which granted a stay of the ruling during the appeal.

Across the river in New York, proposed changes would make it illegal for a lawyer to use a "nickname, moniker, motto or trade name that implies an ability to obtain results." Comments on the changes are due today. If the changes go into effect, they would clip the capes of Manhattan's Super Lawyers.

For now, the list continues.

"It's not an exclusive list, I can tell you that," Peter Bicks, managing partner of Orrick, Herrington & Suttcliffe's New York office, said of his Super Lawyers ranking.

Pennsylvania Judges Decide They, Alone, Will Get Raises (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court partly reinstated a controversial raise yesterday that state legislators repealed last year after a popular outcry.

But the ruling said that only judges should receive the raise, not the legislators or other government workers who originally qualified.

DOJ_NMG_0063414

The raise, which was passed at 2 in the morning on July 7, 2005, just before the General Assembly adjourned for the summer, was viewed by critics as sneaky and self-serving. It produced a reaction across the state that led to a Supreme Court justice's being voted out of office in November and the defeat of 17 legislators the following May.

In response to the public outcry, legislators repealed the raise in November.

The Supreme Court ruled that the Pennsylvania Constitution prohibited reducing the salaries of judges unless "all salaried officers of the commonwealth" were also affected. The court said the legislation repealing the raise did not do that because it excluded many state employees.

As a result, the Supreme Court justices will receive the raise, which amounts to more than 10 percent of their current salary, while the rest of the state officials will not.

The court also said the raise for legislators was unconstitutional because legislators are not permitted to receive raises that they draft in the middle of a term before having to face voters again.

"This is a cynical judicial swindle," said Bruce Ledewitz, a professor of constitutional law at Dusquesne University in Pittsburgh and a frequent critic of the Supreme Court. "It's blatantly self-serving, and they don't have the authority to do it."

When legislators drafted the raise, Professor Ledewitz pointed out, they included a "nonseverability" clause, which meant that the raises for one branch of government could not be revoked without canceling the raises for all three branches. The justices rejected that clause, he said, allowing their own raise to be restored.

Russ Diamond, a founder of PACleanSweep, a defunct organization that emerged during the backlash against the raises, said he was not surprised by the ruling.

"To me, it looks like further indication that we do not have an independent judiciary," Mr. Diamond said.

Tim Potts, co-founder of Democracy Rising PA, a good-government advocacy group based in Carlisle, said: "Things were settling down during the summer hiatus, but this decision is definitely going to heat them up again for us. I think those politicians who took the raise before facing the voters have something to worry about."

While the State Supreme Court ruling cannot be appealed, Mr. Potts said he had a lawsuit pending in federal court arguing that the justices could not decide on the salary legislation because they had a financial conflict of interest. He lost the initial ruling, but is appealing.

Study Shows GOP Fundraising Edge Is Slipping (CQPOL)

By Greg Giroux

CQ Politics.com, September 14, 2006

If any prediction is safe in this turbulent and closely contested election, it is that Republican candidates and their affiliated national party committees will raise more money than their Democratic counterparts.

But the fundraising advantages enjoyed by the current GOP congressional majorities over the challenging Democrats are closer than in recent election cycles, according to data presented by campaign finance experts at The Brookings Institution in Washington.

Their findings, released at a Tuesday event, seem to indicate that Democrats — who are benefiting from President Bush's unpopularity and strong public disapproval of Congress — have enough campaign dollars to seriously compete for control of the House and the Senate.

"While, in general, it's true that the candidate who spends the most money wins, in a "national tide" election you always have a substantial number of candidates who spend less than their opponents and win, who are taking advantage of the broader national conditions," said Thomas E. Mann, a senior fellow in governance studies at Brookings. "And I guarantee you, there will be such candidates this time."

In the first 18 months of the 2005-06 campaign cycle, the six major national party campaign committees reported raising a combined $574 million, of which $334 million, or 58 percent, was collected by the GOP organizations: the Republican National Committee (RNC), the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC).

DOJ_NMG_0063415

Their Democratic counterparts — the Democratic National Committee (DNC), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) — raised $240 million, or 42 percent, of the two-party total.

While the GOP advantage is substantial, it is actually smaller than the Republicans' edge at a similar point in the competitive 2004 campaign. At the 18-month mark of that campaign cycle, the party's three committees collected $385 million and the Democrats took in $230.6 million (63 percent to 37 percent). The GOP committees, through June in this cycle, raised about $51 million less than in 2004, while the Democrats raised about $9 million more.

In the first 18 months of the 2002 cycle — the last midterm election campaign and the last campaign of any sort in which party committees were allowed to raise unlimited "soft money" dollars — the Republican advantage was even more lopsided: the three GOP committees raised $404.8 million (64 percent of the total) and the Democratic committees raised $228 million (36 percent).

"What these figures suggest is that both parties are continuing to demonstrate financial strength in the midterm cycle, and that both parties are continuing to benefit from this highly partisan and polarized environment, which is conducive to party fundraising — but that the Democrats are doing much better on a relative basis than has been the case in other recent midterm elections," said Anthony Corrado, a government professor and campaign finance expert at Maine's Colby College.

The narrowing of the GOP's financial advantage also is evident in the partisan breakdown of individual donations to House and Senate candidates running this year.

In the first 18 months of the 2005-06 campaign cycle, individual donors gave $154.8 million to House Republican candidates and $146.7 million to House Democratic candidates — a small advantage for the GOP, especially when compared to past elections. At a similar point two years ago, House GOP candidates raised $150.1 million from individual donors, compared to $116.5 million raised by House Democratic candidates from individuals.

The shift was even more pronounced in the Senate committees' fundraising, with the Democrats emerging with a substantial advantage. In the first 18 months of the 2005-06 election cycle, individuals donors gave $145.1 million to Democratic Senate candidates and $102.3 million to Republican Senate candidates — a bigger edge for the Democrats than in 2004, when the parties' Senate candidates were much closer to parity in such contributions.

"A big part of the story to date in 2006 is individuals are back and contributing more, and especially contributing more to Senate and House Democratic candidates," said David B. Magleby, a political scientist at Brigham Young University in Utah.

The data also show that the parties have been able to fill most of the void created by the elimination of soft money under provisions of a campaign finance law overhaul enacted in 2002 and implemented prior to the 2004 elections.

The $574 million in receipts by the six party committees is not substantially less than the $633 million the organizations raised during the first 18 months of the 2001-02 cycle, when the committees were permitted to complement their heavily regulated and limited "hard money" receipts with unlimited soft-money contributions.

Corrado attributed the parties' success in boosting their hard-money numbers to enhanced small-donor bases, improved technology and the widespread expectation of a highly competitive 2006 midterm election.

Flush with cash, the party committees are preparing to unload the millions they banked for independent expenditure campaigns to promote their preferred candidates and attack the opposition — though the law bars direct coordination with candidates concerning these efforts. In some cases, these party-sponsored independent expenditures will exceed the campaign expenses of the candidates themselves.

"We are going to see more party support for candidates than ever before," Corrado said.

Other major players in the financing of the 2006 elections are the "527" political committees that organize under Section 527 of the Internal Revenue Code and are allowed to accept unlimited contributions to influence elections. Wealthy donors who formerly gave soft money to the political parties have been shifting these large outlays to 527 committees, which already are spending money on television advertisements.

Magleby said "there will be even more substantial outside money" spent by 527 groups and 501(c) nonprofit organizations in congressional contests than in 2004, when such groups concentrated heavily on the close presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0063416

One Democratic-affliated 527 called Majority Action has recently reported spending $114,000 on television ads criticizing Republican Reps. James T. Walsh of New York and Deborah Pryce of Ohio. Majority Action is headed by Mark Longabaugh, a former campaign aide to the League of Conservation Voters and to the 2000 presidential campaign of former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley, and himself a Democratic House candidate in Ohio's 1st District in 1996.

The same filing revealed that Majority Action recently received contributions of $120,000 from George Soros, the liberal billionaire financier who also heavily backed liberal 527 groups in the 2004 presidential election, and $100,000 from Linda Pritzker, an heir to the Hyatt Hotel fortune who is also a generous Democratic Party donor.

One busy Republican-aligned 527 is the Economic Freedom Fund, which has aired television ads attacking Reps. Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia and Jim Marshall of Georgia in their home districts.

A recent filing by the Economic Freedom Fund said it received a $5 million contribution from Houston homebuilder Bob J. Perry, a prominent Republican donor who also helped fund the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a 527 organization that was influential in aiding President Bush's defeat of Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry in the 2004 presidential race.

"This looks like it's going to be a very financially competitive midterm election . . . None of these races are going to lack for funding," Corrado said.

A rundown of campaign fundraising figures cited in the report can be found here.

Fundraising Totals By The Numbers (CQPOL)

By Greg Giroux

CQ Politics.com, September 14, 2006

The following is a summary of recent campaign fundraising activity by the six major national party committees, comparing their efforts in the current 2005-06 election cycle with those in other recent cycles. The data was prepared by the Center for the Study of Elections and Democracy at Brigham Young University, and were presented Tuesday by a panel of experts on campaign finance.

A story on that event, which was hosted by The Brookings Institution, can be found here.

The figures show that Republican committees continue to enjoy a decided advantage over their Democratic counterparts, but that the Democrats have narrowed the fundraising gap as they attempt to win control of one or both chambers of Congress this November.

All figures are as of the 18-month point in a two-year campaign cycle, or through June 30 of the election year. So receipts for the current cycle reflect how much a committee raised from Jan. 1, 2005 through June 30 of this year.

The parties have filed subsequent reports for July, and the reports for August are due next week. A month-by-month chart of receipts, expenditures and cash-on-hand can be found here.

Receipts for the 2001-02 cycle include "soft money" contributions that the national party committees were allowed to accept through that campaign year. These unlimited contributions were barred by a campaign finance law overhaul that was enacted in 2002 and took effect for the 2004 elections.

Receipts are higher for the DNC and the RNC in the 2004 cycle than for the current cycle, because they were active in that year's presidential race.

Democratic National Committee (DNC)

2005-06 receipts: $90.4 million

2003-04 receipts: $125.4 million

2001-02 receipts: $99 million

2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $35 million (28 percent drop)

2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $8.6 million (9 percent drop)

Republican National Committee (RNC)

2005-06 receipts: $168.2 million

2003-04 receipts: $219.4 million

2001-2002 receipts: $200.9 million

DOJ_NMG_0063417

2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $51.2 million (23 percent drop)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $32.7 million (16 percent drop)
Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC)
2005-06 receipts: $73 million
2003-04 receipts: $49.3 million
2001-2002 receipts: $70.3 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $23.7 million (48 percent gain)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Up $2.7 million (4 percent gain)
National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC)
2005-06 receipts: $62.6 million
2003-04 receipts: $50.4 million
2001-2002 receipts: $86.2 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $12.2 million (24 percent gain)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $23.6 million (27 percent drop)
Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC - House campaigns)
2005-06 receipts: $76.6 million
2003-04 receipts: $56 million
2001-2002 receipts: $58.7 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $20.6 million (37 percent gain)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Up $17.9 million (30 percent gain)
National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC - House campaigns)
2005-06 receipts: $102.9 million
2003-04 receipts: $115.2 million
2001-2002 receipts: $117.7 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $12.3 million (11 percent drop)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $14.8 million (13 percent drop)
Democratic Party committees (DNC, DSCC, DCCC) combined
2005-06 receipts: $240 million
2003-04 receipts: $230.7 million
2001-2002 receipts: $228 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $9.3 million (4 percent gain)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Up $12 million (5 percent gain)
Republican Party committees (RNC, NRSC, NRCC) combined
2005-06 receipts: $333.7 million
2003-04 receipts: $385 million
2001-2002 receipts: $404.8 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $51.3 million (13 percent drop)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $71.1 million (18 percent drop)

Swift Boat Ads Backer Funds New Group (AP-Y)

By Ben Evans

AP, September 14, 2006

The Republican donor who helped bankroll the Swift Boat attacks on Democratic Sen. John Kerry's war record has given $5 million to a new group targeting Democratic candidates.

Bob J. Perry, a Texas homebuilder with close ties to White House advisor Karl Rove and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, recently made the hefty donations to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group.

DOJ_NMG_0063418

The group is a so-called 527 that is not subject to conventional campaign finance restrictions and can spend unlimited amounts on election advocacy, similar to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth. In the 2004 presidential race, the group of Vietnam veterans made unsubstantiated allegations challenging Kerry's record of wartime heroism.

So far, the new group — which lists Perry as its sole donor — has spent slightly more than $500,000 on television ads and mailings criticizing Democratic Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Alan Mollohan of West Virginia, according to a disclosure form filed last week with the Federal Election Commission.

According to its Web site, the group also is distributing mailing supporting Republican Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue's re-election campaign and Jim Nussle of Iowa, a Republican congressman running for governor.

Anthony Holm, a spokesman for Perry, declined to comment. Charles H. Bell Jr., a Sacramento attorney listed as the fund's contact, did not return repeated phone calls. On its FEC filings, the group lists as its address the same Sacramento office as Bell's law firm, Bell, McAndrews & Hiltachk.

The West Virginia and Georgia races are considered among the GOP's best shots at picking up seats in an election year where some experts believe the party is in danger of losing its majority in Congress.

Perry's $5 million donation, made in two payments on Aug. 18 and Sept. 5, is among the largest individual donation to any 527 group this year, although contribution records are still being filed. It exceeds the nearly $4.5 million that Perry gave the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth in 2004.

By comparison, billionaire Democratic donor George Soros has given about $2.3 million this year to several outside groups.

According to its Sept. 8 disclosure, the Economic Freedom Fund has spent $337,753 on the West Virginia race, where Mollohan, a 12-term Democrat, faces Republican state delegate Chris Wakim. The group has spent $163,599 in Georgia, where two-term incumbent Marshall is being challenged by former Republican congressman Mac Collins.

The West Virginia ads address recent allegations regarding Mollohan's ethics, citing news reports that he is the subject of a federal investigation into whether he steered government money to nonprofit groups that donated to his campaigns.

The Georgia ads portray Marshall, a conservative Democrat, as a liberal linking him to Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Ted Kennedy and Rep. Cynthia McKinney, who lost her seat in a Democratic primary after a highly publicized scuffle with a Capitol Hill police officer.

Marshall spokesman Doug Moore said voters in the district are familiar enough with Marshall's record to know the ads are off base.

"Getting out there and calling Jim Marshall a liberal in the Macon media market isn't going to be effective," Moore said. "Everybody here knows Jim, and they know he's conservative."

Unlike with Kerry and the Swift Boat group, the Economic Freedom Fund has not questioned Marshall's Vietnam War service. A former Army Ranger platoon sergeant and recent inductee into the Army Ranger Hall of Fame, Marshall was awarded two Bronze Stars and a Purple Heart for his service in Vietnam.

"Jim Marshall has a great military record, and I hope they bring that up because we would love to make that an issue in this campaign," Moore said.

The group also made automated phone calls supporting Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel and criticizing his Indiana rival, but the effort may have done more harm than good. A spokeswoman for the Indiana Attorney General's office said Thursday it will investigate a complaint that the calls violate the state's law against automated phone calls.

According to its filing, the Economic Freedom Fund was formed to "promote policies and issues favoring economic freedom, growth and prosperity of the economy."

____

On The Net

Economic Freedom Fund: http://www.economicfreedomfund.com

Fla. Gov Candidate Names Running Mate (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff

DOJ_NMG_0063419

AP, September 15, 2006

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis named a former state senator to be his running mate Thursday, a choice that could lead to Florida's first black lieutenant governor.

Daryl Jones, 51, was the first black candidate to make a serious run for Florida governor, coming in third in the 2002 primary.

"We need a leader with a proven record of standing up for what he believes in and in bringing people together and Daryl Jones is that leader," Davis said. "People are hungry for change."

Jones, a former Air Force fighter pilot, served six of his 12 years in the Legislature with Davis before Davis was elected to Congress in 1996. Jones was considered an intelligent, independent lawmaker and won respect among colleagues in both parties.

Jones is also a lawyer, but said he stopped practicing several years ago.

In November, the pair will face Republican nominee Charlie Crist, who on Wednesday named state Rep. Jeff Kottkamp to be his running mate.

Jones was in the national spotlight in 1998, when President Clinton nominated him to be the first black Air Force secretary. He was rejected in a bitter Senate confirmation process. Witnesses testified that as a reserve pilot, he almost ran out of fuel once and flew the wrong way another time.

Additional testimony raised questions about his background and character. His former squadron commander said he had to be grounded and given a desk job, an account Jones denied.

Jones said Thursday the Senate decision was "partisan politics" and noted that "the Air Force promoted me since then so they think I'm all right."

In 2002, he said he had no interest in becoming lieutenant governor, calling the position largely ceremonial and quipping that if elected he "would wind up being so good at golf I'd become good enough for the senior tour."

Asked about his previous remark, Jones said Thursday that the difference now is "the timing."

"In this case, Jim Davis is somebody that I have known who has tremendous experience both state and federal," Jones said. "He knows exactly what he's doing."

Senate Candidate Speaks Of Life, Faith (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Robert P. Casey Jr., the Democratic candidate seeking to unseat Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) in one of the country's hottest election campaigns, told a largely Roman Catholic audience yesterday that in his view, "neither party has gotten it right when it comes to life issues."

Casey, a lifelong Catholic who opposes abortion, is the second high-profile Democrat who has recently given a major address defending the place of religion in politics. In June, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) criticized "liberals who dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant."

Since the 2004 presidential election, in which voters who attend church weekly voted 2 to 1 for President Bush over Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), Democrats have sought to close what some call the "God gap" in U.S. politics.

Casey's candidacy is viewed by Democratic strategists not only as one of the party's best opportunities to pick up a Senate seat, but also as an illustration of its growing inclusion of politicians who oppose abortion and of its desire to reach out to religiously motivated voters.

In a 45-minute lecture at Catholic University's Columbus School of Law, his alma mater, Casey said that America "must be a country dedicated to the common good" and that "my understanding of our common good comes from my family and my faith."

He described a year that he spent teaching at the Gesu School, an inner-city parochial school in north Philadelphia, after graduating from Holy Cross and before going to law school. "My short year as a Jesuit volunteer had a profound impact on my life, and the struggles of those I met in the inner city continue to inspire me," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0063420

Casey said the common good is built on a foundation of social justice. "Justice demands our understanding that the hungry, the impoverished and the uninsured in this country are not statistics; they are children of God," he said.

Turning to abortion, he called for Democrats and Republicans to "unite . . . behind the understanding that the common good requires us to value all life." As an example, he cited legislation proposed by House Democrats that would target "the underlying factors that often lead women to choose abortion."

Some of the sharpest language in Casey's speech was aimed at his party. In 1992, the Democratic National Committee did not let Casey's father, then-Gov. Robert P. Casey Sr., speak at its national convention because of his antiabortion views. Referring to that "dark night," the younger Casey said the party "insulted the most courageous pro-life Democrat in the land, who asked that those who believed in the right to life be accorded the right to speak."

But he also had some sharp words for conservatives who focus primarily on the rights of the unborn. "If we are going to be pro-life, we cannot say we are against abortion . . . and then let our children suffer in broken schools," he said. "We can't claim to be pro-life at the same time we are cutting support for Medicaid, Head Start or the Women, Infants and Children's Program."

Some conservative Catholic groups objected to the university's invitation to Casey because he supports the widespread availability of the emergency contraceptive known as Plan B and has backed civil unions for same-sex couples.

"It is ironic Casey's speech topic is 'Restoring America's Moral Compass' when his own compass on moral issues is misguided," said Joseph Cella, leader of the group Fidelis.

But Tom Perriello, an adviser to the liberal group Catholics United for the Common Good, said the speech was "exciting, because as Catholics we've so often had to choose between the pro-life and the pro-social-justice sides of Catholic teaching. Now we get to have a debate about what authentic Catholic teaching is all about."

Let Reagan Be Reagan (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

IT IS A TICKLISH thing for Sen. George Allen, a Republican running for reelection in Virginia, that his Democratic opponent, James Webb, once worked for President Ronald Reagan. And it is especially awkward for Mr. Allen that the Gipper seems to have admired Mr. Webb, a highly decorated Vietnam veteran, and said so. But the fact remains that Mr. Webb did serve Mr. Reagan, both as Navy secretary and as assistant secretary of defense, and that the late president once lauded him publicly before a large crowd at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis. So it is easily within the bounds of fairness that the Webb campaign is airing an advertisement that includes 10 seconds or so of Mr. Reagan paying tribute that day to Mr. Webb's "gallantry as a Marine officer in Vietnam."

The Allen camp has cried foul, and an official at the Reagan Presidential Library in California, acting on Nancy Reagan's behalf, has asked that the ad be pulled. Neither protest has merit. The late president's public utterances are not the private property of his library or family. As for Mr. Allen, his campaign complains that the clip misleadingly implies the former president's support for Mr. Webb's candidacy. By that tortuous line of reasoning, the photograph on the Allen campaign's Web site, showing a young Mr. Allen shaking Mr. Reagan's hand, is also an implied endorsement -- which it isn't.

The president is a public official, paid by the taxpayers. His speeches are in the public domain; they belong to all Americans, and to history. His words may fairly be the subject of bitter debate and divergent interpretation for decades or centuries to come, but they should not be censored posthumously. In this instance, Mr. Webb has neither distorted Mr. Reagan's words nor taken them out of context; nor did Mr. Reagan ever repudiate them. The clip in question is a testimonial to Mr. Webb's service to his country in government and the military, not to a senatorial campaign that Mr. Reagan obviously never observed. It's a good bet that Virginians are clued in to the fact that Mr. Reagan, being dead, has taken no position on the Allen-Webb race. As for the partisans, they should let Reagan be Reagan.

Nationalizing Politics (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

BALTIMORE -- This year's elections may turn the Tip O'Neill adage "All politics is local" not so much upside down as sideways: In 2006 all local politics is national, and all national politics is individual.

DOJ_NMG_0063421

The United States is witnessing a centralization and nationalization of politics unprecedented in our history. This trend is rooted in the rise of the political consulting industry, vast changes in the technology of campaigning, and the intense competition between the two major parties for control of Congress.

There is, as well, the concentration of political money at the national level as Washington-based interest groups, associations and lobbyists not only raise large amounts in political contributions within the capital but also mobilize campaign money from their allies around the country.

The blogosphere has created central repositories of political information -- including news of very local developments that would otherwise go unnoticed on the national level -- that can speed the flow of intelligence to activists across the nation. And the recruitment of candidates is ever more the job of national party committees, not local officials or organizations.

The result is that the conventional debate about whether congressional elections are primarily local or national in character is both irrelevant and misleading. Even apparently local developments are often orchestrated from afar, and even personal attacks on individual candidates are largely the work of a cadre of Washington-based researchers.

Developments over the past week, including those in Tuesday's primaries, show how important national party machines are to the fate of individual candidates.

The most ironic national intervention was in Rhode Island, where Sen. Lincoln Chafee, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, who has often voted against President Bush, was powered to renomination over conservative Stephen Laffey by the voter identification and message apparatus created by Bush; his top political aide, Karl Rove; and pollster Matthew Dowd.

Here was the president's own political operation trying to identify and bring anti-Bush voters to the polls to renominate an anti-Bush senator who is his party's only hope for holding a Senate seat in a very anti-Bush state. Ideology and loyalty are far less important than control over Washington's levers of power. Chafee, who prides himself on independence, was in fact hugely dependent on a national party he often opposes.

Days before Chafee won his primary, The Post's Jim VandeHei and Chris Cillizza reported that the National Republican Congressional Committee, using research by its own operatives, plans to run tough, negative ads against Democratic challengers this fall on "personal issues and local controversies."

These ads will be classic instances of seemingly individual and local factors invoked as part of a national, centrally directed effort. Such attack ads are likely to be used most in districts in the Northeast and Midwest where Republican candidates will be trying not to talk much about national Republican issues.

Even turning away from your party can be a national partisan strategy, and Republicans are hoping to hold Congress by electing a herd of "independent fighters." At least five Republican candidates describe themselves with that phrase. New Jersey Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. calls himself an "independent fighter," and so do Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio and Reps. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania, Heather Wilson of New Mexico and Vito Fossella of New York.

In Maryland, Republicans hope to use local conflicts in the Democratic Party along racial lines to help Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, whose compelling personal story led the national party to recruit him, against Rep. Ben Cardin, the winner of this week's Democratic U.S. Senate primary.

Cardin defeated former representative Kweisi Mfume, who, like Steele, is black. Mark Clack, Mfume's campaign manager, said here that Steele could "play off" African American resentment "against the Maryland Democratic establishment" over the lack of black representation at the top of the Democratic ticket.

Clack said that for Cardin to win, "the frustration level in the African American community will have to be doused." But he thinks Cardin will succeed, because African American voters have not forgotten the Republicans' use of racial "wedge issues" in past elections and because Steele's need to mobilize the GOP's conservative base will run counter to his effort to appeal to the black community. The Washington Republicans, on the other hand, hope Steele can be a success story in their well-coordinated national effort to blur national issues.

So in 2006 the local is not really local, everything is about controlling Washington, and "independence" is a product being franchised by a national party apparatus.

Progress Or Regress? (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0063422

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Is the typical American family better off than it was a generation ago? That's the subject of an intense debate these days, as commentators try to understand the sour mood of the American public.

But it's the wrong debate. For one thing, there probably isn't a right answer. Most Americans are better off in some ways, worse off in others, than they were in the early 1970's. It's a subjective judgment whether the good outweighs the bad. And as I'll explain, that ambiguity is actually the real message.

Here's what the numbers say. From the end of World War II until 1973, when the first oil crisis brought an end to the postwar boom, the U.S. economy delivered a huge, broad-based rise in living standards: family income adjusted for inflation roughly doubled for the poor, the middle class, and the elite alike. Nobody debated whether families were better off than they had been a generation ago; it was obvious that they were, by any measure.

Since 1973, however, the picture has been mixed. Real median household income — the income of the household in the middle of the income distribution, adjusted for inflation — rose a modest 16 percent between 1973 and 2005. But even this small rise didn't reflect clear gains across the board. The typical full-time male worker saw his wages, adjusted for inflation, actually fall; the typical household's real income was up only because women's wages rose (although by far less than everyone's wages rose during the postwar boom) and because more women were working.

The debate over the state of the middle class, for the most part, is about whether these numbers understate or overstate the true progress achieved by typical families. The optimists point to technological advances that, they argue, don't get reflected in official estimates of the standard of living. In 1973, you couldn't chat on a cellphone, watch a video or surf the Internet; many medical conditions that are now easily managed with drugs were untreatable; and so on.

The pessimists point to ways in which life has deteriorated, things that also aren't counted by the official statistics. Traffic has gotten far worse, and commutes have gotten longer. The economic riskiness of life has increased: year-to-year fluctuations in family income have grown much larger. The rat race has intensified, as families, no longer confident in the quality of public education, stretch to buy houses in good school districts — and often go bankrupt when misfortune strikes in the form of a layoff for either spouse or high medical bills.

Does the good outweigh the bad? Never mind. As I said, the ambiguity is the message.

Consider this: The United States economy is far richer and more productive than it was a generation ago. Statistics on economic growth aside, think of all the technological advances that have made workers more productive over the past generation. In 1973, there were no personal computers, let alone the Internet. Even fax machines were rare, expensive items, and there were no bar-code scanners at checkout counters. Freight containerization was still uncommon. The list goes on and on.

Yet in spite of all this technological progress, which has allowed the average American worker to produce much more, we're not sure whether there was any rise in the typical worker's pay. Only those at the upper end of the income distribution saw clear gains — gains that were enormous for the lucky few at the very top.

That's why the debate over whether the middle class is a bit better off or a bit worse off now than a generation ago misses the point. What we should be debating is why technological and economic progress has done so little for most Americans, and what changes in government policies would spread the benefits of progress more widely. An effort to shore up middle-class health insurance, paid for by a rollback of recent tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans — something like the plan proposed by John Kerry two years ago, but more ambitious — would be a good place to start.

Instead, the people running our government are fixated on cutting tax rates for the wealthy even further. And their solution to Americans' justified economic anxiety is a public relations campaign, an effort to convince middle-class families that their problems are a figment of their imagination.

Everyday Low Wages (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063423

Mayor Richard M. Daley of Chicago wielded the first veto of his 17-year tenure this week — and the City Council supported him — striking down Chicago's short-lived plan to force behemoth retailers like Wal-Mart to pay higher wages and benefits.

In this round, Mr. Daley, the retailers and local Wal-Mart suppliers argued that mandating higher compensation would do more harm than good by driving business and employment opportunities away from low-income neighborhoods.

But the choice — between no jobs or low-wage jobs — is probably a false one. Wal-Mart and other mega-retailers, like Target and Home Depot, need market share. With suburban areas saturated, cities are the logical places to grow. Wal-Mart especially needs more American consumers, having recently pulled the plug on unsuccessful attempts to expand in Germany and South Korea. It is currently planning to expand in Santa Fe, N.M., where local laws require higher wages than the company normally pays.

Another argument propounded by Wal-Mart is that paying higher wages would compel the company to raise its prices, hurting low-income consumers. Wage gains do not automatically lead to higher prices. They could be absorbed by higher productivity or by a narrowing of profit margins. Given Wal-Mart's profits, the company could improve its wage structure and still beat the competition.

The Chicago ordinance raised legal and technical questions. If Mr. Daley had not wielded the veto, it would surely have faced a court challenge. But proponents of living wages have the moral high ground, and are increasingly finding a political voice. Chicago hasn't heard the last of them, and Washington hasn't either.

New Jersey Switcheroo (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

For pure entertainment value, not much can compete with the blood sport of New Jersey politics. Last week federal investigators launched a probe into whether U.S. Senator Robert Menendez illegally benefited to the tune of more than $300,000 from a rental-income deal he had with a nonprofit agency that received millions of dollars in federal contracts. Even liberal good government groups agree that the relationship may have violated congressional conflict-of-interest rules.

The allegations have sparked a mini-panic among state Democratic operatives, who not so long ago thought Mr. Menendez -- who was appointed by Jon Corzine to complete his Senate term after being elected Governor in 2005 -- had the November election in the bag. Now they see Republican Tom Kean Jr. surging into a lead. If Republicans were to pick up a seat in this deep blue state, Democrats' chances of winning control of the Senate would be all but slammed shut.

That's why, as reported by the Newark Star-Ledger, there's now widespread speculation that the party brass may decide to throw Mr. Menendez overboard and replace him with an alternative -- nine-term Rep. Rob Andrews, perhaps -- who is regarded as more electable. This has become a familiar practice in the Garden State and has become known derisively as the New Jersey Switcheroo.

The details of the case are as follows. In 1998, while Mr. Menendez was a member of the House, he helped a nonprofit housing and health-care agency known as the North Hudson Community Action Group win designation as a federally qualified health-care center. This designation allowed the nonprofit group to obtain $9.6 million in federal grants. The nonprofit's employees have contributed some $30,000 to Menendez campaigns over the years, including $9,000 from the agency's director. The alleged conflict of interest arises from the fact that the Hudson County nonprofit paid Mr. Menendez a total of $329,353 starting in 1994 to rent a building he owned.

The Senator responds that his efforts on behalf of the Hudson County Action Group are no different than interventions he has made on behalf of dozens of similar nonprofit groups seeking federal funds. He also says that he received verbal authorization from a House Ethics Committee staffer on this deal. But strangely enough, as reported by Roll Call, the staffer didn't work for the committee at the time Mr. Menendez says he received the approval, and that person has subsequently died. It is also considered standard practice to get written approval from the committee when an ethical issue like this arises.

If this story seems like déjà vu all over again, it should. This isn't the first time New Jersey Democrats have nominated ethically challenged candidates for high office. Last year Jim McGreevey resigned the governorship after he hired his gay lover as the state's national security director. In 2002, Senator Robert Torricelli was implicated in a bribery and campaign finance scandal, prompting the party oligarchs to throw him off the ballot and handpick Frank Lautenberg as his replacement on the ticket. Never mind that the deadline for ballot changes had passed. Senator Lautenberg kept the Senate seat from falling into Republican hands.

DOJ_NMG_0063424

Republicans haven't won a statewide race in New Jersey since the election of Governor Christie Whitman back in the mid-1990s, in part because the Democratic machine reserves the imperial right to replace elected candidates on the general election ballot. Nowhere in the country do party leaders so cavalierly disenfranchise their primary voters when they fear their nominee is going to lose. For the New Jersey GOP, it's like trying to win at poker when your opponent can call for a redeal every time he doesn't like his cards.

Senator Menendez has vowed to stay in the race to the bitter end. Democrat leaders publicly insist they will stick with the Senator, but they sound about as sincere as a sports franchise owner who gives the head coach a public vote of confidence after a third straight last-place finish. At the next press conference, the coach invariably is gone.

The more serious issue here is whether Garden State voters are growing weary of the culture of big boss cronyism that has contaminated their government from city hall to the U.S. Senate. This is a state with a steeply rising cost of living and a property-tax burden that is both the highest in the nation and twice the national average. The state has some of the worst schools and most expensive municipal services in the country.

We don't know whether Mr. Menendez is guilty of violating federal conflict-of-interest laws. But it's worth noting that a Senate ethics complaint has been filed against him. The last major Senate ethics investigation was the one launched four years ago against New Jersey's Torricelli.

U.S. And S. Korea To Push To Restart Nuclear Talks (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun agreed yesterday to work together to restart stalled six-party nuclear talks with North Korea, but they skated over their deep differences in how to deal with the isolated Stalinist government in Pyongyang.

Emerging from an Oval Office meeting, Bush stressed the potential benefits to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il if he returns to the negotiating table and ultimately gives up his nuclear weapons. Bush avoided the sort of hard-edged tone that in the past has irritated the South Koreans, who want to take a less confrontational approach.

"First and foremost," Bush said, "the incentive is for Kim Jong Il to understand there is a better way to improve the lives of his people than being isolated -- that stability in the region is in his interests."

But Bush and Roh made no concrete progress on the North Korean stalemate, U.S. officials said, nor did they reach a breakthrough on various other issues that divide them. The two sides have been trying to negotiate a free-trade pact that would be the largest for the United States since the North American Free Trade Agreement a decade ago. They have also been discussing a plan for U.S. commanders to relinquish operational command of South Korean troops during wartime.

U.S.-South Korean ties have grown increasingly strained as Bush and Roh split over the North Korean nuclear issue.

The last time Bush and Roh met, 10 months ago in South Korea, Roh privately grilled Bush on whether the administration was trying to sabotage the six-party North Korea process and his government publicly embarrassed the Americans by leaking plans to withdraw 1,000 troops from Iraq. North Korea has refused since November to return to the talks, which also involve Japan, China and Russia.

In recent weeks, U.S. and South Korean officials have sparred over how to respond to North Korea's summertime missile tests, with Washington pressing for tougher actions and Seoul dismissing the political importance of the episode. Wary of a public spat, the White House decided to minimize the chance of discord at yesterday's meeting by scrapping any joint news statement and limiting the encounter to an hour-long session in the Oval Office followed by a lunch focused on human rights abuses in North Korea.

An administration official said the two leaders came up with "no more specific proposals" on North Korea during the meeting but said the spirit was congenial and constructive. Bush aides were pleased that Roh pledged to enforce U.N. sanctions against North Korea stemming from the missile tests and the South Koreans were pleased that Bush committed to further consultation on the question of wartime military command. At a brief session with reporters, Bush called the relationship "strong and vital."

DOJ_NMG_0063425

"Some meetings have been less jovial than others, but this looked like it was better than others and did what they needed to do," said Michael J. Green, a former Asia adviser to Bush now at Georgetown University and the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), chairman of the House International Relations subcommittee on Asia, said the lack of fireworks by itself made it a successful meeting but added that he remains worried about the rift. "Nothing went awry, and that is positive," he said. "There are ups and downs and today is on the more positive side than a year ago. But this is a very serious dilemma."

Bush, Roh Hope To Restart Talks With Pyongyang (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. President George W. Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun said their nations are committed to bringing North Korea back to stalled negotiations over its nuclear-weapons program, ignoring differences about the best way to do that.

Mr. Bush said the decision of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to boycott the talks "has really strengthened the alliance" of the U.S., South Korea, China, Japan and Russia. Mr. Roh echoed that, saying the countries would work together to restart negotiations.

Since North Korea began boycotting the disarmament talks in November, the country has sparked concerns around the world as reports circulate that it may be preparing for a nuclear-bomb test. North Korea also defied international warnings and tested seven missiles in July.

Some observers have suggested that mixed messages from Washington and Seoul on how to solve the crisis have allowed Pyongyang to augment its nuclear arsenal as the country falls into deeper isolation.

The Bush administration favors a hard-line approach, refusing to talk to the North outside six-nation talks. Mr. Roh has tried to engage the North. Mr. Roh's low-key trip to Washington had many wondering whether there are cracks in an alliance forged five decades ago during the Korean War.

N. Korea's Refusal To Talk Bolstered Allies, Bush Says (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

President Bush, meeting yesterday with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun in the Oval Office, said North Korea's refusal to return to negotiations had "strengthened" the alliance of five countries trying to persuade the communist nation to abandon its nuclear program.

Mr. Bush, in his first meeting with the South Korean leader since North Korea conducted missile tests in July, said the stalled talks should help convince President Kim Jong-il that "there is a better way to improve the lives of his people than being isolated."

"His refusal to come back to the six-party talks has really strengthened an alliance of five nations that are determined to solve this issue peacefully but recognize a threat posed by a country in the region armed with a nuclear weapon," the president said.

Mr. Roh said his nation, along with the United States, China, Japan and Russia, should continue to press North Korea to resume talks.

"What is important to remember is that the fact that we are consulting closely on the North Korean nuclear issue and we are consulting on ways to restart the six-party process, and I believe this is the important point," he said through a translator.

Still, neither leader offered specific measures to prompt North Korea to return to the bargaining table.

The on-again, off-again talks stalled last November, when North Korea began a boycott, in part because Pyongyang wants the United States to end financial restrictions prompted by accusations that the nation counterfeits U.S. money and trades in illegal drugs. Mr. Kim also wants to engage in bilateral talks with the United States, an idea Mr. Bush has rejected.

DOJ_NMG_0063426

Although worldwide fears that the country would conduct nuclear tests have not yet been realized, North Korea, which nuclear specialists say has several atomic weapons, defied international warnings by test-launching seven missiles, including one that is capable of reaching the United States.

While the Bush administration advocates tougher U.N. sanctions against North Korea, Mr. Roh prefers to continue negotiations. After an hourlong meeting at the White House, Mr. Bush sounded a softer tone about the standoff, saying the United States is "determined to resolve this issue peacefully but recognizes a threat posed by a country in the region armed with a nuclear weapon."

Mr. Roh said it is not yet "the appropriate time to think about the possibility of a failure of the six-party process."

"There is a concern in Korea that the United States will take further sanctions against North Korea and whether this will jeopardize the chance of a successful six-party process, my answer is that we are working very hard on restarting the six-party talks," he said.

Mr. Roh has criticized the Bush administration for seeking to isolate the already reclusive North Korean leader, saying in July that the North's test-firing was more likely for political rather than military purposes.

But Mr. Roh also stood firm against North Korea. "My government has taken certain measures, and ... we are, in fact, taking measures tantamount to sanctions after the North Korean missile launches," he said.

Iran President Softens Nuclear Tone (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, said on Thursday that Tehran was open to compromise on the dispute over the country's nuclear programme, as talks continued between the Islamic republic and the European Union.

Speaking in Senegal on his way to a non-aligned summit in Cuba and then the annual gathering of the United Nations, Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said that Iran was open to "new conditions" on the subject.

"I am announcing that we are available, we are ready for new conditions," he said. He declined to say whether Iran was prepared to suspend uranium enrichment, a process that can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

But at a meeting last weekend between Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear security official, and Javier Solana, the EU's foreign policy chief, Iran floated the idea of suspending enrichment for an initial period of up to two months once negotiations began.

Mr Larijani and Mr Solana had been scheduled to see each other again on Thursday, but the two men's deputies met instead in Geneva.

European officials said the meeting might have been downgraded because of the work needed to reach any agreement to begin formal negotiations. The EU is watering down its previous insistence that enrichment should be halted as a precondition for negotiations.

But discussions this week at the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN's nuclear watchdog, suggest a divergence between France and Germany, which appear to be more enthusiastic about negotiations, and the UK, which is particularly keen to keep the US on board.

Earlier this year Washington announced that it would join the negotiations with Tehran if Iran suspended uranium enrichment. But the US's reaction to the Iranian initiative this week has been highly cautious.

The US State Department has denied any knowledge of a new Iranian proposal. Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, emphasises that Washington is continuing work on UN sanctions against Iran – although earlier in the week she appeared to react more positively to reports of Tehran's new stance.

Any suggestion that the US should give further concessions to Iran is likely to be deeply controversial within the Bush administration. The extremely sensitive nature of the issue was highlighted further on Thursday by a letter of complaint by the IAEA sent to the US House of Representatives and reported by the Washington Post newspaper.

In an echo of the clash between UN weapons inspectors and the US administration in the run-up to the Iraq war, the letter, signed by the IAEA's director of external relations, criticises a congressional report on Iran for "erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information".

DOJ_NMG_0063427

In particular, it takes the report to task for alleging that Iran was enriching uranium to weapons grade, when at present the levels of enrichment are much less.

US: Fight For Sanctions On Iran Will Be Tough, Take Weeks (AFP)

AFP, September 15, 2006

The United States acknowledged that it will face tough resistance from some of its key allies as it presses for UN sanctions against Iran over its suspect nuclear program.

Iran's refusal to comply with UN demands that it suspend uranium enrichment activities some fear could produce nuclear weapons is set to feature high on the agenda when world leaders gather in New York next week for the UN General Assembly.

US officials have for weeks been expressing strong confidence that the permanent Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- will swiftly reach agreement on political and economic sanctions designed to force Tehran to abandon its enrichment program.

Such sanctions were called for in a Security Council resolution adopted in July, which gave Iran until August 31 to freeze its enrichment activity -- a demand Tehran ignored.

But with some Security Council partners increasingly reticent to go down the path of sanctions, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack admitted Thursday that the upcoming negotiations would be "hard-fought."

"The reality of it is that there are going to be intense negotiations on this," he said.

McCormack predicted the process of trying to hammer out a sanctions package with the other Security Council members "would take weeks," a far less ambitious timetable than put forward earlier by Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, who said a deal would be reached in September.

But McCormack continued to express confidence Washington's allies would ultimately back the sanctions foreshadowed in their earlier resolution.

"Our diplomatic interactions indicate that while this will be complex, sometimes hard-fought diplomacy, that we will, in fact, end up with a Security Council resolution that includes sanctions," he said.

Earlier Thursday, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy issued a thinly veiled warning to Washington and Britain -- the other staunch advocate of sanctions -- that pressing too hard for sanctions could fracture the coalition confronting Iran.

"If one or two of the permanent members of the Security Council fail to uphold this dialogue, and there is a growing drive -- on either side -- towards confrontation, the international community would split," he said.

Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao also warned on Thursday that imposing sanctions on Iran could have the "opposite effect" of hardening Iran's stance in the showdown.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said Washington wants the sanctions to be imposed in a graduated manner to build pressure on Iran to give up its enrichment program and accept international offers to help it develop a monitored civilian nuclear power industry.

Rice confirmed Wednesday that she will meet her fellow foreign ministers from the permanent Security Council members plus Germany on the sidelines of the General Assembly meeting in New York to discuss the sanctions.

Nuclear Agency For U.N. Faults Report On Iran By U.S. House (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The International Atomic Energy Agency has complained about a staff report from the House Intelligence Committee, saying that it “contains erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information’’ about Iran’s nuclear program. Agency officials said Thursday that their concerns had echoes of their arguments with the Bush administration over Iraq three years ago.

The charges were contained in a letter dated Sept. 12 and sent to Rep. Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who is chairman of the committee. Its unclassified staff report, released in mid-August, was widely seen as an effort to prod American intelligence agencies to be more aggressive in their examination of Iran’s nuclear program, amid charges from some conservatives that the mistakes made in assessing Iraq’s programs four years ago had bred an overly cautious atmosphere.

DOJ_NMG_0063428

But the staff report immediately came under criticism, especially from Democrats on the committee, who said it overstated aspects of the threat posed by Iran's nuclear program. The committee's vice chairman, Representative Jane Harman of California, accused the staff of taking shortcuts that inflated the Iranian threat.

The report was overseen by Fredrick Fleitz, a former C.I.A. officer who worked for John R. Bolton, the ambassador to the United Nations, when he was the State Department's leading hawk on Iran.

The letter from the atomic energy agency, the United Nations' nuclear monitoring agency, was first disclosed in The Washington Post on Thursday. It charges that a caption under a picture of Iran's main nuclear site at Natanz falsely states that Tehran is "enriching uranium to weapons grade'' with a small collection of centrifuges, the high-speed machines that are used to turn uranium into a fuel usable in nuclear power plants — or bombs. The letter says the uranium was enriched only to 3.6 percent — a level suitable for producing power, but far short of the 90 percent or so commonly associated with fuel for weapons.

A spokesman for the committee, Jamal Ware, said that while "there may be an issue with the caption, the substance of the report is clear, that Iran is working toward the ability to produce weapons grade uranium, but they are not there yet.'' He said the report was intended to begin a discussion on Iran intelligence.

A senior European diplomat, speaking on the condition of routine diplomatic anonymity, said, "The view at the I.A.E.A. was that this House report exaggerated the evidence, and people had to put a marker down fast.''

"No one wants a repeat of 2003,'' the official said, a reference to the open dispute between the Bush administration and the director general of the atomic energy agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, over whether there was evidence of nuclear activity in Iraq.

Dr. ElBaradei was ridiculed by administration officials at the time; in recent months, though, the administration has cited his reports in pressing their case against Iran.

IAEA: U.S. Report On Iran 'Dishonest' (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, September 15, 2006

A recent House of Representatives committee report on Iran's nuclear capability is "outrageous and dishonest" in trying to make a case that Tehran's program is geared toward making weapons, a senior official of the U.N. nuclear watchdog has said.

The letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Thursday outside a 35-nation board meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency, says the report is false in saying Iran is making weapons-grade uranium at an experimental enrichment site, when it has in fact produced material only in small quantities that is far below the level that can be used in nuclear arms.

The letter, which was first reported on by The Washington Post, also says the report erroneously says that IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei removed a senior nuclear inspector from the team investigating Iran's nuclear program "for concluding that the purpose of Iran's nuclear program is to construct weapons."

In fact, the inspector was sidelined on Tehran's request, and the Islamic republic had a right to ask for a replacement under agreements that govern all states relationships with the agency, said the letter, calling the report's version "incorrect and misleading."

"In addition," says the letter, "the report contains an outrageous and dishonest suggestion that such removal might have been for 'not having adhered to an unstated IAEA policy barring IAEA officials from telling the whole truth about the Iranian nuclear program.'"

Dated Aug. 12, the letter was addressed to Rep. Peter Hoekstra, chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. It was signed by Vilmos Cserveny, a senior director of the Vienna-based agency.

An IAEA official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the letter, said it was written "to set the record straight."

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the House committee, confirmed they had received the letter and said the chairman had referred it to Rep. Mike Rogers, R-Mich., and Rep. Rush Hold, D-N.J. They will review it and issue a formal response if necessary, he said.

"All IAEA complains about is a photo caption. If you read the report, it's very clear that what it is saying is that Iran is working to develop the capability to enrich uranium to weapons grade, not that they have done so," Ware said. "They use a string of adjectives, while not pointing to any substantive criticism of the report. There are areas where we would disagree with them. A disagreement does not make what we say erroneous."

DOJ_NMG_0063429

The dispute was reminiscent of the clashes between the IAEA and Washington over whether Saddam Hussein was trying to make weapons of mass destruction, including nuclear arms. American arguments that Saddam had such covert arms programs were given as the chief reason for invading Iraq and toppling Saddam.

ElBaradei's criticism of the U.S. standpoint on Iraq and subsequent perceptions that he was soft on Iran in his staff's investigation of suspicions Tehran's nuclear activities may be a cover for a weapons program led to a failed attempt last year by Washington to prevent his re-election.

Opposition: Iran Using Laser Enrichment (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, September 15, 2006

Iran has secretly revived a program to enrich uranium using laser technology, reportedly with favorable results, an Iranian opposition figure said Thursday citing information from members of the resistance inside the country.

Alireza Jafarzadeh said information about the laser enrichment program at Lashkar Ab'ad, about 15 miles northwest of Tehran, came from the same sources that led to his revelation in May 2003 that Iran had a clandestine nuclear program.

There was no independent confirmation of the latest information and Iran's U.N. Mission called the allegation "baseless and unfounded."

Jafarzadeh, who heads the Washington-based Strategic Policy Consulting think tank, is credited with having aired Iranian military secrets in the past. But U.S. officials considered some of his past assertions inaccurate.

Jafarzadeh urged the International Atomic Energy Agency to immediately send U.N. nuclear inspectors to Lashkar Ab'ad and demand access to all areas, including a new 5,000-square foot hall in a large garden where he said secret laser enrichment activities are being conducted.

"We've only now been sent a copy of this report," said IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming, "and like all information that we receive, we must take the time to check it against all our information in order to decide whether it is worth following up."

The U.N. has demanded Iran halt uranium enrichment.

Jafarzadeh said there are two ways to separate uranium isotopes and isolate U235 which can be enriched. The most common way is using centrifuges while laser technology is an experimental method, he said.

Jafarzadeh said Iran's decision to revive its laser enrichment program, which is still at experimental levels, shows Iran wants "to use every possibility that is available to them to rush to the bomb."

The laser enrichment is being conducted under the guise of a front company called Paya Partov whose board is chaired by Reza Aqazadeh, head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, Jafarzadeh said. Its advisers include Iran's leading experts on laser enrichment, he said.

Contrary to Iran's claim that it is complying with its obligations under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, Jafarzadeh said, "once again the information indicates that this is absolutely not the case."

"The information I've gotten from my sources today suggests that Iran is heavily involved in laser enrichment program, something Iran has told the IAEA that they have abandoned," he told a news conference.

Jafarzadeh has worked for the political wing of the Mujahedin Khalq, an Iranian opposition group that Washington and the European Union list as a terrorist organization.

Iran's U.N. Mission countered in a statement, saying: "It is also a well-known fact that at any stage that the international community is witnessing a step forward in the Iranian peaceful nuclear program, this terrorist group and collaborator of Saddam Hussein tries its best to hamper the progress."

The reference to the deposed Iraqi leader stems from Saddam allowing the Mujahedin Khalq to operate bases in Iraq.

Jafarzadeh said laser technology is an experimental method of separating uranium that can be enriched from that which cannot, a process that normally is done using centrifuges.

DOJ_NMG_0063430

Jafarzadeh said Iran's decision to revive its laser enrichment program, which is still "at experimental levels shows that Iran want "to use every possibility that is available to them to rush to the bomb."

Chavez Vows Aid For Iran Against Attack (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez pledged Thursday that Venezuela will support Iran if it is invaded as a result of the Middle Eastern nation's high-stakes nuclear standoff with the United Nations Security Council.

"Iran is under threat; there are plans to invade Iran, hopefully it won't happen, but we are with you," Chavez told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a meeting of the Group of 15 developing nations.

The U.N. has demanded that Iran suspend uranium enrichment amid concerns by some nations that it could be used for nuclear weapons. Iran insists that its enrichment efforts are peaceful, aimed solely at producing electrical energy.

Chavez said Venezuela stands with Iran in this time of crisis, just as it has with Cuba, where Fidel Castro handed over power to Raul while recovering from intestinal surgery. If they don't defend each other, no one else will, Chavez said.

"Under any scenario we are with you just like we are with Cuba," Chavez said. "If the United States invades Cuba, blood will run... We will not have our arms crossed while bombs are falling in Havana or they carry Raul off in a plane."

Bush's Message To Iran (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

What would President Bush say to the Iranian people if he had a chance to communicate directly with them? I was able to put that question to Bush in a one-on-one interview in the Oval Office on Wednesday. His answer made clear that the administration wants a diplomatic solution to the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program -- one that is premised on an American recognition of Iran's role as an important nation in the Middle East.

"I would say to the Iranian people: We respect your history. We respect your culture. We admire the entrepreneurial skills of your people. I would say to the Iranian people that I recognize the importance of your sovereignty -- that you're a proud nation, and you want to have a positive future for your citizens," Bush said, answering quickly and without notes.

"In terms of the nuclear issue," he continued, "I understand that you believe it is in your interest -- your sovereign interest, and your sovereign right -- to have nuclear power. I understand that. But I would also say to the Iranian people, there are deep concerns about the intentions of some in your government who would use knowledge gained from a civilian nuclear power industry to develop a weapon that can then fulfill the stated objectives of some of the leadership [to attack Israel and threaten the United States]. And I would say to the Iranian people that I would want to work for a solution to meeting your rightful desires to have civilian nuclear power."

"I would tell the Iranian people that we have no desire for conflict," Bush added.

He expressed hope that Iran would help stabilize Iraq, but he said the best channel for this dialogue would be through Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, who has been in Tehran this week. And he called for a new program of cultural and educational exchanges between the United States and Iran as a way of encouraging greater contact and trust.

Bush's comments were a clear public signal of the administration's strategy in the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program. In recent days, the Washington rumor mill has been bubbling with talk that the administration is planning military options for dealing with the crisis, perhaps in the near term. But Bush's remarks went in a different direction. His stress was on reassuring Iran that the United States recognizes its ambitions to be an advanced nation, with a robust civilian nuclear power program and a role in shaping the Middle East commensurate with its size and power. The red lines for America involve nuclear weapons, military threats to Israel or the United States, and Iran's links to terrorist groups.

Bush's comments tracked the offer the United States and its allies have made to Iran if it agrees to suspend its enrichment of uranium. He proposed that the West supply enriched uranium to Iran and other countries, and collect the nuclear waste. He argued that this global program "would be a solution that would answer a deep desire from the Iranian people to have a nuclear power industry."

DOJ_NMG_0063431

On Iraq, Bush said Maliki's visit to Tehran was "aimed at convincing the Iranians that a stable Iraq is in their interest. They have said so many times, and I think Prime Minister Maliki is now attempting to find out what that means, and how the Iraqi government can work with the Iranians to create a sense of stability."

Bush said he had read commentary criticizing Maliki's trip. "I disagree. Prime Minister Maliki should go to Iran. It is in Iraq's national interest that relations with Iran be such that there are secure borders and no cross-border issues, including the exportation of equipment that can harm Iraqi citizens as well as coalition troops, and the exportation of extremism that can prevent this young [Iraqi] democracy from flourishing."

Our discussion followed the 12-day visit to the United States by former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami. I asked Bush why he had approved this visit by a high-level Iranian and what he thought it had accomplished.

"One of the dilemmas facing [American] policymakers is to understand the nature, the complex nature of the Iranian regime," he said. "And I thought it would be beneficial for our country to receive the former leader, Khatami, to hear what he had to say. And as importantly for him, to hear what Americans had to say."

He wanted Khatami to understand that on the nuclear issue and Hezbollah's attacks on Israel, "It's not just George W. Bush speaking."

The Khatami visit "said that the United States is willing to listen to voices," Bush explained. "And I hope that sends a message to the Iranian people that we're an open society, and that we respect the people of Iran." Clearly, the White House wants to reach out to segments of Iranian opinion beyond the hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

I asked Bush what next steps he would favor in opening dialogue with Iran. "I would like to see more cultural exchanges," he said. "I would like to see university exchanges. I would like to see more people-to-people exchanges."

"I know that the more we can show the Iranian people the true intention of the American government," Bush concluded, "the more likely it is that we will be able to reach a diplomatic solution to a difficult problem."

I came away with a sense that Bush is serious about finding a peaceful solution to the nuclear crisis, and that he is looking hard for ways to make connections between America and Iran.

The Tehran Calculus (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

In his televised Sept. 11 address, President Bush said that we must not "leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons." There's only one such current candidate: Iran.

The next day, he responded thus (as reported by Rich Lowry and Kate O'Beirne of National Review) to a question on Iran: "It's very important for the American people to see the president try to solve problems diplomatically before resorting to military force."

"Before" implies that the one follows the other. The signal is unmistakable. An aerial attack on Iran's nuclear facilities lies just beyond the horizon of diplomacy. With the crisis advancing and the moment of truth approaching, it is important to begin looking now with unflinching honesty at the military option.

The costs will be terrible:

Â· Economic . An attack on Iran is likely to send oil prices overnight to $100 or even to $150 a barrel. That will cause a worldwide recession perhaps as deep as the one triggered by the Iranian revolution of 1979.

Iran might suspend its own 2.5 million barrels a day of oil exports and might even be joined by Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, asserting primacy as the world's leading anti-imperialist. But even more effectively, Iran will shock the oil markets by closing the Strait of Hormuz, through which 40 percent of the world's exports flow every day.

Iran could do this by attacking ships in the Strait, scuttling its own ships, laying mines or just threatening to launch Silkworm anti-ship missiles at any passing tanker.

The U.S. Navy will be forced to break the blockade. We will succeed, but at considerable cost. And it will take time -- during which the world economy will be in a deep spiral.

DOJ_NMG_0063432

Â· Military. Iran will activate its proxies in Iraq, most notably, Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. Sadr is already wreaking havoc with sectarian attacks on Sunni civilians. Iran could order the Mahdi Army and its other agents within the police and armed forces to take up arms against the institutions of the central government itself, threatening the very anchor of the new Iraq. Many Mahdi will die, but they live to die. Many Iraqis and coalition soldiers are likely to die as well.

Among the lesser military dangers, Iran might activate terrorist cells around the world, although without nuclear capability that threat is hardly strategic. It will also be very difficult to unleash its proxy Hezbollah, now chastened by the destruction it brought upon Lebanon in the latest round with Israel and deterred by the presence of Europeans in the south Lebanon buffer zone.

Â· Diplomatic. There will be massive criticism of America from around the world. Much of it is to be discounted. The Muslim street will come out again for a few days, having replenished its supply of flammable American flags, most recently exhausted during the cartoon riots. Their governments will express solidarity with a fellow Muslim state, but this will be entirely hypocritical. The Arabs are terrified about the rise of a nuclear Iran and would privately rejoice in its defanging.

The Europeans will be less hypocritical because their visceral anti-Americanism trumps rational calculation. We will have done them an enormous favor by sparing them the threat of Iranian nukes, but they will vilify us nonetheless.

These are the costs. There is no denying them. However, equally undeniable is the cost of doing nothing.

In the region, Persian Iran will immediately become the hegemonic power in the Arab Middle East. Today it is deterred from overt aggression against its neighbors by the threat of conventional retaliation. Against a nuclear Iran, such deterrence becomes far less credible. As its weak, nonnuclear Persian Gulf neighbors accommodate to it, jihadist Iran will gain control of the most strategic region on the globe.

Then there is the larger danger of permitting nuclear weapons to be acquired by religious fanatics seized with an eschatological belief in the imminent apocalypse and in their own divine duty to hasten the End of Days. The mullahs are infinitely more likely to use these weapons than anyone in the history of the nuclear age. Every city in the civilized world will live under the specter of instant annihilation delivered either by missile or by terrorist. This from a country that has an official Death to America Day and has declared since Ayatollah Khomeini's ascension that Israel must be wiped off the map.

Against millenarian fanaticism glorying in a cult of death, deterrence is a mere wish. Is the West prepared to wager its cities with their millions of inhabitants on that feeble gamble?

These are the questions. These are the calculations. The decision is no more than a year away.

Palestinian PM Accuses U.S. Of Meddling (AP)

By Diaa Hadid, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas on Thursday accused the United States of undermining efforts to form a new coalition government and he called on Europe to take the lead in lifting international sanctions against the Palestinians.

European diplomats visiting the West Bank indicated formation of a unity government with Palestinian moderates could lead to restoration of vital foreign aid.

Haniyeh spoke a day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the new Palestinian government would have to accept international demands to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

"The U.S. administration does not want the Palestinians to be unified. It puts obstacles in the way of this political coming together," Haniyeh told reporters. "It wants to extort the Palestinian people and the Palestinian government."

Hamas, which has controlled the Palestinian government since March, caved in to the intense international pressure this week and agreed to share power with moderate President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party.

While refusing to give up its calls for Israel's destruction, Hamas has said it will support Abbas' efforts to seek peace. The joint government, which is expected to take several weeks to form, is to be based on a document that calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel — effectively recognizing the Jewish state.

DOJ_NMG_0063433

Abbas added conditions to the timetable late Thursday. He said that before formation of a new government, the issue of an Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants in June, as well as Palestinian prisoners held by Israel, must be resolved. Also, he said, there must be "complete calm in the Palestinian territories."

Palestinian leaders hope the compromise arrangement will be enough for donor nations to resume much-needed aid, which was cut off after Hamas took power. The aid halt has caused widespread hardship in the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

With the U.S. maintaining a tough line, the Palestinians are increasingly hopeful that the European Union will be the first to ease the economic siege. A stream of European dignitaries have visited the region this week for talks with Israel and Abbas.

After meeting Abbas in the West Bank city of Ramallah, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy indicated formation of such a government could lead to resumption of assistance. He welcomed the document implicitly recognizing Israel and said if the new government accepts international demands, "the international community should re-evaluate and revisit its position toward political contacts and aid."

The French minister added, "It is obvious that we remain attached to the three principles of the Quartet" of Mideast peace mediators — recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous peace accords.

Abbas also received a boost Thursday from Luxembourg's foreign minister, Jean Asselborn.

"Israel has all the interest to support this initiative and the Americans have all the interest to support it, but first, it is the responsibility of the European Union," Asselborn said after meeting with Abbas. He said he will do everything he can do to support the Palestinians at a meeting of EU ministers in Austria on Friday.

The "Quartet" of Mideast peacemakers — the U.S., EU, Russia and the United Nations — is expected to discuss the Middle East at a meeting in New York next week. The Quartet so far has shown given no indication that it will ease its demands of the Palestinians.

Haniyeh urged Europe to break with the United States. "We expect from the international community, and especially the European Union, to be more balanced and fairer in dealing with the Palestinians," he said.

But in Brussels, EU officials said it was unlikely any major policy changes will take place until the new Palestinian government is formed.

In other developments, the Palestinians said they are sending a senior envoy to Syria to brief President Bashar Assad on the coalition talks. "We listen to them, they listen to us," said the envoy, former Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia.

Syria hosts a number of Palestinian militant groups, including Hamas, and could exert considerable influence over the Islamic group.

Israeli police, meanwhile, said they opened an investigation into three Israeli Arab lawmakers who recently traveled to Syria. The visit came after the end of the recent war with Lebanon, infuriating many Israelis. Syria is a key ally of Hezbollah, the Lebanese guerrilla group that fought Israel.

In Gaza, a 30-year-old unarmed Palestinian was killed by Israeli troops near the border with Egypt, Palestinian security and medical officials said. The Israeli military said soldiers opened fire at a "suspicious" figure who approached troops.

Rights Group Accuses Hezbollah Of 'Indiscriminate' Killing (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 14 -- Amnesty International on Thursday accused Hezbollah of "indiscriminate" and deliberate killings of Israeli civilians during the recent armed conflict in Lebanon, three weeks after accusing Israel of violating international law with "disproportionate" attacks on Lebanese civilians.

The London-based human rights group said its investigations showed that during the 33-day conflict, Hezbollah fired nearly 4,000 rockets into northern Israel, killing 43 civilians, seriously injuring 33 others and displacing hundreds of thousands. It said that about a quarter of the rockets were fired into urban areas and that many were packed with thousands of ball bearings "designed to inflict maximum death and injury."

"The scale of Hezbollah's attacks on Israeli cities, towns and villages, the indiscriminate nature of the weapons used, and statements from the leadership confirming their intent to target civilians, make it all too clear that Hezbollah violated the laws of war," Amnesty International's secretary general, Irene Khan, said in a statement. "The fact that Israel has also committed serious violations in no way justifies violations by Hezbollah. Civilians must not be made to pay the price for unlawful conduct on either side."

DOJ_NMG_0063434

The fighting between Hezbollah and Israel began after the militia group crossed into Israel and seized two Israeli soldiers on July 12. The Israeli bombing raids and artillery strikes that followed killed as many as 1,200 people in Lebanon, most of them civilians, while Hezbollah's missile attacks and other operations killed 158 Israelis, most of whom were soldiers. The fighting, the most explosive in years in the Middle East, ended Aug. 14 with a U.N.-brokered cease-fire.

In an Aug. 23 report, Amnesty accused Israel of deliberately killing civilians and destroying Lebanese infrastructure as part of a deliberate military strategy that violated international law.

Israeli officials have repeatedly said that their actions were legal and that their bombing of targets in Lebanon was as precise as possible to minimize civilian casualties.

Israel has accused Hezbollah of intentionally establishing its military bases and conducting operations in areas with large civilian populations to use innocents as human shields to deter attacks. Amnesty said it would investigate those allegations in later reports.

Khan said evidence of violations of international law by both sides creates an "urgent need" for the United Nations to investigate.

"In the conflict between Hezbollah and Israel, the suffering of civilians on both sides has been repeatedly ignored with those responsible escaping all accountability," she said. "Justice is urgently needed if respect for the rules of war is ever to be taken seriously -- and that means accountability for the perpetrators of war crimes and reparations for the victims."

Amnesty said that in meetings with its investigators, Hezbollah officials argued that the militia's rocket attacks on Israel were in response to Israeli attacks on civilians in Lebanon.

"We do not deny that we have bombarded Israeli cities, settlements and infrastructure. But this was always a reaction," Hezbollah legislator Hassan Fadlallah told al-Jazeera television, according to the Associated Press. "It was a natural reaction. When a state is invaded, it must defend itself."

Inaccurate Map Led To Fatal Strike On U.N. Post, Israel Says (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 14 — The airstrike that killed four United Nations observers in July was the result of the Israeli military's reliance on inaccurate maps, Israel said in a report released on Thursday.

Mark Regev, a Foreign Ministry spokesman, said the report was given to diplomats from Canada, China, Finland and Austria, which each had an unarmed observer killed in the July 25 airstrike in the Lebanese town of Khiam, near Israel's border.

"The findings of the inquiry are that at the time the ordnance was launched, the target we perceived that we were hitting was a Hezbollah military position," Mr. Regev said. "That was a mistake because what was targeted was the U.N. post."

Mr. Regev said that fresh Israeli forces had just been deployed then in the area, where there was intense Hezbollah activity. The change in personnel prompted a need to duplicate maps and charts.

"In that process, unfortunately, the U.N. post was not accurately mapped," he said. "When our aircraft launched its ordnance it believed it was targeting Hezbollah. This was a mistake; it shouldn't have happened."

He said the report detailed Israeli standing orders at the time, which "said unequivocally that it is totally prohibited to target U.N. personnel and U.N. positions."

The United Nations has said that before the airstrike, its observers in Lebanon had telephoned the Israeli military 10 times in six hours to ask it to stop shelling near their position. The strike set off international anger at Israel.

United Nations officials said the observation position was well marked. A picture it released a day after the attack showed the three-story building was painted white and had the letters "U.N." emblazoned in large black letters on all sides.

The United Nations is expected to issue its own report.

U.S. Criticizes China Weapons Sales (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

DOJ_NMG_0063435

AP, September 14, 2006

Top U.S. officials on Thursday criticized what they called China's indiscriminate sale of weapons to rogue countries, suggesting that Beijing's policies had made the world a more dangerous place.

Peter Rodman, assistant secretary of defense for international security, urged China to reevaluate its relationship with Iran and North Korea, two countries with which the United States is locked in standoffs over nuclear weapons development.

"China's actions seem to us dangerously shortsighted," Rodman told the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission, an advisory panel created by Congress. "China's proliferation behavior, past and present, can come back to haunt it, even placing its own political interests in jeopardy."

The United States, Rodman said, sees "in China a general willingness to transfer a wide variety of technologies to customers around the world."

He mentioned Iran, Sudan, Myanmar, Zimbabwe, Cuba and Venezuela, and also linked China to North Korea's July missile test launch of seven missiles and to Hezbollah's use of Chinese-designed cruise missiles on an Israeli naval vessel, also in July.

Rodman said the United States worries that Chinese companies have helped Iran as it tries to establish a self-sufficient ballistic missile production program. China wants to build relations with Iran, Rodman said, to secure access to oil and gas and, potentially, to find ways to control China's restive Muslim population.

China says it opposes the spread of weapons technology and materials and that it forbids Chinese companies from transferring such material. And Rodman said that Beijing has strengthened its nonproliferation efforts by promoting export control laws and its oversight of those laws, but hasn't done enough.

Ukraine Stalls NATO Bid To Build Public Support (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

MOSCOW -- In another sign of the cooling of the Orange Revolution's pro-Western zeal, Ukraine's new prime minister told NATO that his country is putting efforts to join the alliance on hold because of lack of public support for the move.

"We have to take a pause," said Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych, Thursday after meeting with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's chief in Brussels. He said Ukraine would formally launch its bid to join the alliance, but only after a referendum on the issue. "We have to convince society."

Ukraine's backtracking on its aspirations to join NATO is a defeat to the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush, which had hoped a quick entrance of Ukraine into the alliance would tug the former Soviet state decisively closer to the West.

Ukraine's own slow movement on NATO is likely to also spell problems for the entrance of another former Soviet state, Georgia, into the alliance. Though public opinion in Georgia is strongly in favor of joining the alliance, NATO members in Europe are wary of admitting Georgia without Ukraine coming first.

The Kremlin has lobbied hard against Ukraine's entrance into the alliance. The Kremlin said that Ukraine as a NATO member would be a threat to Russian security and warned Kiev that any movements toward membership would worsen relations.

Mr. Yanukovych was named prime minister last month, after a pro-Western coalition of politicians came to pieces over how to divide positions in the government. Mr. Yanukovych has been advocating closer relations to Moscow, which backed him in 2004 presidential elections that were tainted by vote fraud and reversed by the mass public demonstrations of the Orange Revolution.

Thursday was Mr. Yanukovych's first visit to Brussels since he was named prime minister. After meeting with NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Mr. Yanukovych said that few Ukrainians -- maybe 12% to 25% -- supported the idea of joining NATO. He said that Ukraine shouldn't be forced to make a choice between steering the country to either a pro-Russian or pro-Western course. "We should build a reliable bridge between Russia and the European Union," he said.

Mr. Yanukovych also met with EU External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner and repeated that Ukraine was interested in joining the union. But Ms. Ferrero-Waldner said this wasn't a prospect for the moment.

DOJ_NMG_0063436

Besides numerous trade ties with Russia, Ukraine also must worry about its heavy dependence on Russian natural-gas deliveries. Ukraine is in the midst of negotiations with Russia for next year's shipments, and officials have said that a sharp increase in prices by Russia could be ruinous to the Ukrainian economy.

While Mr. Yanukovych has advocated a public campaign to drum up support for NATO within Ukraine, analysts are skeptical that he would ever do such a thing. Ivan Presniakov, an analyst with the International Centre for Policy Studies in Kiev, said that Mr. Yanukovych's government appears to want to delay any serious moves toward NATO membership for at least two or three years, so that it can buy enough time for Ukrainian industry to retool and cope with higher energy prices.

"I don't think that they really want to increase the support for NATO right now," he said. "They want to do is calm the fears of Russia."

Mr. Yanukovych's political party made a strong showing in parliamentary elections earlier this year, after campaigning strongly against NATO membership. This summer his party orchestrated anti-NATO protests that hounded U.S. soldiers out of a southern Ukrainian province.

Ukraine's Yanukovych Halts NATO Entry Talks (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

MOSCOW, Sept. 14 -- Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych of Ukraine said Thursday that his government would suspend negotiations on membership in the NATO alliance, his first major step toward reversing his country's drift away from Russia and toward the West.

"Because of the political situation in Ukraine, we will have to take a pause," Yanukovych told reporters in Brussels after talks with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer and NATO ambassadors. "We have to convince society."

The prime minister, who has said he personally opposes NATO membership, cited insufficient popular support for the step. A recent survey found that 60 percent of Ukrainians are against membership in the alliance, significantly more than support the prime minister and his coalition partners.

Making Ukraine, a former Soviet republic, part of the alliance is a cherished goal of Yanukovych's rival, President Viktor Yushchenko.

In late 2004, the two men competed in a presidential election. Yanukovych, Russia's favored candidate, was initially declared the winner, triggering a street revolt and a new vote that swept Yushchenko into office.

Yushchenko set the country on a firmly pro-Western course, setting off alarm bells in Moscow and the Russian-speaking parts of his own country with a promise to quickly push for Ukraine's membership in the Western military alliance.

Yushchenko had expressed hope that the country could join as soon as 2008, and the issue was scheduled to be discussed at a NATO summit in November.

But the coalition that backed him disintegrated last September, and after parliamentary elections earlier this year, Yanukovych, whose party won a plurality of votes, resurrected himself on the back of his rivals' infighting. He became prime minister in July.

American officials have been enthusiastic about Ukraine's potential membership in NATO. But they have become increasingly worried about the anemic support for the move within the country, Western diplomats said in recent interviews. The prospect of Ukraine joining the alliance is also anathema to the Kremlin and the vast majority of Russians, who regard it as an attempt to encircle and isolate their country.

Yanukovych stressed Thursday that he was not turning his back on the West. "For the time being, we are looking at enlargement of our cooperation with NATO," rather than membership, he said. "We should be a reliable bridge between the European Union and Russia."

Yanukovych promised to continue supporting internal reforms that "will bring us in the long term to accession of the European Union."

E.U. officials, facing growing skepticism in the bloc's 25 member nations about any further expansion, were reserved, if not cold, to Ukrainian membership but said a free-trade zone could be negotiated.

DOJ_NMG_0063437

E.U. External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner said the union had no plans to offer Ukraine membership "at this moment."

Leftist's Backers End Blockade In Mexico City (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 14 — Supporters of a leftist candidate who narrowly lost the presidential election this summer were tearing down five miles of tents on Thursday that have blockaded this capital's central avenues for six weeks.

"It's an emotional situation," Juan Gutiérrez Calva, 45, a street vendor, said as he packed up his tent. "I'm calm. I'm not sad or happy. It was always clear that we were not going to advance much toward a real democracy in this country."

The move signaled a shift by their leader, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, who says he was robbed of an election victory.

Having lost a legal battle for a full recount, and facing a steady defection of supporters, Mr. López Obrador is now striving to find a way to remain a political force over the coming six years, while Felipe Calderón, a conservative, serves as president.

Mr. López Obrador and his aides have organized a mass rally for Saturday, grandly calling it the "National Democratic Convention," where supporters are expected to anoint Mr. López Obrador head of a movement still ill defined that will, among other things, press for a new Mexican constitution.

"This political regime no longer works," Mr. López Obrador said earlier this week. "It's rotten and we must construct something new, and that is what we are going to do at the National Democratic Convention."

In recent days, Mr. López Obrador has decided to lift his blockade in the heart of the capital, which has caused weeks of chaos and tension, and avoid a conflict with the military during its annual parade on Saturday.

The softening of strategy comes as cracks are beginning to appear in Mr. López Obrador's coalition, with the court's decision last week to support Mr. Calderón's election victory.

Now even Mr. López Obrador's aides acknowledge that he is losing some support among middle-class liberals and influential leftist politicians and intellectuals, as Mexicans seem prepared to move on from the election dispute, even if Mr. López Obrador is not.

The founder of his party, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, for instance, published a letter on Thursday accusing Mr. López Obrador and his inner circle of being intolerant of dissent.

"It worries me profoundly, the intolerance and demonization, the dogmatic attitude that prevails around Andrés Manuel for those of us who do not accept unconditionally his proposals and who question his points of view and decisions," he wrote.

And Carlos Fuentes, the giant of Mexican letters, also assailed Mr. López Obrador this week for continuing to insist there was widespread fraud in the election, while he never challenged the elections of his party's members to the Legislature.

"There could have been fraud in the Chamber of Deputies, there could have been fraud in the Senate, but there wasn't," he said. "There was only fraud for the presidency of the republic. How strange, no? I don't believe it."

There have been other signs of weakening support. Mr. López Obrador's party voted down a slate of his closest allies for leadership positions in Congress, choosing the leaders of other factions. Two prominent governors from his party have also recognized Mr. Calderón's victory.

The questioning extends to the voters. Several said in interviews that the prolonged blockade of the city's central avenues and main square, as well as Mr. López Obrador's refusal to concede defeat, only confirmed the accusations of his political enemies that he was autocratic and had little regard for courts or the law.

"It left me with a bad taste in my mouth," said Berenice Malagón, a 27-year-old employee of a cosmetics company. "I know he has a right to protest, but what is not right is to close the avenues and sources of work and generate instability."

Despite the loss of some support, the leftist leader still has enough loyal supporters to make trouble for the government. Politicians in Mr. López Obrador's camp are scrambling to find a way to wield their power in Congress while still supporting him.

On Thursday morning, three former campaign aides and several leaders of his Party of the Democratic Revolution, along with the Workers' Party and the Convergence Party, announced the formation of the "Wide Progressive National Front."

DOJ_NMG_0063438

The politicians said their goal was to help Mr. López Obrador and his supporters in the street achieve their goals in the Congress. The lawmakers must walk a fine line, however.

Mr. López Obrador still maintains the election was fraudulent, but his party has also gained enough seats to become the second largest faction in Congress. Few of those newly elected lawmakers are willing to follow their leader into the political wilderness.

Mr. López Obrador's closest advisers hope the national convention on Saturday, coupled with the formation of the "progressive front" in Congress, is the solution. The scheme allows him to become the leader of what amounts to a shadow government or a permanent protest movement. It gives him a way to criticize Mr. Calderón, push for constitutional change, oppose the sale of state oil reserves and remain in the limelight.

Manuel Camacho, a close adviser, said the idea was to remake Mr. López Obrador, 53, into a civil rights leader, a "symbolic figure on the model of Martin Luther King."

"I see him as a moral leader in this scheme, someone who promotes the interests of the poor, strengthens their rights and will promote a change in political institutions," Mr. Camacho said.

Mexican Leftist Refuses To Back Down (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

USA Today, September 15, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Opposition presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador, responding to his loss to Felipe Calderón in Mexico's closely contested July 2 presidential election, has asked his supporters to attend a political convention on Saturday to decide whether to set up a parallel government.

López Obrador and his followers, who have rejected the results of a partial recount, say democracy here is in danger if what the former Mexico City mayor calls a "new republic" is not created to address the gap between rich and poor.

Critics such as Enrique Krauze, a Mexico City-based historian, say such ideas threaten Mexico's stability and the democratic progress achieved after the country emerged from seven decades of one-party rule six years ago.

"It's a very delicate moment. It still has a lot of uncertainties, because you can never know the possibilities of one charismatic leader leading the masses," says Krauze, who also is an editor of Letras Libres magazine. "You don't need huge majorities to create really serious social strife."

For more than a month, López Obrador and his supporters have occupied Mexico City's main plaza, the Zocalo, and major thoroughfares. Initially, the sit-in was launched to force a recount of all ballots in the election, in which Calderón's final victory margin was just 0.56 of a percentage point.

The protest has strangled traffic and eroded public support for López Obrador. In an Aug. 13 opinion piece in the daily newspaper Reforma, political writer Homero Aridjis described a post-electoral "drunkenness" that has left Mexicans "on the verge of a nervous breakdown."

The purpose of the national convention, which López Obrador spokesman Cesar Yañez claims will draw at least 1 million "delegates," is to decide where the movement should go now that the electoral court has rejected a full recount, threw out claims of widespread fraud and certified Calderón the winner.

They will vote on whether to name a shadow government and parallel president (López Obrador), complete with a Cabinet, though they have not said how they would govern. Yañez says it's unlikely the protesters will continue blocking the streets in the capital.

The convention will test the president-elect, whose narrow margin of victory means most voters backed either López Obrador of the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD), the candidate of the former ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party or two other minor candidates.

Calderón, a member of outgoing President Vicente Fox's National Action Party, received much of the vote from the industrial, richer north, which has benefited from Fox's free-trade policies. Most voters in the rural south and in Mexico City chose López Obrador.

DOJ_NMG_0063439

Despite the electoral court's finding that the election was fair, a poll at the end of August released by Mexican research institute GEA-ISA showed 37% of voters believe Calderón won by fraud.

"We are not looking for problems," says Mario Ramirez, 58, of Mexico City. He has been sleeping along Reforma Avenue most nights for more than a month. He says he would be willing to protest for the next six years. "Calderón will never be my president," he says.

Apparently in response to these sentiments, Calderón is turning his attention to Mexico's poor. "If something demands urgent action … it is taking care of millions of families who still live in poverty," Calderón said in a speech after the court affirmed his victory.

Dan Lund, a pollster for Mund Americas in Mexico City, says the shadow government proposed by López Obrador could keep the issue of income inequality at the forefront of the national debate and energize the political scene. "It's the most exciting and hopeful period I've seen," he says.

Calderón also faces opposition within Congress. Three governors — members of López Obrador's PRD from the states of Zacatecas, Michoacan and Guerrero — chose not to appear in a snapshot taken with the president-elect this week at a governors conference. On Sept. 1, Fox was unable to give his state of the union address after PRD legislators blocked the podium. The president was forced to give his last annual address on TV later that night.

"Calderón will have to do some extraordinary things to convince people who believe in what the PRD has said," Krauze says.

López Obrador's movement could become more powerful depending on other factors, including economic performance. "If oil prices go down, or a semi-catastrophe happens, this appeal from the left in hard times is likely to be much more potent," says Federico Estevez, a political scientist at the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico.

López Obrador has indicated he wants his supporters to work peacefully. He decided to pull protesters from their encampments in the capital to let the military march in its annual Independence Day parade on Saturday.

To avoid further conflict with López Obrador, Fox won't open Independence Day festivities tonight in the Zocalo. For nearly 200 years, Mexican presidents on Sept. 15 have performed the ritual grito, or cry, to kick off Independence Day celebrations.

Interior Secretary Carlos Abascal said Thursday that Fox will move his ceremony to the small town of Dolores Hidalgo, 170 miles northwest of Mexico City, where Roman Catholic priest Miguel Hidalgo launched the first call for independence from Spain in 1810.

Fox's final grito should have been robust and harmonic: His victory in 2000 heralded a new era in Mexico's transition to democracy.

Instead, his shout could turn into a screaming match. López Obrador has promised to stage a parallel grito that could propel Mexico into a period of discord and even unrest.

IMF Has No Crisis To Manage (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Less than a decade ago, economists at the International Monetary Fund were jetting into the capitals of countries stricken by financial crises, patching together rescue plans aimed at staving off global economic chaos.

That, after all, was the IMF's chief mission: preserving financial stability. So as currencies plunged, foreign investors fled and defaults loomed in South Korea, Russia, Brazil, Argentina, Turkey and elsewhere, the fund responded with zeal. In tense negotiations, the IMF offered billions of dollars in emergency loans if the governments would make drastic changes in their economic policies.

This weekend, as top economic policymakers gather in Singapore for the annual meetings of the IMF and World Bank, the global environment is dramatically different. The fund's era of crisis-fighting, which lasted until 2002, is a fading memory that staffers swap stories about like war veterans.

Financial markets are buoyant. There's nary a crumbling currency in sight. And middle-income countries in Asia, Eastern Europe and Latin America have accumulated stockpiles of dollars that in some cases exceed the IMF's $227 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0063440

The hope of some of the policymakers gathering in Singapore, including those from the Bush administration, is that the IMF will start playing an active role in helping to combat another threat to the world economy -- huge imbalances in trade, specifically the $700-billion-plus U.S. trade deficit and the corresponding surpluses in Asia and oil-producing countries. The fund's experts are also trying to improve their ability to figure out how future crises may arise and encourage countries to take preventive measures.

Doubts abound about whether the IMF can exert much influence over countries that don't need its money; the fund's eat-your-peas advice has often gone unheeded in such cases. And extolling the virtues of pea-eating, important as it may be, leaves some on the fund's staff of 2,700 with a sense of ennui.

"Firefighters don't like to sit in the firehouse," said Mohsin S. Khan, director of the IMF's Middle East and Central Asia department. "If you're in this organization and you've been caught up in the excitement of rushing around to countries helping them fight crises -- well, if there are no crises, you're sitting around wondering what to do."

In his department, Khan said, wars and high oil prices have created some fascinating challenges. "People are interested in working on Lebanon, Iraq, the West Bank-Gaza -- those are the Brazils and Argentinas of today," he said. But for many others on the staff, "it's the old story about Napoleon. Remember, he said it's tough for an army to sit on its bayonets."

The disappearance of crises is obviously welcome news, Khan and others hastened to add. But in a possible sign of malaise, resignations of IMF economists in 2005 increased about 45 percent over the average of the previous three years. Departures this year are running ahead of last year's pace. IMF spokesmen stressed that turnover is still relatively low, and reasons for quitting may include frustration with the lack of promotion opportunities at an institution that almost never fires senior employees. But several of the recent departees confided that they found their jobs less interesting than before, according to one senior IMF official who spoke to them.

None of this means that the IMF staff is idle. One group of economists trying to anticipate where the next crisis might arise describes its work as highly stimulating; future crises, the economists think, will almost surely be different from the turmoil of the late 1990s and stem from some murky area, probably new and exotic financial instruments for which little data are available.

"This is a moment of investment, when we are trying to strengthen the fire-prevention department," said Carlo Cottarelli, deputy director of the Policy Development and Review Department. "Firefighting is one function, but the main goal of the fund is fire prevention.

"In terms of work intensity, my wife is complaining more than when I was mission chief for Turkey. . . . It's clear, the level of adrenaline is different from a crisis. Thank God. In a crisis, the level of adrenaline can get too high."

If there is one area in which the IMF may soon return to center stage, it is "multilateral surveillance" -- the term the experts use for the fund's role in addressing global imbalances. Echoing many other economic experts, IMF Managing Director Rodrigo de Rato has been warning for some time that as foreigners accumulate vast amounts of dollars from U.S. spending on imports, the risk increases of a sudden, wide sell-off of U.S. currency that could throw the world financial system into damaging disorder.

The tricky question is how the IMF -- with its limited leverage -- can help steer the big players toward steps that are politically painful but are widely viewed as necessary to reduce the imbalances, without triggering a recession. Those measures include a shift in the U.S. economy toward more saving instead of continuing the consumption binge of recent years, and a rise in the exchange rates of Asian countries, especially China, that have become too dependent on exports based on cheap currencies. They also include changes in European regulations that restrain growth, and more spending by Middle Eastern nations of their petrodollars on foreign goods and services.

"It's not that the IMF needs to stand astride all of us wielding a stick," said Timothy D. Adams, U.S. undersecretary of the treasury for international affairs, who has been particularly aggressive in spurring the fund to get involved. "What they need to do is facilitate a conversation and provide general expertise."

Many of the countries with surpluses, Adams said, "will feel more comfortable meeting under the heading of an IMF-sponsored endeavor," responding to the recommendations of international technocrats rather than the hectoring of the U.S. government.

Adams also wants the IMF to tighten its rules on the types of currency systems that member nations can have. That is obviously aimed in large part at the relatively fixed exchange rate of China's yuan, which critics say gives Chinese manufacturers an unfair pricing advantage. In a quid pro quo of sorts, Washington is strongly backing a plan in Singapore to adjust voting power among the IMF's 184 member countries so that fast-growing nations -- including China -- can gain representation on the fund's board that is more commensurate with their economic size.

DOJ_NMG_0063441

All that will take time, Adams said, "but this institution is too critical to let it become stale."

Doing Business In Latin America (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

When the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank convene their annual meetings in Singapore in the next few days, they will be eager to discuss a common problem: how to justify their existence in a world that no longer wants or needs them.

The more elegant term for this discussion is "reform" of the international financial institutions, which were born at Bretton Woods more than 60 years ago under the gold standard. In a world of floating exchange rates and open capital markets, the IMF's raison d'être no longer exists. Its "clients" are rapidly repaying their outstanding loans. Macroeconomic accountability has improved world-wide, not because the fund mandates it but because without the guarantee of IMF rescues, investors now impose their own discipline. If hazards remain it is because, with the IMF still hanging around looking for work, future bail outs cannot be ruled out.

The IMF's sister, the World Bank, is also facing an existential crisis on its lending side. The bankers at the International Finance Corporation, which is dedicated to the private sector, now busy themselves financing big business, a job that ought to be left to the market. The bank's main business of lending to governments in middle-income countries -- that neither seek nor require bank loans -- is drying up. More broadly, foreign aid as a tool for development has increasingly come under scrutiny as wasteful and even counterproductive.

If only the bank would pay more attention to its own research, specifically the annual report titled "Doing Business," which looks at the regulatory policies and tax climate of 175 countries. The 2007 edition was released last week and, not surprisingly, finds that poor countries could be much better off if only they would stop discouraging legal, tax-paying business activity.

When governments make it expensive to operate in the legal sector, small and medium-sized businesses go underground, giving up economies of scale, the benefits of technology and productivity gains. Governments have to rely more and more on large companies for tax revenues and high tax burdens take a toll on competitiveness. Growth rates suffer. Joblessness and poverty persist.

Serious leaders have taken steps to free animal spirits. Much of Latin America has not. In this year's report, as the nearby table shows, the region largely finishes in the cellar. Even Africa outperformed Latin America in its pace of reform this year.

Lest we lose hope, there are a few positive developments to note. Three Latin American countries made the top 10 list of most improved business climates. Mexico is the world's third best reformer (after Georgia and Romania). The report praises Mexico's new securities law that protects minority investors, a streamlined process for business start-ups and a graduated cut in the corporate tax rate to 29% this year from 33% in 2004.

Yet Mexico's corporate tax rate is still too high relative to Eastern European competitors. And even though the country jumped 19 places in its overall rank, it lost ground in important areas such as registering property, international trade and enforcing contracts.

Guatemala and Peru also made the top 10 list of most reformed. But both are still far from exhibiting respect for their entrepreneurial populations. In Guatemala, for example, the bank says that to complete the process of licensing a business takes 23 steps, 390 days and costs 496.47% of income per capita. In the category of "trading across borders," researchers found that importing a container costs $1,985 versus an OECD average of $883. It takes 1,459 days and 36 steps to enforce a contract.

Peru moved up 13 places, but it still ranks a lowly 158th in the regulatory burden of "employing workers" and 135th in "paying taxes." For a medium-sized business to be tax compliant in Peru requires 53 payments, taking 424 hours and costing 40.80% of gross profit. Like its neighbors, Peru doesn't need foreign aid. It needs a leader to take a machete to its red tape.

DOJ_NMG_0063442

These countries constitute the good news in the region. The rest of the hemisphere has an even grimmer profile. Costa Rica and Ecuador made zero net reforms over the past 12 months while Venezuela and Bolivia both lost ground. Venezuela dropped 20 places and now has the honor of ranking below Zimbabwe (153). In the "paying taxes" category the survey finds that Venezuelan "entrepreneurs must make 68 payments, spend 864 hours and pay 51.92% of gross profit." To enforce a contract it takes 41 steps and 435 days.

Most troubling for the region is the performance of the South American giant, Brazil. As a middle-income democracy with a young, talented, eager population and a world-class industrial sector, Brazil ought to "get it" by now. But its rankings on paying taxes, starting a business, getting credit and registering property are all worse this year and its overall rank moves up only one place. No wonder the government is always broke and poverty in the favelas is booming.

The World Bank researchers understand that the problem here is politics. They even have some wisdom for would-be poverty-fighters: "In the top reforming economies in the past three years, nearly 85% of reforms took place in the first 15 months of a new government," the report notes. "The message: for a government recently elected (as in Benin) or re-elected (as in Colombia and Mexico), the time to push through ambitious reforms is at the start of its term."

There are at least 10 new governments in Latin America this year and that means there is plenty of opportunity for change. Latin America has taken lots of money from international financial institutions over the years, along with lots of dreadful advice. Now it's time to take note of some sensible guidance, even if that would be bad for those who earn a living shoveling money out the door from Washington.

Russia Shaken By Killing Of Bank Official (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

MOSCOW, Sept. 14 -- The assassination of a senior civil servant who led a campaign to clean up the country's banks drew calls Thursday for a merciless response from the government, as well as hand-wringing over whether Russia is outgrowing the bloody business tactics common in the 1990s.

Andrei Kozlov, 41, first deputy chairman of Russia's Central Bank, was shot Wednesday evening outside a sports complex after attending a soccer match between bank employees. He died early Thursday of his wounds. His driver was killed instantly in the attack, which politicians said was probably a contract killing.

Kozlov was respected in financial circles for his drive to shut down banks that engaged in money laundering and put the deposits of customers at risk through illegal practices. Since January, his department at the Central Bank had revoked the licenses of 44 of the country's roughly 1,200 banks, the Russian news agency Interfax reported.

The confidence of ordinary Russians in the country's banking sector, which plummeted after a financial crisis in 1998, has been growing steadily, and deposits have jumped sixfold in the last four years.

"He was at the cutting edge of the battle against financial crime," said Finance Minister Alexei Kudrin. "He was a very brave and honest man, and through his activity he repeatedly encroached on the interests of unprincipled financiers."

Boris Gryzlov, speaker of the lower house of parliament, said business disputes may have prompted the killing. "A series of banks had their licenses taken away, and it's entirely possible that criminals connected with those structures could have ordered the murder," he said.

Police said they were exploring all possible motives for the killing and reported finding two weapons thrown into tall grass about 200 yards from the scene of the killing. Russian Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika said he would personally supervise the investigation.

The assassination was the first killing of a senior federal official since President Vladimir Putin came to power in 2000. Among other recent assassinations, a regional governor was shot dead in Moscow in 2002, and American journalist Paul Klebnikov was slain in 2004.

As recently as last week at a conference in the resort city of Sochi, Kozlov warned some people in the banking sector that he would continue to target them.

DOJ_NMG_0063443

"There is still a large share of suspicious operations in the banking system," he said. "You take part in money laundering, then there might be a ban on your professional activities for the rest of your life. There's no place for this in the banking sector. It disgraces the banking system."

The former head of the Russian Central Bank, Sergei Dubinin, said the killing was a direct assault on the state and on Putin's claim that he has stabilized the country after the chaos of the 1990s.

"The authorities should prove that today's stability is not a mere name," said Dubinin, whose office was fired on in 1996. "This is a challenge to the state's policy in the banking area. The authorities should solve the crime and find not only the actual murderers but also those who ordered Kozlov's assassination." The Kremlin had no immediate comment on the killing.

Former prime minister Anatoly Chubais, who now heads the country's electric utility, said the killing was "a barefaced challenge to all Russian authorities."

"Andrei Kozlov was an unquestionably honest, principled and absolutely noncommercial person," said Chubais, who survived an assassination attempt last year. "This is a case when the authorities must respond in a tough manner, promptly and mercilessly."

Kozlov was married and had three children. He began working at what was then the Soviet Union's Central Bank when he was 24 and spent most of his career, except for short stints in the private sector, in central banking. He had been in charge of banking supervision since 1997 and made the assault on money laundering the centerpiece of his work.

Uganda Peace Hinges On Amnesty For Brutality (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

GULU, Uganda — In the beginning, it was simply called the Acholi war, and despite its brutality, few people outside Uganda paid attention.

The Lord's Resistance Army, a messianic rebel group, was exploring a new dimension of violence by building an army of abducted children and forcing them to burn down huts, slice off lips and pound newborn babies to death in wooden mortars, as though they were grinding grain.

"I killed and killed and killed," said Christopher Oyet, an 18-year-old former rebel who was kidnapped at age 9. "Now, I am scared of myself."

But, for the first time in 20 years, the killing has stopped. The rebel leaders, boxed in and with dwindling support, signed a cease-fire agreement on Aug. 26. Whether it lasts depends on whether Joseph Kony, the phantom rebel commander who is said to live deep in the jungle with 60 child brides, and his top deputies are given amnesty.

That is uncertain, because they have been charged with crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Court in The Hague. Still, this is the furthest any peace deal has come, fueling hopes that one of Africa's most grotesque and bizarre wars, which cost tens of thousands of lives, may finally be over.

White flags are already fluttering in Gulu, the hub of Acholiland, even from the antennas of government trucks. People are no longer night commuting, the signature north Ugandan exodus from villages to towns every evening for safety's sake. Instead, they are returning to the carpeted green hillsides to plant cassava, corn and beans, and this time their hoes and machetes are being swung to make things grow, not to destroy them.

The victims of this war are so desperate to put the nightmarish days behind them that they want to forgive, just as much as they want to forget. Typical is Christa Labol, whose ears and lips were cut off by bayonet-wielding prepubescent soldiers she now says she would welcome home.

"Only God can judge," Mrs. Labol said through a mouth that is always open.

Of course, the rebels are not out of the bush yet. Many still hide in a remote, lawless corner of northern Congo. Some people wonder if Mr. Kony, who has told his troops he is possessed by spirits, will ever give up.

Mr. Kony has said he will but only if he is not prosecuted.

The International Criminal Court has issued arrest warrants for Mr. Kony and four of his commanders. Ugandan government officials have said they will ensure that the rebels get amnesty if they surrender. But the rebels have said the amnesty must come first. It is an impasse that possibly only the international court can break, but the court, established in 1998, has not indicated what it will do.

DOJ_NMG_0063444

"We've never had such a situation," said Claudia Perdomo, a court spokeswoman.

The Acholi people have their own solution. It is the mataput — the word means drinking a bitter root from a common cup — and it is a traditional reconciliation ceremony. Peace is more important than punishment, Acholi elders say, and they would rather have Mr. Kony return to Gulu for a mataput than rot in some European prison. Although the fighting may be over, it seems a new battle has begun: tradition versus modernity.

"In our culture, we don't like to punish people," said Collins Opoka, an Acholi chief. "It doesn't really get you anywhere."

The Acholis know something about punishment. For decades, it was customary for members of southern tribes to get the prized university spots and good office jobs, while northerners like the Acholis were stuck in the fields. The Acholis were known as superstitious — and tough — and filled the ranks of the national army. They fought rebel forces led by Yoweri Museveni, and after Mr. Museveni seized power in 1986 — he has been president since — the Acholis were marginalized and persecuted.

Enter Mr. Kony, a former Catholic altar boy revered in his village near Gulu as a prophet since he was 12. He smeared himself with shea butter, said his body and those of his Acholi followers were impervious to bullets and vowed to overthrow the government.

"We saw him as our savior," said Mary Olanya, who knew Mr. Kony growing up.

Mr. Kony claimed to be guided by the Ten Commandments but soon his army was violating each and every one.

From about 1988 on, the rebels terrorized their own people, raping, robbing and killing across Acholiland. According to former rebels, Mr. Kony communed with spirits and his rules became stranger by the minute — anyone caught bicycling had to have his feet chopped off; all white chickens were to be destroyed; no farming on Fridays.

Few adults wanted to join his cultish, bloodthirsty movement, and soon the only recruits were children, most against their will.

Mr. Oyet said he was snatched one night nine years ago from his hut near Gulu and forced to march miles into the bush. The boys whose feet swelled and could no longer walk were clubbed to death — by other boys. All new recruits had to help with the killing. It was called registration. The population responded to the rebel violence by seeking safety in numbers. Nearly two million people abandoned their villages and crowded into government camps. "It was a desperate time,'' said Quinto Otika, a Gulu elder.

And it continued for years, nourished by the Arab-led government of Sudan, which gave the rebels arms and sanctuary as payback for Ugandan support for the Christian rebellion in southern Sudan.

But by 2002, the Sudanese government was making peace with southern separatists and no longer supporting the Lord's Resistance Army.

Mr. Kony — and his bodyguards and harem — fled to Congo, where, according to Ugandan military sources, they set up a slave kingdom, living off the land and slaughtering wildlife. By then, the elusive rebel army had shrunk to a shadow of a shadow, with fewer than 2,000 fighters left. The West mostly ignored this war, more focused on Rwanda, Somalia, and Darfur, Sudan. But in 2005, the Ugandan government persuaded the international court to issue arrest warrants against rebel leaders, despite pleas from Acholi elders.

In Acholi culture, killers are accepted back into the community after they have paid compensation, admitted to their misdeeds and shared a meal, usually a roasted sheep, with the relatives of their victim. This is the mataput ceremony, and it comes from the days when clans were tightly intertwined by marriage and trade and could not afford to alienate one another.

The Ugandan government eventually warmed to the idea and signed a cease-fire with the rebels that took effect on Aug. 29. Since then, some rebel soldiers have emerged from hiding. They plan to assemble at collection points in southern Sudan, where they will wait until a full peace agreement is reached.

Though some United Nations officials have bristled at the idea of granting immunity to Mr. Kony and his top commanders, Ugandan officials say they are confident a deal can be reached.

"We can go to the judges and say there are new circumstances and that the indictments are no longer needed," said a Ugandan government spokesman, Robert Kabushenga.

DOJ_NMG_0063445

People are already beginning to wonder what Mr. Kony will do if he comes home a free man.

"He never aspired to be a politician," said Florence Adokorach, now in her early 20's, who was kidnapped at age 14 and forced to be one of Mr. Kony's brides. Instead, he told his young wife, he just wanted to return to spreading God's word.

Property Deeds OfficeMax Thwarts Families' Attempts To Tap Cuba Funds (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

In February, nearly 45 years after two American men were executed by Fidel Castro's government, their families were on the verge of collecting $88.5 million in damages from Cuba's long-frozen U.S. accounts.

Then the relatives of Howard Anderson and Thomas "Pete" Ray ran up against an unexpected obstacle: OfficeMax Inc.

The office-products giant, founded in 1988, didn't exist at the time of the Cuban revolution. But in 2003 the company was purchased by Boise Cascade Corp., a paper-products company that adopted the OfficeMax name. Through a 1960s acquisition, Boise Cascade took a majority stake in Cuban Electric Co., which owned most of Cuba's pre-Castro electricity systems. As a result, OfficeMax today controls the largest single U.S. claim against the Cuban government for property confiscated after the 1959 revolution.

The U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission, an arm of the Justice Department, has certified nearly 6,000 U.S. claims for property seized by Cuba. Claimants hope that after the reign of Fidel Castro ends they can recover their homes, factories, beachfront land and sugar plantations believed to be valued at $6.7 billion today. To settle some claims, they also expect to gain access to more than $268 million in Cuban assets -- largely held in U.S. banks -- that were frozen under the Kennedy administration's Cuban embargo.

Most citizens and businesses will likely have to wait years to recoup any losses. In the mid-1990s, a coalition of U.S. companies, including OfficeMax's future parent, put pressure on the Clinton administration to settle its members' numerous claims with Cuba -- with no luck.

But thanks to special antiterrorism laws passed in 1996 and 2002, a few families have been able to leapfrog to the head of the line. The legislation helped permit relatives of Messrs. Anderson and Ray to seek, and ultimately win, wrongful-death judgments in Florida state courts, with a federal judge in January clearing the way to tap into the frozen Cuban funds.

OfficeMax wasn't pleased with the news. In March, the company filed court papers in New York U.S. District Court, Southern District, seeking to block the Ray and Anderson relatives from collecting.

Robert Muse, a Washington, D.C., lawyer who represents Cuban Electric and OfficeMax, says the dead men's families shouldn't be given first dibs on the accounts. "I'm not trying to be provocative," Mr. Muse says. "That money was sequestered for the purpose of paying [restitution] claims."

Janet Weininger, a daughter of Mr. Ray, says she is outraged at the latest roadblock to gaining justice for her father's execution. "I don't understand why a company like OfficeMax would act like this," she says.

An OfficeMax spokesman said the company doesn't comment on litigation. The Cuban Interests Section, the country's de facto embassy in Washington, didn't respond to requests for comment on the cases.

Renewed Interest

Fidel Castro's recent health troubles have sparked renewed interest in the property seized after Cuba's communist revolution. The battle between OfficeMax and the two families offers a taste of much larger struggles likely to come.

Mr. Castro's government has floated the idea of Americans returning and kicking residents out of their homes -- many of which were taken over to shelter multiple families. The issue is so sensitive that many Cuban-American community leaders and the White House say it is best left for a future democratic government in Cuba to resolve.

President George Bush's Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba said in a report this year that the U.S. government "can reassure the Cuban people that the U.S. government will not support any arbitrary effort to evict them from their homes."

The Cuba claims case is unusual. Historically, the U.S. government has blocked access to frozen foreign funds -- including cases against Saddam Hussein-era Iraq. But a powerful Cuban-American voting block in Florida has managed to win preferential treatment under both the Clinton and Bush administrations.

DOJ_NMG_0063446

In 1996, Congress swiftly passed the special law allowing U.S. citizens to file domestic lawsuits against foreign countries that commit terror attacks. The measure was introduced to benefit the families of three men who died that same year when Cuban military jets shot down civilian planes operated by a group called Brothers to the Rescue. Relatives of a fourth man who died couldn't benefit because he wasn't a U.S. citizen. Based in Miami, the activists were known for flying missions over the Florida Straits to spot refugees for rescue at sea.

After suing the Cuban government, the Brothers to the Rescue families won a federal court judgment to unlock some of the Cuban funds. From there, the group's attorneys subpoenaed various banks around the country in search of the dozens of frozen Cuban accounts. In 2001, they collected a total of about $97 million. Most of that sum was drawn from accounts at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.

That successful outcome prompted lawyers for the Anderson and Ray families to seek to qualify under the same narrow provisions of the U.S. antiterrorism laws.

Mr. Anderson was on trial in April 1961 -- accused by the Castro government of smuggling guns to anti-Communist rebels -- when U.S.-backed expatriates launched the Bay of Pigs invasion. During the attack, Cuban antiaircraft guns brought down a bomber piloted by Mr. Ray, a 30-year-old Central Intelligence Agency contractor. Both men eventually were executed: a firing squad for Mr. Anderson; a single shot to the temple for Mr. Ray.

For years after Mr. Ray's execution, U.S. and Cuban authorities revealed little about what had happened to him. Beginning at age 15, in 1970, Ms. Weininger says she wrote monthly letters to Mr. Castro seeking information about her father's body. She says she wrote repeatedly for nine years without receiving a response.

Mr. Ray's family later found out that his corpse was being kept frozen at a Havana morgue and, according to the family, periodically exhibited as a war trophy. It wasn't until 1979, after some diplomatic wrangling, that a black wooden coffin containing Mr. Ray's remains were returned for burial in Alabama.

Dorothy Anderson McCarthy, Mr. Anderson's 84-year-old widow who later remarried, wishes to see the Cuban government pay for her husband's death before she dies.

Tall and athletic, Mr. Anderson was stationed in Havana during World War II, where he met and married Dorothy, the 20-year-old daughter of American parents who lived in Cuba. The couple led a well-to-do life, raising four children. In the aftermath of the 1959 revolution, Mr. Anderson evacuated his family, along with his mother, to Miami. Mrs. McCarthy says she left Cuba "with a $5 bill, one suitcase and one watch."

The family acknowledges that Mr. Anderson, 41 at the time of his death, carried CIA messages to anti-Castro groups in Havana. He wasn't a paid American intelligence agent, they say, but he did take radios to the island to help support an underground anti-Castro movement. His family further asserts that at the time of his arrest, he was in Cuba only to attempt to prevent the expropriation of his family's small chain of gas stations and other businesses.

In his last letter to his wife from a jail cell in Cuba's Pinar del Rio province, Mr. Anderson said his fate was sealed. As his trial began, air-raid sirens could be heard outside the courtroom -- the opening salvos of the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion during which 1,500 CIA-trained Cuban exiles unsuccessfully tried to foment rebellion against Mr. Castro's government.

"It is unfortunate that this invasion took place, as under normal circumstances I am sure that the tribunal would not have been ruled by passion but by their own revolutionary laws," Mr. Anderson wrote in neat, square letters. "I hope and pray that you and mother will forgive me for the troubles that I have caused...especially this present big one." He was executed four hours later.

Now living in a retirement apartment complex in Florida, Mrs. McCarthy can recite from memory the transcribed words of the prosecutor who tried her husband in April 1961: "This American will die for everything that he has done. He doesn't deserve the death penalty, but he will receive it because perhaps from his blood something better will grow."

Mrs. McCarthy sued Mr. Castro's government in 2001, and Ms. Weininger followed in 2003, both in Florida state courts in Miami. Lawyers for the families argued that the Cuban government was liable for the torture and wrongful deaths of their relatives.

Emotional Testimony

In emotional testimony, family members described brutal executions suffered by their loved ones. Across the courtroom, the table typically reserved for defendants -- in this case the Cuban government -- sat empty. As has been its practice in recent years, the Cuban government ignored the lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0063447

State courts in Miami issued compensatory default judgments of $67 million for Mrs. McCarthy in 2003, and a year later $21.5 million for Ms. Weininger. Ms. Weininger won an additional $65 million in punitive damages, which under current laws are much more difficult to collect.

With judgments in hand, lawyers for the families filed claims in federal courts to access Cuban government funds anywhere in the U.S. They ended up in U.S. District Court in New York, where accounts at J.P. Morgan Chase still hold the bulk of the Cuban funds. The bank asked the court to rule that it wouldn't have any liability if it complied with court orders to pay the claims. A spokesman for J.P. Morgan Chase, which is named in the suit, declined to comment on the case.

This year, federal Judge Victor Marrero joined the two cases and asked for any final objections from the Cuban and U.S. governments, as well as from any claimants believing they had rights to the blocked funds. The Cuban government didn't respond and the U.S. government declined to intervene -- effectively signaling no objection to the payments.

That is when OfficeMax entered the picture. Cuban Electric, the corporate name by which OfficeMax identifies itself in court papers, argued that at the time of the executions of Messrs. Anderson and Ray, Cuba wasn't on the U.S. government's list of state sponsors of terrorism. The State Department added Cuba to the terror list in 1982, after the U.S. accused the Castro government of aiding Colombian guerrillas.

In his "friend of the court" brief filed in March, the attorney Mr. Muse argued that the relatives of Messrs. Anderson and Ray "were never entitled to the Florida state court judgments" they won.

Joseph DeMaria, Mrs. McCarthy's attorney in Miami, says only the Cuban government -- not OfficeMax -- can challenge the judgments in the case. He disputes OfficeMax's assertion that the frozen Cuban assets were intended to settle expropriation claims. Leon Patricios, attorney for Ms. Weininger, says the company "should have properly intervened in this case when it was filed."

A ruling from the federal judge in New York assigned to the families' case is expected soon.

When news broke in August of Mr. Castro's illness, Gary Anderson, the eldest son of Howard Anderson, was worried Mr. Castro might die.

"I honestly hope Fidel is OK, because I would like our case to come to some sort of conclusion while he is still alive," says Mr. Anderson, who owns an industrial supply company in Houston. "I would like Fidel to know that he's paying."

Growing Pains Booming Municipalities Defy China's Effort To Cool Economy (WSJ)

By Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

ZHENGZHOU, China -- The new musical fountain in this drab provincial capital in central China demonstrates why authorities in Beijing are having so much trouble controlling the world's fourth-largest economy.

Jets of water dance to the patriotic anthem "Love My China," while laser beams shoot into the sky. Soon, the fountain will be overshadowed by a hotel styled after a classical Chinese pagoda, which, at 918 feet, will be nearly three-quarters as tall as the Empire State Building. A waterfront arts complex, almost completed at a cost of $100 million, looks like a clutch of enormous duck eggs. Nearby, a newly opened conference center resembles an unfurled umbrella. An exhibition hall boasts the biggest stretch of free-standing roof in Asia.

Mayor Zhao Jiancai says his vision is to transform backward Zhengzhou into the "Chicago of the East" -- a gateway between the booming coast and the vast interior -- by more than tripling the city's size. Total investment in the area around the business district could hit $35 billion. It is a huge amount of money for the capital of Henan province, one of China's poorest.

"We can only make achievements with scale," says the mayor, a former tractor factory engineer.

A similar dynamic is at work across China. Local governments are encouraging a frenzy of construction to boost their economies -- even as China's central government seeks to throttle back investment that is producing runaway economic growth. The economy expanded 11.3% in the second quarter of this year from the same period a year earlier, far outstripping the government's target of 8% for the whole year.

Many developing countries would gladly trade places with China: Most suffer from too little investment, not too much. And they worry more about spreading slums than expanding skylines.

DOJ_NMG_0063448

Nevertheless, hyper-investment keeps roiling the world's fastest-growing major economy. Concerns are mounting that the boom could cause property bubbles that weigh down banks with bad debt when they burst. It also could clog railway lines and ports and trigger brown-outs as overloaded power grids collapse. Already, it is generating outsize demand for energy and raw materials, pushing up the cost around the world.

The International Monetary Fund, which is meeting Tuesday and Wednesday in Singapore, this week urged China to rein in credit to avoid "tipping off a boom-bust cycle."

Though inflation remains low at 1.3%, China's top leaders are worried. Almost every day, they issue edicts to slow economic growth -- with little effect. Leaders can't even be sure how much municipalities are spending because local finances have become so murky. According to official figures that many economists believe understate the true total, fixed-asset investment rose 21.5% in August from a year earlier. While that growth rate was slower than the 27.4% of July, total annual investment as a percentage of gross domestic product, the total value of all goods and services produced in a nation, still is much higher than Japan, South Korea or Taiwan managed to sustain even during their giddy years.

If inflation takes hold, as some economists expect, the effects would be felt globally. Since China is the world's third-largest trading nation, inflation could ripple to the U.S. and other countries through rising prices for its exports. That would complicate the efforts of the U.S. Federal Reserve and other major central banks trying to head off rising inflationary pressures.

More than a quarter century of economic overhauls has produced a striking contrast in China: Politically, the Communist central government maintains a tight grip over the entire country; economically, it is losing control.

Caught in a Trap

China's leaders are caught in a trap as they cast around for ways to rein in investment. The old administrative methods -- ordering state banks to stop lending, restricting land sales, halting government approvals for major projects -- aren't working as well as before, partly because local governments are defying Beijing.

Trying to enforce investment curbs in a vast country is a tough challenge: Beijing has resorted to using satellite images to spot bulldozers working on illegal construction projects in far-flung provinces. The economy, says Andy Xie, an economist in Hong Kong with Morgan Stanley, is too big and complicated to manage through fiat.

On the other hand, market-oriented measures to slow economic growth, such as raising interest rates, aren't likely to be as effective in China as in more sophisticated economies. One reason is that local bankers still are susceptible to political pressure to extend loans. Also, state-run companies make a habit of not repaying loans, so the cost of funds often is irrelevant. Much of the corporate investment is funded out of company savings.

Already, the big state banks have ignored Beijing and dished out almost all the loans they were targeted to extend for the whole year. The Ministry of Land Resources announced recently that in some cities as many as 90% of all government land acquisitions are illegal.

To be sure, an economy expanding at double-digit rates sooner or later will likely find uses for much of the infrastructure -- highways, bridges and power plants -- that local governments are installing. But when the latest investment boom unwinds, there are concerns that Chinese cities will be littered with white elephant industrial projects that will stand empty for years.

"It's mindless," says Wang Lina, a researcher at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, a leading think tank, who says local governments are generating large amounts of wasteful investment.

About 10% to 20% of all investment in China is made by local governments, according to World Bank economist Louis Kuijs, who is based in Beijing. That figure understates their influence. For instance, it doesn't include investment by real-estate developers that are nominally private but often act as agents for local authorities.

Under China's former socialist economy, central planners in Beijing doled out investment funds under an annual quota program -- so much for the railroads, for the power industry, for steelmakers. China's central government grabbed local revenue and redistributed the cash around the country to pay for further investment as well as government services.

This started changing in 1978, when Deng Xiaoping launched economic overhauls that made local governments responsible for delivering growth to their own communities. Economic growth has become the path to career glory for city mayors, like Zhengzhou's Mr. Zhao, who now are driving the national economy to an unprecedented extent. Hong Liang, an economist in Hong Kong with Goldman Sachs, compares modern Chinese cities to corporations, and their mayors to chief executive officers, all competing with each other to expand their business empires.

DOJ_NMG_0063449

There are good reasons why China's cities need to expand. Each year, they have to accommodate at least 10 million peasants flooding in from the countryside. Increasingly, cities also have been forced to fund their own health, education and social-welfare programs.

These financial pressures all feed into higher rates of investment, which is the quickest way for cities to expand their economies and increase their revenue.

Economic Giants

Cities in China have ballooned into economic giants. If Shanghai were a country, it would be among the 40 largest economies in the world. Its economic output last year of $114 billion was bigger than the Philippines or the Czech Republic. Shenzhen, in southern China, has an economy much larger than Vietnam's.

Still, many question whether local spending has become excessive. Zhengzhou's new conference hall, for instance, boasts a theater with seats that can be individually climate-controlled. Its vast foyer is clad in shimmering Italian marble.

Zhengzhou's drastic makeover is typical of those under way in cities around China. Shanghai led the way in the early 1990s by setting out to build a national financial and commercial hub on a stretch of rice paddy in an area called Pudong.

Over the years, Shanghai's urban plans have become ever more fanciful. It now is building a series of satellite cities -- each themed after a European country -- to relieve pressure on the city center. Anting, which aspires to be a car-making hub, is re-creating the pastel-colored apartment blocks and Bauhaus offices found in the German city of Weimar. It has even splurged on a Formula 1 race track.

Nearby, the emerging college city of Songjiang turned to a British engineering consultancy to construct an English-style community called Thames Town. There, residents can choose to live in Victorian terraced houses, drink in pubs and marry in a church whose spire rises over cobblestone lanes.

In March, Premier Wen Jiabao unveiled a five-year economic blueprint to steer China in a new direction. Instead of go-for-broke growth that has blighted the environment and widened social divisions, China would pursue more-balanced development. Still, growth is running at its fastest pace in 12 years.

China's leaders sought to curb credit by pushing through two interest-rate increases. They have taken funds out of the banking system by raising reserve requirements -- money that commercial banks must deposit with the central bank rather than lend out -- and slapped new taxes on real-estate transactions.

The two interest-rate increases this year have been too incremental -- each only 0.27 percentage point -- to have a real impact, economists say. Lending rates still are only around 6%, low for an economy expanding 14% in nominal terms, not taking into account inflation. By contrast, U.S. rates are at 5.25% -- up from 1% more than two years ago -- in an economy now expanding around 3%.

Compounding the problem is the way local governments are forced to fund their investments. China's central government doesn't allow them to raise local taxes or issue debt. Instead, they are cashing in their most valuable asset -- land. The sale of land now accounts for 40% to 60% of all local government revenue, according to Ms. Wang of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences.

This dynamic adds momentum to the geographical expansion of cities. To acquire more land that they can sell, cities simply redraw their boundaries to engulf the surrounding farms. The compensation they pay to farmers for the land is far less than its value to developers. When the city flips the land, the revenue isn't part of regular budgets that can be audited by Beijing.

Zhengzhou, an ancient city on the Yellow River plains of central China, has long been an underachiever. Its 1950s-era textile mills are laying off workers. It has shuttered some of its grimy aluminum works on Beijing's orders to cut back on overcapacity. One of its few claims to fame is that it makes a third of all the frozen dumplings sold in China.

With a population of just two million, it considered itself too small to drive the economy of China's most populous province, with roughly 100 million people, let alone make a national impact.

So in 2001, city authorities hired the acclaimed Japanese architect Kisho Kurokawa to draw up blueprints for the new urban area after an international competition. Zhengdong New District covers 58 square miles -- somewhat bigger than San Francisco. The plan will double the size of the city and add 1.5 million people to the existing population. It received the blessing of the State Council -- China's cabinet -- in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0063450

By 2020, Mr. Zhao says, additional enlargement will turn Zhengzhou into a city of five million covering 193 square miles.

Most of the investments will be made by companies rather than the government, says Mr. Zhao, 50, who sports red ties and slicks back his hair. Bank loans will pay for some infrastructure as well.

The skyline of the central business district eventually will be populated by 60-odd commercial and residential towers. The first are already in place and waiting for tenants to move in.

Radiating outward will be arrayed the industries and services of Zhengzhou's future: banking and finance, insurance, logistics, high-technology manufacturing and higher education. "It's the most advanced urban concept in the world," says Vice Mayor Wang Qinghai, who is directly responsible for the construction of the Zhengdong New District. Land prices have quadrupled in two years.

Mr. Wang says Beijing has given the go-ahead to projects covering only about 20% of the planned new area. That is holding up plans for a man-made island on a lake to house dozens of luxury apartments.

Elsewhere, there are few signs building momentum is slowing. The city's own glossy publicity materials boast that Zhengzhou has one of the highest densities of construction cranes operating in China.

Does Zhengzhou have a shot at becoming the "Chicago of China"? True, it sits at a railway crossroads between the main north-south and east-west lines, a major asset in a country where most goods still are moved by train. But there is plenty of competition from other central cities, including Wuhan farther south, as well as Nanchang, the fast rising capital of Jiangxi province.

Mayor Zhao says he is untroubled by the competition. "We all have our strengths," he says. "We'll fly together wing-to-wing."

The Energy Harvest (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

São Paulo, Brazil

Any time that OPEC got a little too overzealous in pushing up oil prices back in the 1970's, the legendary Saudi oil minister Sheik Ahmed Zaki Yamani was fond of telling his colleagues: Remember, the Stone Age didn't end because we ran out of stones.

What he meant was that the Stone Age ended because people invented alternative tools. The oil age is also not going to end because we run out of oil. It will end because the price of oil goes so high that people invent alternatives. Mr. Yamani was warning his colleagues not to get too greedy and stimulate those alternatives.

Too late — oil at $70 a barrel has done just that. One of the most promising of those alternatives is ethanol, an alcohol fuel made from corn, sugar cane or any biomass. I came to Brazil to try to better grasp what is real and what is not in the ethanol story, because no country has done more to pioneer sugar ethanol than Brazil.

My impression, after talking to a range of Brazilian experts, is that not only is ethanol for real, but we have not even begun to tap its full potential. With just a few technological breakthroughs, Brazil really could be the Saudi Arabia of sugar and we could actually achieve that energy dream of getting "barrels from bushels."

Since the 1970's oil shocks, Brazil has, with lots of trial and error, made ethanol part of its daily life. It hits you the minute you drive into a gas station in São Paulo, where you need two things: a credit card and a calculator. In rough numbers, sugar ethanol now sells here at a little over $2 a gallon and gasoline at a little more than $4 a gallon. Because sugar ethanol gets only about 70 percent of the mileage of gasoline, drivers here do the math each day and figure out if ethanol is at least 30 percent less than the price of gasoline. If it is, many will fill 'er up with sugar cane.

Brazilians have that luxury because there are 34,000 gas stations here that offer both gasoline and ethanol (compared with around 700 in the U.S.) and because 70 percent of new cars sold here can run on either gasoline or sugar ethanol. As a result, Brazil has replaced about 40 percent of its gasoline consumption with sugar ethanol.

DOJ_NMG_0063451

I visited the Cosan sugar mill northwest of São Paulo, Brazil's largest, where you fly in over an ocean of green sugar cane. The cane is harvested onto big lorries and trucked to the Cosan distillery. There, the juice is extracted and converted to either crystal sugar or ethanol. The remaining cane waste — called bagasse — is used to fuel huge steam boilers that produce enough electricity to both power the refining process and leave a surplus to be sold back to the grid.

It's important to understand this process to appreciate just how "much more energy we could get from sugar cane" with just a few more breakthroughs, explained Plinio Mario Nastari, one of Brazil's top ethanol consults.

Think of each stalk of sugar cane as containing three sources of energy. First, the juice extracted from the cane is already giving us ethanol and sugar. Second, the bagasse is already heating very low-technology, low-pressure boilers, giving us electricity. But if Brazil's refiners converted to new high-pressure boilers, you could get three times as much electricity.

Finally, when the cane is harvested the tops and leaves are often just left in the field. But this biomass is rich in cellulose, the carbohydrate that makes up the walls of plant cells. If the sugar locked away in cellulose also could be unlocked — cheaply and easily by a chemical process — this biomass could also produce tons of sugar ethanol. There is now a race on to find that process.

A breakthrough is expected within five years, and when that happens it will be possible to extract "more than double" the amount of ethanol from each sugar stalk, said José Luiz Oliverio, a senior V.P. at Dedini, the Brazilian industrial giant, which has a pilot cellulosic ethanol project.

I asked Brazilian experts what they'd do if they were the U.S. president. The consensus answer: Require U.S. oil companies to provide ethanol fuel pumps at all their gas stations, require U.S. auto companies to make all their new cars flex-fuel and improve mileage standards, and get rid of the crazy 54-cent tariff we've imposed on imported sugar ethanol (to protect our farmers). And then let the market work.

Demand for ethanol would soar. This would push us faster down the innovation curve, so we'd solve the cellulosic ethanol problem quicker, and that would strengthen the democrats in our hemisphere and weaken the petrocrats in the Middle East. If only we were as smart as Brazil ...

DOJ_NMG_0063452

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Senate Panel Defies Bush On Terror (AP) ... 4
Strategy On Terror Suspects Splits GOP (USAT) ... 5
Republicans Defy Bush Over Detainees (WT) ... 5
An Unexpected Collision Over Detainees (NYT) ... 6
Senate Panel Rebuffs Bush On Anti-Terror Legislation (LAT) ... 8
Senate Panel Thwarts Bush Plan On 'War On Terror' Detainees (AFP-Y) ... 9
Senate Panel Defies Bush On Detainees (MCT) ... 10
Tribunals Bill Advances, Sets Stage For Battle Among Republicans (WSJ) ... 12
Senators Defy Bush On Terror Measure (WP) ... 13
Rebuff For Bush On Terror Trials In A Senate Test (NYT) ... 14
Gonzales Backs Detainee Interrogation Tactics (MCT) ... 15
Retired Federal Judges Oppose Bush (AP-Y) ... 16
Poll Finds Support For Iran Strike (WSJ) ... 17
A Defining Moment For America (WP) ... 17
Stampeding Congress (NYT) ... 18
No Wonder Some Seek Terrorism At The Movies (WSJ) ... 20
Federal Judge Refuses To Reinstate Key Padilla Terrorism Charge (FLSUNSEN/AP) ... 21
Judge Orders Government To Share Medical Records Of Terror Suspect Jose Padilla (FLSUNSEN) ... 22
'Alternative' CIA Tactics Complicate Padilla Case (CSM) ... 22
10 Things To Know About Guantanamo (WP) ... 24
U.S. Sends 2 Gitmo Detainees To Kuwait (AP) ... 25
Mosque Leaders' Trial Continues (CAPN9) ... 26

Homeland Response:

Senate OKs Legislation To Tighten Security At Seaports (USAT/AP) ... 27
Senate Unanimously Votes To Tighten Security Measures At Ports (WP/AP) ... 27
Senate Approves Bill To Tighten Port Security (MCT) ... 28
Chemical-plant Security Vexes Congress (CSM) ... 29
Suspended Muslim Safety Expert Sues DHS (AP) ... 30
Air Cargo Faces Tighter Screening (AP) ... 30
Chertoff: Fee Up In Air For Registered Traveler (USAT) ... 31
TSA To Review Proposed Registered Traveler Fee (WSJ) ... 32
Insurers Press For Terror-Backstop Renewal (WSJ) ... 32
Amazing Device Sucks Up Sludge -- And Tax Dollars (WP) ... 33

War News:

Bush To Meet With Musharraf And Karzai (AP) ... 33
Kerry Faults Bush's Afghanistan Strategy (AP) ... 34
Militants Regroup In Western Afghanistan (USAT) ... 34
Poland Commits New Troops To Nato Force (FT) ... 35
NATO's Afghan Test (WP) ... 35
9/11, Osama Reflection: Reverse Cut And Run? (USAT) ... 36
CIA Learned In '02 That Bin Laden Had No Iraq Ties, Report Says (WP) ... 36
U.S. Says Sectarian Killings Up In Iraq (AP) ... 37
Iraq Violence Continues (LAT) ... 38
A General's Candor On Iraq (WP) ... 39
Iraq Official Says Syrian Help Needed (AP) ... 39
In A Volatile Region Of Iraq, U.S. Military Takes Two Paths (WP) ... 40
Iraqis Feel Weight Of High Prices, Few Jobs (CSM) ... 42
Judge Tells Hussein, 'You Are Not A Dictator' (NYT) ... 43
'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein During Genocide Trial (WP) ... 44
'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein At Trial (LAT) ... 45
The Right Troops In The Right Places (NYT) ... 46
World Bank Lists Failing Nations That Can Breed Global Terrorism (WP) ... 47
Terrorism, Here And There (WSJ) ... 48

DOJ:

Poetic Justice: DOJ Whistleblower On D.C. Ethics Committee (NLJ) ... 48

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutors Want Enron-linked Convictions Reinstated (AP) ... 49
Former Willbros Exec Pleads Guilty To Bribery (AP) ... 50
HP's Shares Rising Above The Fray (SFC) ... 50
Lerach Sues HP Directors, GC Over Records Scandal (LAW) ... 51
N.Y. AG's Office Objects To Grasso's Request For New Judge (LAW) ... 52
Hedge Margins Draw The Focus Of Fed Official (WSJ) ... 53
Billionaire In Mexico Settles Case With S.E.C. (NYT) ... 53
The SEC-Saw (WSJ) ... 54

Criminal Law:

Gonzales Deplores Web Predators (KCS) ... 55

Gonzales Asks For Stronger Penalties Against Online Sex Predators (AP) ... 55
US Attorney General Visits KC (WDAF) ... 56
GOP Officials Say Ney Will Offer Guilty Plea (USAT) ... 57
Ohio Congressman Is Said To Agree To Plead Guilty (NYT) ... 57
Ney To Plead Guilty In Scandal (WP) ... 58
Ohio Congressman To Plead Guilty To Criminal Charge In Corruption Probe, GOP Sources Say (AP) ... 59
Columnist Contradicts Leak Source (NYT) ... 59
What A Load Of Armitage! (WSJ) ... 60
Former Nev. Politician Pleads Guilty (WP/AP) ... 61
Russo's Wife To Plead Guilty (MR) ... 62
Prosecutors Have Plea Deal With Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife (AP) ... 62
Businessman Arrested On Extortion Charges (SFC) ... 62
Oakland Clothier Accused Of City Hall Extortion (MERCN/AP) ... 63
Oakland Clothier Arrested In Corruption Probe (BCNW) ... 64
Three Boston Police Officers Indicted As Result Of FBI Probe (AP) ... 64
2 Of 3 Indicted Cops Freed By Magistrate In Drug Smuggle Case (BOSH) ... 65
US Grand Jury Indicts 3 Boston Officers (BOS) ... 65
Former Chicago Patronage Chief Returns To Federal Grand Jury (AP) ... 66
Manhattan: Closing Arguments In Gotti Trial (NYT) ... 67
Gotti's Defense Attacked (NSDY) ... 67
Prosecutor Tells Jurors Not To Fall For Gotti's `charade' (NSDY/AP) ... 67
JUNIOR'S RETIREMENT 'CHARADE' (NYPOST) ... 68
Alleged Galante Ally Pleads Guilty In New York Case (AP) ... 68
Aryan Brotherhood Jury Deadlocks On Death Penalty Verdict (AP) ... 69
Banker Is Charged With Taking $6.1 Million (PHI) ... 70
N.J. Banker Charged With Stealing $6.2M (PHI) ... 70
Former Company President Admits Stock Fraud Plot (NSDY) ... 71
British Gambling Exec Resigns, Judge Rules He's Free To Leave NY (AP) ... 71
Sportingbet Chairman Dicks Resigns After Detention (Update4) (BLOOM) ... 72
Ex-Prosecutor's Bribery Trial Begins (FINDLAW/AP) ... 73
Guard Pleads Guilty In Contraband Case (AP-Y) ... 74
Feds Lower Boom On Alternative Money (USAT) ... 74
Bond Denied For Litchfield Man Accused Of Producing Child Porn (AP) ... 75
Elderly Women Plead Not Guilty In Los Angeles Hit-run Transient Deaths (FINDLAW/AP) ... 75
Former Ramsey Suspect Appears In California Court (USAT) ... 75

Civil Rights:

Justice Department Closes Investigation Into Teenager's Death (AP) ... 76
Missouri: Voter ID Law Is Struck Down (NYT/AP) ... 76
Judge Strikes Down Mo. Voter ID Law (AP-Y) ... 76
Pledge Challenger Newdow Claims Web Scribe Defamed Him (LAW) ... 77
Navy Chaplain Guilty Of Disobeying An Order (WP) ... 78
Jury Recommends Reprimand For Navy Chaplain Who Disobeyed Order By Appearing In Uniform (FINDLAW/AP) 79
Conservatives Say Religion Under Attack (AP-Y) ... 79

Antitrust:

Exelon Abandons PSEG Acquisition, Faults New Jersey (WSJ) 80
Exelon, PSEG End Merger Over Differences With NJ (MRKTWTCH) ... 80
Exelon, Public Service Cancel Sale Over State Hurdles (Update4) (BLOOM) ... 81
US Urges European Regulators To Lay Off Apple DRM (IDG) ... 82
Rent-A-Center Deal Gets Antitrust OK (AP) ... 83
Wright Strategy Plotted (DMN) ... 83
Lawyer Says FCC Ordered Study Destroyed (AP-Y) ... 84
EU Antitrust Chief Says Her Commission Is Investigating Microsoft Office (AP) ... 85
EU Antitrust Chief Eyes US-Style Private Damage Lawsuits (DOW) ... 85
Apollo Buys GE Unit For $3.8bn (FT) ... 86
Reshaping GE, Immelt Sells Unit (WSJ) ... 86
Iamgold To Buy Cambior For $1.2 Billion In Stock (WSJ/DJN) ... 87

Environment/Indian Affairs:

In Gamble, Calif. Tries To Curb Greenhouse Gases (NYT) ... 87
US To Cut Funds For Two Renewable Energy Sources (CSM) . 91
Interior Near 2 New Pacts In Oil Leases (NYT) ... 92
As Border Crackdown Intensifies, A Tribe Is Caught In The Crossfire (WP) ... 94

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Bring Charges Against Four (AP) ... 95
5 Of 12 Suspects In Massive Drug Ring Appear In Court (AP) ... 96
23 Charged In Drug Raid (CHIT) ... 96
Edgerton Case Gets Attention Of Feds (QCT) ... 97
'Dog The Bounty Hunter' Arrested (AP) ... 97
Bounty Hunter Arrested In ’03 Case (NYT) ... 98

Immigration:

Nervous Employers Re-Examine Practices In Wake Of Immigration Raids (LAW) ... 98
2 Polish Nationals Plead Guilty In US To 'Leasing' Illegal Workers (FINDLAW/AP) ... 102
Congress Passes Major Security Measures (NYT) ... 102
House Passes Border Fence (WT) ... 103
House Approves U.S.-Mexican Border Fence (AP-Y) ... 104
House Votes To Boost Border Security; Broader Immigration Issues Remain (LAT) ... 105
House Passes Border-Fence Bill, Changes To Rules On Earmarks (WSJ) ... 106
House Votes To Build 700 Miles Of Fence Along The U.S.-Mexico Border (MCT) ... 107
Overstating Border Reform's Price (WP) ... 108
Immigrants Turn Utah Into Mini-melting Pot (USAT) ... 109

Tax:

Anti-Abortion Group Loses Tax Exemption (NYT) ... 111

DOJ_NMG_0063454

Congress-Administration:

High Court To Provide Same-Day Argument Transcripts Online (LAW) ... 113
High Court To Post Same-Day Transcripts (WP) ... 113
House Passes New Ethics Rule (AP-Y) ... 114
House To Require Names On Pet Projects (NYT) ... 115
House Votes To Disclose Earmarks (WP) ... 115
House OKs Measure To Curb Pork Spending (WT) ... 116
House Takes A Cautious Step On Ethics (LAT) ... 117
2 Republicans In Senate Vow To Block F.D.A. Pick (NYT) ... 118
Government Recovers Stolen Computer (AP-Y) ... 119
Paulson Positions Treasury As Policy Quarterback (WSJ) ... 119
Proposal Would Make Retirement Benefits A Factor In Bidding (WP) ... 120
Lawmakers Seek To Loosen Up Banking Proposal (USAT) ... 121
Laura Bush Aiding Clinton Conference (AP-Y) ... 121
Democrats Meander In A New New Direction (WP) ... 122
Costs Will Outstrip Savings (USAT) ... 123
Sinking Secret Holds (WSJ) ... 124

Other News:

US Retail Sales Post Unexpected Rise (FT) ... 124
Retail-Sales Growth Eases To 0.2% (WSJ) ... 125
Retail Sales Take Wind Out Of Stocks' Sails (USAT/BLOOM) ... 125
Wall Street Dips On Fears Over Inflation (FT) ... 126
Stocks Slip As Natural Gas Hits Two-Year Low (WSJ) ... 127
Some Lawyers Ranked 'Super' Are Not The Least Bit Flattered (NYT) ... 127
Pennsylvania Judges Decide They, Alone, Will Get Raises (NYT) ... 128
Study Shows GOP Fundraising Edge Is Slipping (CQPOL) ... 129
Fundraising Totals By The Numbers (CQPOL) ... 131
Swift Boat Ads Backer Funds New Group (AP-Y) ... 132
Fla. Gov Candidate Names Running Mate (AP-Y) ... 133
Senate Candidate Speaks Of Life, Faith (WP) ... 133
Let Reagan Be Reagan (WP) ... 134
Nationalizing Politics (WP) ... 135
Progress Or Regress? (NYT) ... 136
Everyday Low Wages (NYT) ... 136
New Jersey Switcheroo (WSJ) ... 137
U.S. And S. Korea To Push To Restart Nuclear Talks (WP) ... 138
Bush, Roh Hope To Restart Talks With Pyongyang (WSJ/AP) 138
N. Korea's Refusal To Talk Bolstered Allies, Bush Says (WT) ... 139
Iran President Softens Nuclear Tone (FT) ... 139
US: Fight For Sanctions On Iran Will Be Tough, Take Weeks (AFP) ... 140
Nuclear Agency For U.N. Faults Report On Iran By U.S. House (NYT) ... 141
IAEA: U.S. Report On Iran 'Dishonest' (AP) ... 141
Opposition: Iran Using Laser Enrichment (AP) ... 142
Chavez Vows Aid For Iran Against Attack (AP) ... 143
Bush's Message To Iran (WP) ... 143
The Tehran Calculus (WP) ... 144
Palestinian PM Accuses U.S. Of Meddling (AP) ... 145
Rights Group Accuses Hezbollah Of 'Indiscriminate' Killing (WP) 146
Inaccurate Map Led To Fatal Strike On U.N. Post, Israel Says (NYT/AP) ... 147
U.S. Criticizes China Weapons Sales (AP-Y) ... 147
Ukraine Stalls NATO Bid To Build Public Support (WSJ) ... 147
Ukraine's Yanukovych Halts NATO Entry Talks (WP) ... 148
Leftist's Backers End Blockade In Mexico City (NYT) ... 149
Mexican Leftist Refuses To Back Down (USAT) ... 150
IMF Has No Crisis To Manage (WP) ... 151
Doing Business In Latin America (WSJ) ... 152
Russia Shaken By Killing Of Bank Official (WP) ... 153
Uganda Peace Hinges On Amnesty For Brutality (NYT) ... 154
Property Deeds OfficeMax Thwarts Families' Attempts To Tap Cuba Funds (WSJ) ... 156
Growing Pains Booming Municipalities Defy China's Effort To Cool Economy (WSJ) ... 158
The Energy Harvest (NYT) ... 161

DOJ_NMG_0063455

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senate Panel Defies Bush On Terror (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The Associated Press, September 15, 2006

A rebellious Senate committee defied President Bush on Thursday and approved terror-detainee legislation he has vowed to block, deepening Republican conflict over terrorism and national security in the middle of the election season.

Republican Sen. John Warner of Virginia, normally a Bush supporter, pushed the measure through his Armed Services Committee by a 15-9 vote, with Warner and three other GOP lawmakers joining Democrats. The vote set the stage for a showdown on the Senate floor as early as next week.

In an embarrassment to the White House, Colin Powell — Bush's first secretary of state — announced his opposition to his old boss' plan, saying it would hurt the country. Powell's successor, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, jumped to the president's defense in a letter of her own.

All this played out after Bush started his day by journeying to the Capitol to try nailing down support for his own version of the legislation — and by issuing a threat to the maverick Republicans.

"I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward with legal clarity," Bush said at the White House.

The president's measure would go further than the Senate package in allowing classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials, using coerced testimony and protecting CIA and other U.S. interrogators against prosecution for using methods that may violate the Geneva Conventions.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," Powell, a retired general who is also a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote in his letter.

Powell said Bush's bill, by redefining the kind of treatment the Geneva Conventions allow, "would add to those doubts. Furthermore, it would put our own troops at risk."

Firing back, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Powell was "confused" about the White House plan. Later, Snow said he probably shouldn't have used that word.

"I know that Colin Powell wants to beat the terrorists, too," he said.

The administration also produced its own letter from Rice. She wrote that narrowing the standards for detainee treatment as Bush has proposed "would add meaningful definition and clarification to vague terms in the treaties."

In addition, CIA Director Michael Hayden wrote a letter to his employees saying he has asked Congress "to help define our responsibilities so that we and the Department of Justice can judge the appropriateness of any procedures we would propose to use" while questioning terrorism suspects. He said Bush's bill did that.

In the committee vote, Warner was supported by GOP Sens. McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Susan Collins of Maine. Warner, McCain and Graham had been the most active senators opposing Bush's plan. The vote by the moderate Collins underscored that there might be broad enough GOP support to successfully take on Bush on the floor of the Republican-run Senate.

As the battle mushrooms, it threatens to undermine campaign season assertions by the administration that it has shown a steady hand on security matters and that Republicans should be trusted over Democrats on such issues.

Bush still has many congressional allies, including House and Senate leaders and conservatives, who want to align themselves with the president's tough stance on interrogation and prosecution. The House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday passed a bill that supports the administration's position by 52-8.

But that support is not universal. Rep. Steve Buyer, R-Ind., said he told Bush during the president's visit that he should heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have previously opposed some provisions of the president's plan.

Buyer and other Republicans are expected to align themselves with McCain, who spent more than five years as a prisoner of war during Vietnam. Last year, he overcame Bush's objections to pass legislation banning cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of detainees.

Leaving his closed-door meeting with the House GOP caucus, Bush said he would "continue to work with members of the Congress to get good legislation." He complimented a House bill but did not mention the Senate version.

DOJ_NMG_0063456

"I reminded them that the most important job of government is to protect the homeland," he said. Bush was accompanied by Vice President Dick Cheney and White House political adviser Karl Rove.

The White House also released a letter to lawmakers signed by the military's top uniformed lawyers. Saying they wanted to clarify past testimony on Capitol Hill in which they opposed the administration's plan, the lawyers wrote that they "do not object" to sections of Bush's proposal for the treatment of detainees.

Two congressional aides who favor McCain's plan said the military lawyers signed that letter after refusing to endorse an earlier one offered by the Pentagon's general counsel, William Haynes, that expressed more forceful support for Bush's plan.

The aides spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter publicly. Asked if Haynes had encouraged them to write the letter, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said, "Not that I'm aware of."

Another Bush bill would give legal status to the administration's warrantless wiretapping program. The Senate Judiciary Committee approved the bill on a party-line vote Wednesday, but it is stalled in the House amid opposition from Democrats and some Republicans concerned that the program violates civil liberties.

Strategy On Terror Suspects Splits GOP (USAT)

By David Jackson And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush is facing a Republican rebellion over a policy he says is crucial to the war on terrorism, as key members of his party lead the opposition to a White House plan for interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects.

Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican who supports the administration proposal, said Bush faces “an uphill battle” in the Senate. On Thursday, the Senate Armed Services Committee approved Chairman John Warner's rival plan on a bipartisan 15-9 vote. Among those speaking out against the Bush measure: the president's former secretary of State, Colin Powell.

Critics of the Bush proposal, including Warner, R-Va., and Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., contend that Bush's plan jeopardizes the nation's reputation by failing to guarantee fair trials for terror suspects. They also say captured U.S. troops could be subject to retaliation.

The White House says Warner's bill could effectively shut down important CIA interrogations. “In order to protect this country, we must be able to interrogate people who have information about future attacks,” Bush said at the White House. “I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward.”

A showdown looms next week. Republican House leaders have scheduled a vote on Bush's plan, which they support. White House spokeswoman Dana Perino acknowledged that the president's bill may fall short in the Senate. She said House and Senate negotiators may have to resolve the differences between the two bills.

McCain has been a strong supporter of Bush's anti-terrorism strategy. But he said the administration's proposed rules for interrogating suspects would essentially rewrite the 1949 Geneva Conventions and invite other countries to weaken the treaty's ban on humiliating, cruel and degrading treatment of prisoners.

In a letter released by McCain, Powell backed the GOP senators. “The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism,” wrote Powell, a retired general who also served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

McCain accused CIA Director Michael Hayden of pushing a policy designed to forgive possible agency abuses. “He's trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation,” he said.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield released a letter Hayden wrote to agency employees that argued otherwise. Hayden denied asking lawmakers to water down the Geneva Conventions. “I did not ask them to create a CIA (exception),” he wrote. “I am simply asking Congress to help define our responsibilities.”

The Senate Armed Services vote came hours after Bush made a rare trip to Capitol Hill to tout his military tribunal plan before a friendly audience of House Republicans. Even there, he faced a challenge.

Rep. Steve Buyer, R-Ind., was a colonel in the Army Reserve who wrote legal guidelines for interrogators in the Persian Gulf War. Buyer said he challenged Bush to “listen to your legal commanders” during the closed-door session.

The White House must find a way to share classified evidence, at least with defense lawyers, that will be used against alleged terrorists, Buyer said. “There has to be a procedure by which we can have a proceeding that reflects our values and is viewed by the world as fair and just,” he said.

Republicans Defy Bush Over Detainees (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

Defiant Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee bucked President Bush yesterday and approved a bill for detention and trial of foreign terrorism suspects that Mr. Bush says would compromise the war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0063457

The president insisted that he will not accept a bill that ties the CIA's hands or puts classified information at risk, and urged Congress to pass a proposal similar to what he submitted instead.

Led by Sen. John McCain of Arizona and committee Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia, four Republicans joined the panel's 11 Democrats to support a bill that gives terrorism detainees broader civil rights than Mr. Bush has proposed.

But most Senate Republicans, including the rest of the committee's members, support the administration's view that Mr. Warner's bill would limit intelligence gathering and expose classified information to terrorists. They have vowed to fight it out on the Senate floor.

Mr. Warner said he crafted the measure carefully to meet the concerns of the Supreme Court. The high court earlier this year struck down Mr. Bush's current setup for trying detainees held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"It would be a very serious blow to the credibility of the United States ... if legislation passed by the Congress and signed by the president failed to meet a second Supreme Court review," Mr. Warner said yesterday.

But Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican and committee member, called that argument a "boogeyman" and insisted he would try to amend the bill to be more in line with the White House approach.

The administration last week publicly acknowledged a classified CIA interrogation program, which, officials said, has produced information that helped thwart at least eight terrorist plots since 2001. But the Supreme Court ruling leaves that program on tenuous ground, and Mr. Bush says it would have to end if Congress doesn't approve new rules.

A Capitol Hill source said that after two weeks of fruitless negotiations with Mr. McCain, the White House has decided to instead have the fight in public and make its case directly.

The effort has kicked into high gear this week with CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden saying that without specific guidance, he would have to close down the interrogation program. The administration also released a letter from the military's top lawyers saying guidance would be welcome, and a letter from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying what the U.S. is doing makes sense.

The administration argues that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions has never been tested by the U.S. before, and provisions banning harsh treatment are vague. Mr. Bush wants a bill that lists exactly what is out of bounds.

Mr. Warner's bill allows accused terrorists more access to classified evidence against them during military tribunals, and also rejects Mr. Bush's definition of treatment of detainees.

The president visited with House Republicans yesterday to urge them to approve his approach, and House Republican leaders indicated they would. The House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday passed a version acceptable to the White House in a bipartisan 52-8 vote.

Later, Mr. Bush said he "will resist" any bill that the CIA says would tie its hands.

"If there's ambiguity, if there's any doubt in our professionals' minds that they can conduct their operations in a legal way, with support of the Congress, the program won't go forward and the American people will be in danger," he said.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said both sides want the same thing.

"They got to figure out how to achieve it," he said.

Mr. Cornyn said the two camps probably can resolve the issue of how to handle classified information, but the sticking point is the Geneva Conventions issue.

Mr. McCain said the White House wants to redefine the conventions, and doing so would invite international criticism.

"If you change the interpretation of it, you are changing a treaty," he said, arguing that such a move could hurt U.S. agents by opening the door for other countries to interpret the treaty however they see fit.

"I believe then people would be turned over to the secret police," he said.

Former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, also a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote a letter this week saying that in trying to "redefine" part of the Geneva Conventions the administration was risking the "moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

But Mr. Snow said Mr. Powell was confused about what the administration is trying to achieve.

"The whole purpose of this is to make sure that we place our troops out of harm's way, and also the people who are doing the interrogations, by making clear what the standards are," he said.

An Unexpected Collision Over Detainees (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — President Bush and Congressional Republicans spent the last 10 days laying the foundation for a titanic pre-election struggle over national security, and now they have one. But the fight playing out this week on Capitol Hill is not what they had in mind.

DOJ_NMG_0063458

Instead of drawing contrasts with Democrats, the president's call for creating military tribunals to try terror suspects — a key substantive and political component of his fall agenda — has erupted into a remarkably intense clash pitting some of the best-known warriors in the Republican Party against Mr. Bush and the Congressional leadership.

At issue are definitions of what is permissible in trials and interrogations that both sides view as central to the character of the nation, the way the United States is perceived abroad and the rules of the game for what Mr. Bush has said will be a multigenerational battle against Islamic terrorists.

Democrats have so far remained on the sidelines, sidestepping Republican efforts to draw them into a fight over Mr. Bush's leadership on national security heading toward the midterm election. Democrats are rapt spectators, however, shielded by the stern opposition to the president being expressed by three Republicans with impeccable credentials on military matters: Senators John McCain of Arizona, John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. The three were joined on Thursday by Colin L. Powell, formerly the secretary of state and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in challenging the administration's approach.

It is one of those rare Congressional moments when the policy is as monumental as the politics.

On one side are the Republican veterans of the uniformed services, arguing that the president's proposal would effectively gut the nearly 60-year-old Geneva Conventions, sending a dark signal to the rest of the world and leaving United States military without adequate protection against torture and mistreatment.

On the other are the Bush administration and Republican leaders of both the House and Senate who say new tools are urgently needed to pursue and interrogate terror suspects and to protect the covert operatives who play an increasingly important role in chasing them.

Republicans concede that the fight among themselves is a major political distraction, particularly given the credentials of the Republican opposition, led by Mr. McCain, the former prisoner of war in Vietnam who was tortured in captivity.

"It is a big problem," said Representative Ray LaHood of Illinois, a senior House Republican. "These guys have a lot of weight and a lot of standing. McCain is a tough guy to beat on this."

But Mr. Bush, who visited the Capitol on Thursday to rally House Republicans behind his approach, is also tough. He will no doubt do everything possible to get a deal, if not on the floor of the Senate then in conference between the House and the Senate. But the immediate result in political terms has been to create a battle among Republicans about core principles less than eight weeks before Election Day.

"This whole issue is going to send a signal about who America is in 2006," Mr. Graham said.

Brushing aside the objections of Mr. Bush and most of his Republican colleagues in Congress, Mr. Warner led the Senate Armed Services Committee to produce legislation on Thursday that would provide detainees with protections beyond those sought by Mr. Bush, setting up a collision with the House, where a measure approved by the administration is advancing.

House Republicans say the Senate plan is misguided and will hobble the American military. Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said it would lead to "the lawyer brigade" being attached to combat troops to counsel detainees.

Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York and chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, said: "I just think John McCain is wrong on this. If we capture bin Laden tomorrow and we have to hold his head under water to find out when the next attack is going to happen, we ought to be able to do it."

Mr. McCain's opponents acknowledge that, given his experiences, he is a powerful advocate on this subject, but that the shadow war against terrorists has new legal complexities.

"I have never led in combat, but I do have some experience with the law," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas and a former State Supreme Court justice who has jousted with Mr. McCain over the legislation.

There is no doubt that Mr. Cornyn and his fellow Republicans would much rather be dueling with the Democrats over this issue, which they see as their chief election-year advantage.

After their meeting with the president, House Republicans sought to play up their differences with House Democrats on the detainee legislation although the bill passed the Armed Services Committee on an overwhelmingly bipartisan vote.

Republicans will also continue try to continue to pound Democrats on other security measures, like legislation to authorize the administration's eavesdropping program. But the political power of that issue gets muddied as well because some House and Senate Republicans want to impose more restrictions on the program than the administration finds acceptable.

Recent polls continue to show Republicans with an advantage on security issues, but they are mixed as to whether the president's most recent push is raising his popularity. In addition, widespread public dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq is clouding election prospects for Republicans.

But with the focus on the treatment of detainees there is a potential benefit for Republicans since it does at least temporarily change the subject from Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0063459

Democrats say that no matter how bipartisan the opposition to the administration's tribunal plan, they expect that Republicans will try to blame Democrats for any delay. They note that House Republicans have taken to referring to bipartisan Senate legislation on immigration, a measure most House Republicans abhor, as the Reid-Kennedy bill, named for the Democrats Harry Reid of Nevada and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, despite the substantial participation of Mr. McCain.

"At the end of the day, they will forget John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner and say it is all about the Democrats holding up President Bush's plan to make American safer," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate.

But Mr. Durbin said, "We are not going to take it sitting down."

Senate Panel Rebuffs Bush On Anti-Terror Legislation (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's campaign for tougher legislation on terrorists suffered another blow today when Senate Republicans supported efforts to block his plan to reinterpret Geneva Convention restrictions on the interrogation of prisoners.

By a 15-9 vote, Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and three other Republicans joined Democrats in opposing the change.

The rejection of Bush's plan could create a dramatic clash, particularly among Republicans campaigning for reelection as being strong on security issues, when the full Senate votes next week.

Today's vote came several hours after Colin Powell, the secretary of State in Bush's first term, spelled out his position in a letter to Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," Powell said. "To redefine [a portion of the Geneva Convention] would add to those doubts."

More than that, he said, it could lead to the mistreatment of American troops captured in Iraq and elsewhere during the war on terrorism.

Powell's letter came as the Senate Armed Services Committee met in closed session to consider Bush's proposal. Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Susan Collins (R-Me.) joined Warner and McCain and all the Democrats on the committee in voting against the proposal.

Bush wants the authorization before the trials begin for 14 high-profile terrorists who have been taken to the detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, from CIA prisons worldwide.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the military tribunals that were set up for prosecuting terror suspects needed congressional authorization. Bush does not want the new tribunals to be hamstrung by what the administration describes as the vague protections that the Geneva Convention, adopted shortly after World War II, offers to prisoners of war.

Before the Armed Services Committee deliberated, Bush paid a rare visit to Capitol Hill to try to shore up support for two foundering anti-terrorism measures and the Geneva Convention proposal. He also made another trip to allow the continuation of the program of eavesdropping on Americans' international phone calls without warrants.

On Wednesday, a divided Senate Judiciary Committee muddied the outlook for an issue that Republicans consider key to the midterm elections when it approved widely divergent bills aimed at overhauling domestic eavesdropping laws.

The committee endorsed a White House-backed measure that would give President Bush broad authority for his warrantless wiretapping program. It also approved legislation by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would largely preserve a 1978 law governing domestic spying while making few provisions for new executive powers.

While one lawmaker decried the Senate approach as "totally contradictory," the House Judiciary Committee abruptly canceled a vote on its own version of the surveillance reform law amid signs of dissension among Republicans there.

The White House said it was confident that lawmakers ultimately would enact the measures Bush was promoting. But the growing disharmony over the president's tribunal plan drew warning shots Wednesday from some administration officials.

In a conference call with reporters, John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, warned that if an alternate version of the tribunal bill proposed by McCain passed, the CIA would be forced to shut down its interrogation program.

"If it goes forward as proposed, this will not allow for the CIA high-value terrorist detention program to go forward," Negroponte said.

The Judiciary Committee's eavesdropping vote was a rare rebuke for an administration that has tested the limits of executive power since Sept. 11.

The panel's eight Democrats were joined by two Republicans — Graham and the committee's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — in approving the Feinstein measure.

DOJ_NMG_0063460

Specter has been the driving force behind the White House surveillance bill, which he brokered with Vice President Dick Cheney over the summer. But he said he voted for both bills — he had previously been a sponsor of the Feinstein legislation — because each had important attributes.

Some members of the panel, however, said the committee was passing the buck by sending multiple and conflicting legislation to the floor. A central premise of the Feinstein legislation was "totally contradictory to legislation we just passed," said Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.). "What kind of message does that send to our colleagues?"

Others said that the panel's action showed a lack of understanding of the issues at hand.

By moving along bills "that are flatly contradictory, they are saying that they don't really understand what they are doing," said James X. Dempsey, policy director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, a Washington-based advocacy group. "Throwing the issue open to floor debate in a partisan atmosphere is probably the worst possible way of resolving complex issues at the intersection of technology, national security and constitutional doctrine."

Under the domestic surveillance program, the National Security Agency has intercepted communications between suspected terrorists abroad and people in the United States. It The program has been a flashpoint in the post-Sept. 11 debate over liberty and security since being divulged in media reports in December.

The administration has acknowledged that in conducting the program, it did not obtain warrants from the court established by Congress under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, in 1978 to monitor all domestic surveillance in terrorism and espionage cases. The president, the administration said, had the power to order the monitoring without going through those channels.

The Specter bill incorporates that view.

But Feinstein's bill affirms what she and others say was the original intent of the 1978 law, and makes it clear that the FISA court is the exclusive authority for approving such requests.

Whereas the administration has expressed concern that the FISA court process is too cumbersome in an age of cell phones and Internet-savvy terrorists, Feinstein's solution would focus on expanding current emergency provisions in the law.

The legislation would extend — from the current 72 hours to seven days — the time allowed for emergency surveillance before a warrant application must be submitted to the FISA court. It also would augment the 15-day wartime exception for wiretapping without court approval to include incidents of congressional authorization for the use of force or a national emergency created by a terrorist attack.

"I am a happy camper, at this point," Feinstein told reporters after the vote. "I think we can get Republicans. We'll see."

Republicans view national security as their greatest political strength in their battle to keep control of Congress in the November midterm elections. And on Wednesday, the House Armed Services Committee approved a tribunal measure that closely tracked the administration's proposal.

"I can think of no better way to honor the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 than by establishing a system to prosecute the terrorists who, on that day, murdered thousands of innocent civilians, and who continue to seek to kill Americans both on and off the battlefield," said Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), the committee's chairman.

The administration's proposal considered by the Armed Services Committee would, among other things, redefine Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which establishes a baseline level of treatment for all combatants. Administration officials have said the changes are necessary to protect interrogators from prosecution or civil suits.

"This is an attempt not to alter Geneva, nor to avoid the purposes of Geneva, but rather to give it the kind of clarity we felt [was] required," Negroponte said Wednesday. "We feel there are parts of Common Article 3 under Geneva that are vague."

That vagueness, Negroponte said, meant that CIA interrogators could not be certain they were behaving in a lawful manner.

But McCain and others have said that the changes also could have the effect of putting U.S. troops at risk.

"The overwhelming majority of retired military people are weighing in on this issue and saying, 'Don't amend Common Article 3,'" the Arizona lawmaker said Wednesday.

"How we interpret Common Article 3, and any effort to undercut its meaning, will be taken into account by our enemies in future conflicts," McCain added. "We are concerned about the plight of American servicemen and women who may be captured in future conflicts."

Senate Panel Thwarts Bush Plan On 'War On Terror' Detainees (AFP-Y)

By Stephanie Griffith

AFP, September 15, 2006

A US Senate panel rejected President George W. Bush's plan to relax standards on the treatment of "war on terror" suspects, instead backing a substitute bill offering greater rights protections to foreign detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0063461

In a stinging rebuke to the US president, the Senate Armed Services Committee voted 15 to nine in favor of a bill drafted by Republican chairman John Warner.

The outlines of the president's plan, which would allow tougher questioning of detainees while protecting US interrogators from being prosecuted for war crimes, were approved Wednesday by a US House of Representatives panel.

Bush came to Capitol Hill Thursday to drum up additional support for his legislation, which he said would "give us the tools and wherewithal to protect this country."

But his appeals failed to sway Democrats and a handful of key Republicans in the Senate Armed Services Committee, who instead were convinced by Warner's arguments that the president's bill could endanger future US prisoners of war and hurt America's standing in the world.

The Senate vote sets up difficult negotiations with House lawmakers and Bush administration officials over their differing versions, but McCain said an accord is within reach.

"I think we see a compromise there so that we could prevent national security from being compromised, but yet still allow the defendant to be able to see some of the evidence against him," he said, speaking on CNN.

"What we are seeking is to make sure that the Geneva Conventions covering these circumstances are not changed, because if we amend the Geneva Conventions, then other nations will to their liking," which he said "could put American lives at risk."

The administration plan would redefine which acts constitute war crimes, after the Supreme Court ruled in June that his existing court system established to prosecute terrorism suspects was illegal and violated the international Geneva Conventions.

Bush praised the House Armed Services Committee for having passed his bill, which he called "a very important piece of legislation in a bipartisan fashion that will give us the tools and wherewithal to protect this country," he said.

"We have proposed legislation that will enable the Central Intelligence Agency to be able to conduct a program to get information from high-value detainees in a lawful way," Bush said at a joint news conference later Thursday with South Korean President Roh Moo-Hyun.

"It is very important for the American people to understand that in order to protect this country we must be able to interrogate people who have information about future attacks," Bush said.

"I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward with legal clarity."

Asked later for White House reaction to the Senate defeat, Bush spokesman Tony Snow said the remarks from the news conference with Roh "remain valid."

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a letter delivered to Warner's committee Thursday, called the administration bill a "reasonable, good faith interpretation" that does attempt to take human rights concerns into account.

But the president's proposals have been strongly opposed by three powerful Republican senators -- Warner, Lindsey Graham and John McCain-- who insist there must be no erosion in US compliance with international law governing the treatment of war detainees.

At a press conference Wednesday, Graham -- who in addition to being a US senator is also a military lawyer -- denounced the White House proposal.

"It started with Abu Ghraib," he said, referring to the notorious Iraqi prison where US abuses were found.

"Are we going to start being the first country in the world that changes the Geneva Conventions so the secret police programs of those nations will be OK?"

The trio got the support of an influential ally, former US secretary of state Colin Powell.

Powell sent a letter to McCain on Wednesday condemning the administration's plan to change rules governing detainee treatment, which are covered under Article Three of the Geneva Conventions.

"I do not support such a step and believe it would be inconsistent with the McCain amendment on torture, which I supported last year," Powell wrote, in a letter made public by McCain Thursday.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism. To redefine Common Article Three would add to those doubts," wrote Powell, who is also ex-chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

But Bush dismissed Powell's remarks, saying "there's all kinds of letters coming out," and pointed out that a group of military lawyers sent a letter to the House and Senate Armed Services panels supporting the administration plan.

Senate Panel Defies Bush On Detainees (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Ignoring threats and warnings from President Bush, a defiant Senate committee approved legislation Thursday that would ban abusive CIA interrogations and make it easier for terrorist suspects to defend themselves at trial.

DOJ_NMG_0063462

The Republican-led Senate Armed Services Committee voted 15-9 to send the legislation to the full Senate. Four Republicans, including Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the committee's chairman, backed the bill over Bush's objections, as did the panel's 11 Democrats.

The split in Republican ranks widened as former Secretary of State Colin Powell joined the dissidents against his former boss.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," Powell wrote in a letter to Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who has teamed up with Warner and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in opposing Bush. Powell is former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. McCain was a prisoner of war in Vietnam. Warner is a former secretary of the Navy. Graham is a judge in the Air Force reserves.

Bush made a rare visit to the Capitol to lobby House Republicans for his approach and declared that "the American people will be in danger" if lawmakers continue to defy him.

Bush said CIA interrogators should have wide latitude when questioning terrorists, as long as they don't engage in torture. The Senate bill would ban abusive techniques that the Bush administration doesn't consider torture, such as "water-boarding," which simulates drowning.

"In order to protect this country, we must be able to interrogate people who have information about terrorist attacks," Bush told reporters after his closed-door visit with House Republicans. "I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward with legal clarity."

Powell endorsed efforts by three Senate Republicans to make sure that suspected terrorists receive basic protections provided by the Geneva Conventions, an international agreement governing the treatment of prisoners of war. The basic protections, spelled out in a provision known as Common Article 3, prohibit "outrages upon personal dignity," including "humiliating and degrading treatment."

Powell agreed with other retired senior military officers who wrote Warner contending that Bush's approach undermines support for the war on terrorism and encourages abusive treatment against captured Americans.

The legislation under debate would revamp the ground rules for dealing with terrorist suspects, from interrogation to detention to trial before military tribunals. Some of the most controversial issues involve the treatment of detainees in secret CIA prisons.

The legislation also would change the rules of evidence for suspected terrorists facing trial before military tribunals. The Senate committee bill would make it easier for defendants to see the evidence against them and would tighten restrictions on the use of hearsay evidence.

Terrorist suspects would have fewer legal rights than Americans in civilian courts, but would have more than what Bush wants to give them.

Although the military has banned a long list of abusive interrogation tactics, the prohibitions don't apply to the CIA. Bush wants Congress to give CIA interrogators wide latitude while protecting them from possible later prosecution for actions that might be considered war crimes.

The issue took on new urgency last June when the Supreme Court ruled that terrorist suspects are entitled to basic protections under the Geneva Conventions.

"If there's not clarity, if there's ambiguity, if there's any doubt in our professionals' minds that they can conduct their operations in a legal way, with support of the Congress, the program won't go forward and the American people will be in danger," Bush said.

Bush brushed off Powell's opposition, but White House spokesman Tony Snow didn't conceal the annoyance that his defection caused within the president's inner circle. Snow said Powell was "confused" about Bush's goals and suggested that the former secretary of state should have contacted the White House for clarification before writing his letter.

Snow insisted that Bush merely wants to clarify the standards of conduct under the Geneva Conventions, not water down the basic protections provided to captives.

McCain, who was tortured as a war prisoner in Vietnam, took issue with Snow's interpretation.

"Clarify, modify, I mean please," he said with exasperation. "You are changing a treaty which no other nation on Earth has changed for the first time in 57 years."

The Arizona Republican also accused CIA Director Michael Hayden of trying to shield his agency from scrutiny under the guise of national security.

"General Hayden wants to change the Geneva Conventions not to protect his people," McCain said after the committee vote. "He wants to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation."

DOJ_NMG_0063463

The White House sought to counter Powell's opposition by producing a letter from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice supporting Bush. The White House also released another letter of support from five top military lawyers representing the armed services.

Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee reacted skeptically to the military lawyers' letter, suggesting that it didn't fully reflect the views of the lawyers who signed it.

"There's more to it," said Graham, who contacted the military lawyers after reading their joint letter. "The concerns I've been expressing for weeks, they share. ...That needs to come out, too. You can't use the letter in a vacuum."

A person close to the military lawyers, who insisted on anonymity because he was unauthorized to challenge the White House, confirmed Graham's account.

"It (the lawyers' letter) doesn't say they are recommending that the president's legislation pass," this person said. "It's just saying they don't object. I believe that if we were asked our preference, we would say we prefer the bill that Senators McCain, Warner and Graham have put forward."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he would decide next week whether he would permit a vote on the dissidents' bill or substitute a White House-backed alternative. Lawmakers are under pressure to finish the legislation before their planned Oct. 6 recess for the fall election season. The Republican infighting is undermining Bush's effort to portray Democrats as soft on national security heading into the elections.

Tribunals Bill Advances, Sets Stage For Battle Among Republicans (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Over President Bush's opposition, a plan to prosecute enemy combatants advanced in the Senate with bipartisan support, raising the prospect of a messy floor battle among Republicans heading into the midterm elections.

The Senate Armed Services Committee approved the proposal on a 15-9 vote, with all the panel's Democrats and four of its Republicans in support. Most Republicans on the committee voted against it, however, saying they preferred Mr. Bush's approach. The debate likely will continue on the Senate floor next week.

Republicans had hoped the vote would be a chance to point out differences with Democrats over national-security issues, but, in fact, it won't be so clear-cut. Democrats spoke little, but tried to counter Republican attempts to paint them as obstructionists. "We must adopt a bill. That's something that should be all our goals," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's senior Democrat.

Unlike Mr. Bush's plan, the Senate bill allows accused combatants to see classified evidence being used against them and permits evidence obtained using coercion only if a judge determines it illuminates the facts of the case. Both bills prohibit cruel treatment, such as torture. The administration plan bars the accused from invoking the Geneva Conventions as a source of rights in court, while the Senate bill limits the use of the treaty only in civil actions, such as lawsuits for damages against an interrogator.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush visited House Republicans to rally their support for his national-security priorities and to thank them for making strides on his military-tribunals plan, which a House panel approved Wednesday.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Bush won't support the Senate plan, which the administration contends would end the Central Intelligence Agency's program to collect information from captured al Qaeda leaders. "The president will not accept something that shuts the program down," Mr. Snow said.

In the House, some Republicans are concerned about the White House approach, just as some have objected to another administration priority -- getting broader authority to conduct warrantless surveillance. During the closed-door meeting, Rep. Steve Buyer of Indiana, a former military lawyer, cited an issue top uniformed lawyers raised: Mr. Bush's plan would permit the use of classified evidence, but doesn't require it be shared with the accused. "I said, 'You listen to your commanders in the field. Please listen to your legal commanders,'" Mr. Buyer said in an interview.

The Senate bill wouldn't allow use of classified evidence unless it can be shared with the accused. But for the Senate bill's sponsors -- Sens. John Warner (R., Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) -- the most intractable difference has been the administration's proposal to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions. The sponsors said they worry the U.S. would lose credibility when trying to argue for the safety or release of troops taken prisoner in future conflicts.

CIA Director Michael Hayden wrote in a memo to his staff that in meetings with Congress, "I did not ask them to back away from our nation's commitment to Geneva." But Common Article Three, the relevant provision, is "general and vague," he said. Mr. Hayden said Congress should "help define our responsibilities" so the CIA "can judge the appropriateness of any procedures" it might use.

DOJ_NMG_0063464

Former Secretary of State Colin Powell wrote to Mr. McCain Wednesday, supporting the senator's position. Supporters of the administration's position circulated their own letter, sent to Congress by top military lawyers. The letter said they "do not object" to Mr. Bush's proposal on the Geneva Conventions.

Senators Defy Bush On Terror Measure (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

A Senate committee rebuffed the personal entreaties of President Bush yesterday, rejecting his proposed strategies for interrogating and trying enemy combatants and approving alternative legislation that he has strenuously opposed.

The bipartisan vote sets up a legislative showdown on an issue that GOP strategists had hoped would unite their party and serve as a cudgel against Democrats in the Nov. 7 elections. Instead, Bush and congressional Republican leaders are at loggerheads with a dissident group led by Sen. John McCain (R), who says the president's approach would jeopardize the safety of U.S. troops and intelligence operatives.

Despite heavy lobbying by Bush, who visited the Capitol yesterday, and Vice President Cheney, who was there Tuesday, McCain and his allies held fast. Even former secretary of state Colin L. Powell weighed in on McCain's side.

Moments after the Armed Services Committee voted 15 to 9 to endorse McCain's alternative bill, the Arizona senator lashed out at CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, who had also lobbied lawmakers personally.

McCain told reporters that Hayden wants Congress to give the CIA a virtually free hand to treat detainees as it wishes so that he and his agents will be immunized against accusations of unlawful conduct. "He's trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation," McCain said. The senator noted that other nations would be more likely to abuse U.S. captives if Americans appeared to sanction such conduct.

A CIA spokesman said Hayden "wants to protect the people who work for him" and who take risks to "help keep all Americans safe."

The committee action puts McCain and his allies on a collision course with the administration, whose supporters hope to change the bill in the full Senate, and with the House, which is expected to approve the president's bill next week.

With virtually all Senate Democrats likely to back McCain, he appears to have enough Republican support -- for now, at least -- to fend off amendments on the Senate floor and to block passage of the House version if it emerges from a conference committee.

Congress is scheduled to adjourn in two weeks, and lawmakers said they will be hard pressed to resolve the matter before the elections.

The disagreement centers mainly on how to square the CIA's techniques with the Geneva Conventions, which say wartime detainees must be "treated humanely." The administration bill says the United States complies with the conventions as long as interrogators abide by a 2005 law barring "cruel, inhuman, or degrading" treatment of captives.

McCain and his chief Republican allies on the Senate committee, Chairman John W. Warner (Va.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), say that this requirement is too narrow and that the United States should not try to limit its obligations under the Geneva Conventions. Instead, they want CIA officers to abide by the common understanding of the treaty's meaning, including a ban on "outrages upon personal dignity."

Bush's bill would also allow alleged enemy combatants to be convicted by military commissions relying on classified information not shared with the suspects. The McCain-backed measure would make the exclusion of classified information more difficult, and it states in general terms that defendants have the right to examine and respond to any evidence directly related to guilt or innocence.

Joining McCain, Warner and Graham in voting for their bill yesterday were Republican Sen. Susan Collins of Maine and all of the committee's Democrats.

The dispute has fractured the GOP establishment. Powell and numerous retired military officers wrote letters supporting McCain's position, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other administration officials weighed in on Bush's behalf. The president made a rare visit to Capitol Hill yesterday to rally House Republicans and thank the House Armed Services Committee for overwhelmingly approving legislation that mirrored his position.

"The most important job of government is to protect the homeland, and yesterday they advanced an important piece of legislation to do just that," Bush told reporters. "I'll continue to work with members of the Congress to get good legislation so we can do our duty."

White House officials released a letter from senior Pentagon uniformed lawyers, who said they "do not object" to two key sections of the administration-backed bill that would reinterpret U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions and protect U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0063465

intelligence agents from war crimes prosecutions. They then summoned senators from the Armed Services and intelligence committees to an afternoon meeting with Rice and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. Seven attended, sources said.

The Pentagon letter immediately generated controversy. Senior judge advocates general had publicly questioned many aspects of the administration's position, especially any reinterpreting of the Geneva Conventions. The White House and GOP lawmakers seized on what appeared to be a change of heart to say that they now have military lawyers on their side.

But the letter was signed only after an extraordinary round of negotiations Wednesday between the judge advocates and William J. Haynes II, the Defense Department's general counsel, according to Republican opponents of Bush's proposal. The military lawyers refused to sign a letter of endorsement. But after hours of cajoling, they assented to write that they "do not object," according to three Senate GOP sources who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were divulging private negotiations.

Graham, a former Air Force judge advocate general, promised to summon the lawyers to a committee hearing and to ask for an explanation of the circumstances surrounding the letter.

One of the military lawyers, Air Force Maj. Gen. Charles J. Dunlap Jr., reiterated yesterday that he still has reservations about the administration's proposal, just not in the areas discussed in the letter. He said he was not forced to sign.

"I made my several personal objections to the administration's proposal clear in my [House] testimony," Dunlap said. "This matter was not among them."

White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters yesterday that Bush "will not accept something that prevents the [CIA detention] program from going forward." At a feisty briefing, Snow said critics have misconstrued the administration's intent, which he said is to define the Geneva Conventions' ban on cruel and inhumane treatment, not to undermine it.

"Somehow I think there's this construct in people's minds that we want to restore the rack and start getting people screaming, having their bones crunching," Snow said. "And that's not at all what this is about."

He said Powell did not discuss the issue with the White House before releasing his letter.

"They don't understand what we're trying to do here," he said of Powell and retired Army Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., who wrote a similar letter. Asked if Powell is "confused," Snow said, "Yes."

McCain, who was tortured as a Vietnam War prisoner, dismissed similar comments in the committee session, saying Powell knew exactly what he was doing.

Rebuff For Bush On Terror Trials In A Senate Test (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The Senate Armed Services Committee defied President Bush on Thursday, with four Republicans joining Democrats in approving a plan for the trial and interrogation of terrorism suspects that the White House has rejected as unacceptable.

The Republican rebellion was led by Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the committee chairman, with backing from Senators John McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Susan Collins of Maine.

The White House had said their legislation would leave the United States no option but to shut down a C.I.A. program to interrogate high-level terrorism suspects.

The vote came on a frantic day of Republican infighting and despite an all-out effort by the White House to win support for its own approach, which provides far fewer protections for detainees.

Mr. Bush traveled to Capitol Hill with Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday morning. The administration also released a brief letter in which the top lawyers for the military branches said they found no legal objection to the White House proposal to redefine a key provision of the Geneva Conventions.

But Colin L. Powell, Mr. Bush's former secretary of state, sided with the senators, saying in a letter that the president's plan to redefine the Geneva Conventions would encourage the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," and "put our own troops at risk."

Mr. Powell's statement amounted to a rare public breach with the White House he served, but reflected his strong opposition while in office to the administration's assertions, beginning shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, that the war against Al Qaeda should not be bound by the Geneva Conventions.

The White House made clear that it would fight on despite the Republican rebellion, with Mr. Bush saying he would "resist any bill'' that did not provide a legal basis for the C.I.A. to continue to employ what he has called "alternative interrogation practices'' for terrorism suspects.

The main dispute between the White House and the Senate Republicans revolves around a provision known as Common Article 3, which prohibits inhumane treatment of combatants seized in wartime. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the C.I.A. director, has argued that the article's prohibition against "outrages upon personal dignity" must be clarified so that troops and C.I.A. personnel know what is permissible in the interrogation of terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0063466

But Senators Warner, McCain and Graham say the Bush proposal would send a signal that the United States has abandoned its commitment to human rights, and invite other nations to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions as they see fit, eliminating protections for American troops seized in future conflicts.

The senators also dismissed the letter from the military lawyers, saying they had questions about whether it amounted to an authentic endorsement of the White House proposal. They said they put more weight on extensive public testimony in which the lawyers raised doubts about the Bush plan.

Some military officials briefed on the military lawyers' position also disputed the notion that the lawyers had reversed course. They said the lawyers agreed to sign a letter at a meeting on Wednesday after discussing the language over several hours.

The lawyers would agree only to say that they could not find anything illegal about the specific issue of amending Common Article 3, the defense officials said, but still do not endorse several points in the administration's approach.

The senators say their bill will protect the C.I.A. by refining the war crimes act, which criminalizes violations of Common Article 3, to specifically enumerate what violations constitute war crimes.

"What General Hayden wants us to do is immunize him not from liability but from criticism," Mr. McCain said after the vote, "because if one of his techniques is made public and he gets criticized, then he can say, 'Well, Congress told me to do it.' He's trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation."

The other chief dispute concerns the evidence admitted at trial. The Bush plan would allow hearsay and evidence obtained by coercion if it is considered reliable, while the Senate proposal would exclude any testimony obtained by "cruel inhuman, or degrading treatment."

The White House would bar the suspect from seeing classified evidence shown to the jury weighing his case; the senators say that this amounts to a secret trial, and that the suspect must be allowed to see anything the jury sees. They offered a compromise under which a judge would substitute a declassified summary of the evidence.

The committee vote was 15 to 9, with all Democrats joining the four Republicans. The measure now goes to the Senate floor, where Senators Warner, Graham and McCain believe they have a majority made up of Democrats and as many as a half-dozen other Republicans.

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, warned the administration against taking on Mr. McCain, a former prisoner of war.

"They're trying to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions,'' Mr. Levin said, "but the best expert on that is somebody who has very personal experience with those who violate Geneva, and that's Senator McCain."

The situation in the House is very different, with that chamber on track to approve the measure backed by the White House.

"We'll do what the president wants," said Representative Duncan Hunter of California, the Republican who is chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

The White House and Republicans on either side of the issue maneuvered furiously for advantage all day.

As the Senate Armed Services Committee met to vote on its alternative to the president's legislation, an anonymous Republican invoked a Senate rule to stop it from meeting, forcing Mr. Warner to go to the Senate floor to ask that the hold be lifted. He then praised the Democrats for being "totally cooperative" on the issue, a pointed rebuke to members of his own party who have been pushing the White House view. And he prevailed upon Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican leader, to persuade the senator calling for the hold to lift it.

The White House must now decide whether to press its allies in the Senate to amend the bill on the floor, or to step back and wait until the bill passes and the House and Senate work out differences in conference.

The bill may face amendment in any case. Some Democrats object to a provision that would block detainees from challenging their detention in court. More than two dozen retired federal judges sent a letter to Congress arguing that such a provision would lead to unlawful permanent detention, and defy Supreme Court precedent.

Gonzales Backs Detainee Interrogation Tactics (MCT)

By Scott Canon, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - As Congress dealt a rebuke Thursday to President Bush's national security agenda, his attorney general defended the administration's efforts to deal with captured terror suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0063467

Of critics concerned about international treaties or freedoms protected by the U.S. Constitution, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said they misunderstand the legalities - some never clearly defined - of dealing with an unconventional foe that plays by no rules.

Judicial rejections of some administration policies have muddied the legal landscape and made it unclear how the government can detain, interrogate and prosecute terror suspects, he said.

"We do need some clarity," Gonzales told the editorial board of The Kansas City Star.

A U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June held that the Bush administration's military tribunals to try terror detainees violated U.S. law and the Geneva Conventions. Gonzales said that that decision and continuing legal challenges have created confusion about what the government can and can't do. The court said that using military tribunals were illegal because they don't provide safeguards that civilian or military courts require.

Now Congress is considering competing measures. A proposal put forward by Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina would set some standards governing treatment of detainees that would be consistent with international law. That bill was approved Thursday in committee. Bush's proposal is expected to emerge from the House next week.

Gonzales said the U.S. courts and Congress have yet to interpret the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which sets a standard of treatment for prisoners of war. He voiced concern that that an adverse ruling could damage efforts to interrogate "terrorists who do not fight by the standards of war." And he suggested that rejection of an administration bill sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, giving interrogators more leeway might hurt efforts to fight terrorism.

"Congress may decide we don't want to gather any more evidence," the attorney general said.

He said that "just like in every other war," the American people will have to trust the government to protect the rights of those in custody while pursuing justice in secret. Pressed on how long extraordinary measures - for instance, the imprisonment of suspects without the filing of charges_might continue, he said they would last at least until the pursuit of al-Qaida and its accomplices has come to an end.

"First of all this is a real war," he said, drawing a distinction between the war on terror and "the war on drugs or the war on poverty or something like that. It's like the Cold War. . . . At some point this conflict is going to be over. But today it is not over."

Pressed about interrogation techniques that have brought the administration criticism from human-rights groups - like waterboarding, which simulates drowning - Gonzales would neither confirm nor deny the use of such methods, which some people call torture.

"I don't talk about specific methods of questioning" because doing so would prepare suspects to resist them, he said.

He said protections are in place for enemy combatants held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Retired Federal Judges Oppose Bush (AP-Y)

AP, September 14, 2006

Nine retired federal judges accused the Bush administration and Congress of trying to deprive detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, of the most basic legal right.

Legislation under debate on Capitol Hill would strip federal courts of the power to hear detainees' challenges of their treatment and indefinite detention at the Guantanamo Bay.

"Depriving the courts of habeas jurisdiction will jeopardize the judiciary's ability to ensure that executive detentions are not grounded on torture or other abuse," the nine wrote Thursday in a letter to Congress.

Congress and the Bush administration would be skating "on thin constitutional ice" in depriving courts of their power to hear Guantanamo detainees, the letter added.

The retired judges said federal courts have long balanced the rights of defendants against the need to protect classified information vital to the nation's security.

Most of the attention in the debate over detainee rights at Guantanamo Bay has focused on how to conduct military commission trials that meet constitutional standards. Plans call for trying a few detainees, while the remainder, more than 450 in all, remain in indefinite detention.

By focusing on military commissions, the White House and Congress "have chosen to address the tail rather than the dog, and the result is that the Constitution is getting bitten," Eric M. Freedman said in an interview. He is a Hofstra University professor of constitutional law and a consultant to the legal team representing the Guantanamo detainees.

The nine retirees who signed the letter are appeals court judges John Gibbons, Shirley Hufstedler, Nathaniel Jones, Timothy Lewis, William Norris, George Pratt, Lee Sarokin, Patricia Wald and U.S. District Judge William Sessions.

DOJ_NMG_0063468

Poll Finds Support For Iran Strike (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Voters talk tough on Iran's nuclear program.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1, 54% say U.S. should strike militarily if necessary to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Support reaches 62% if U.S. joins international coalition.

Military officials warn a successful strike might only set back Iran's program, not halt it, and prompt Iranian retaliation in Iraq. But "even people who are for troop withdrawals" from Iraq back military action through a coalition, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts Journal/NBC survey with Republican Bill McInturff.

Though Independents and Republicans would back unilateral strike, Democrats are opposed.

Democratic leaders remain elusive foils for Republican barbs.

Seven in 10 voters don't know top Senate Democrat Reid or have no strong feelings about him; six in 10 say the same of House leader Pelosi, who Republican strategists call out of touch with mainstream. House Speaker Hastert is similarly anonymous.

IN THE POLLS

2 · WSJ/NBC News poll3

· Bush's approval ratings4

Senate Majority Leader and 2008 hopeful Frist has better name recognition but split ratings, 21% positive and 23% negative. Voters cite deficit and Iraq policy as biggest fears if Republicans keep control of Congress, gridlock and premature Iraq withdrawal if Democrats take over.

Voters want Wal-Mart to face tougher government oversight.

After criticism from unions and liberal activists, 52% say companies like Wal-Mart "should be reviewed and regulated more" over adequacy of health and pension benefits. That includes majorities of women, Southerners, and rural voters; even 41% of conservatives agree.

By 50% to 45%, voters earning more than $75,000 a year say companies should set their own standards. The Midwest is most sympathetic to that view. Two-thirds of all voters say they've patronized the retailer in the last month.

Overall, Wal-Mart is rated positively by 45%-31%, though Target enjoys stronger image at 51%-10%.

DEMOCRATIC COMRADES: Kerry taps list of three million donors to boost fellow veteran-politicians. An email appeal yields more than $200,000 in 72 hours for Congressional candidates in New York, Pennsylvania and California. By 77%-17%, voters who backed Kerry two years ago favor reducing troops in Iraq.

DIPLOMAT IN CHIEF? Bush and Rice visit U.N. next week to prod allies for sanctions on Iran. Some 31% of voters rate Bush highly as "a world leader," down from 36% a year ago and 49% before the Iraq war.

TAX TACTIC: Republicans weigh new gambit for cutting estate taxes. They might add measure to government funding resolution before leaving Washington for October campaigning. Among voters earning $30,000 or less, just one-third approve Bush's handling of the economy and back Republicans for Congress.

NOT COMPLAINING: Despite controversy over imprisonment and interrogation of detainees, 54% of voters credit Bush administration with "the right course," while only 34% say administration has "gone too far." But by 51%-41%, voters oppose terror trials where suspects couldn't attend or view evidence.

Voters fault corporations, more than Washington, for widening income inequality.

Three in ten blame "excessive salaries and bonuses" for gap between highest-income workers and others. Another 26% say overseas competition, twice the 12% who cite Bush administration and Congress.

Tracking Democratic rhetoric, voters show increasing concern about the gap; one in four call it America's biggest economic problem, virtually matching the share who say energy costs. In international economic speech, Treasury Secretary Paulson says narrowing disparities is "the responsibility of all nations."

By 47%-36%, voters rate Bush poorly for "being compassionate enough to understand average people."

MINOR MEMOS: State whips Pentagon in battle of bureaucratic chiefs; Rice's positive rating rises to 55% from 48% in May 2004, while Rumsfeld's falls to 31% from 39%. Cheney's 50% negative rating exceeds that of both administration colleagues.

A Defining Moment For America (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063469

PRESIDENT BUSH rarely visits Congress. So it was a measure of his painfully skewed priorities that Mr. Bush made the unaccustomed trip yesterday to seek legislative permission for the CIA to make people disappear into secret prisons and have information extracted from them by means he dare not describe publicly.

Of course, Mr. Bush didn't come out and say he's lobbying for torture. Instead he refers to "an alternative set of procedures" for interrogation. But the administration no longer conceals what it wants. It wants authorization for the CIA to hide detainees in overseas prisons where even the International Committee of the Red Cross won't have access. It wants permission to interrogate those detainees with abusive practices that in the past have included induced hypothermia and "waterboarding," or simulated drowning. And it wants the right to try such detainees, and perhaps sentence them to death, on the basis of evidence that the defendants cannot see and that may have been extracted during those abusive interrogation sessions.

There's no question that the United States is facing a dangerous foe that uses the foulest of methods. But a wide array of generals and others who should know argue that it is neither prudent nor useful for the United States to compromise its own values in response. "I continue to read and hear that we are facing a 'different enemy' in the war on terror," retired Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote in a letter to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) this week. "No matter how true that may be, inhumanity and cruelty are not new to warfare nor to enemies we have faced in the past. . . . Through those years, we held to our own values. We should continue to do so."

Another former chairman of the Joint Chiefs, and one more intimately familiar with the war on terrorism, also weighed in this week: "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," former general and secretary of state Colin L. Powell wrote to McCain. "To redefine Common Article 3 would add to those doubts."

Mr. Powell was referring to an article of the Geneva Conventions that prohibits cruel and degrading treatment of detainees. Mr. Bush, with support from most Republican congressional leaders, wants to redefine American obligations under the treaty. Three Republican senators -- John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee; Lindsey O. Graham of South Carolina; and Mr. McCain -- are bravely promoting an alternative measure that would allow terrorists to be questioned and tried without breaking faith with traditional U.S. values. The Armed Services Committee approved their bill yesterday and sent it to the Senate floor.

The doubts of which Mr. Powell spoke are impeding the U.S. war effort. A president who lobbies for torture feeds those doubts even if, as we hope, Congress denies him his request.

Stampeding Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

We'll find out in November how well the White House's be-very-afraid campaign has been working with voters. We already know how it's working in Congress. Stampeded by the fear of looking weak on terrorism, lawmakers are rushing to pass a bill demanded by the president that would have minimal impact on antiterrorist operations but could cause profound damage to justice and the American way.

Yesterday, the president himself went to Capitol Hill to lobby for his bill, which would give Congressional approval to the same sort of ad hoc military commissions that Mr. Bush created on his own authority after 9/11 and that the Supreme Court has already ruled unconstitutional. It would permit the use of coerced evidence, secret hearings and other horrific violations of American justice.

Legal experts within the military have been deeply opposed to the president's plan from the beginning, and have formed one of the most influential bulwarks against the administration's attempt to rewrite the rules to make its recent behavior retroactively legal. This week, the White House sank so low as to strong-arm the chief prosecutors for the four armed services into writing a letter to the House that seemed to endorse the president's position on two key issues. Congressional officials say those officers later told lawmakers that they did not want to sign the letter, which contradicts everything the prosecutors, dozens of their colleagues, former top commanders of the military and a series of federal judges have said in public.

The idea that the nation's chief executive is pressing so hard to undermine basic standards of justice is shocking. And any argument that these extreme methods would be used only against the most dangerous of international terrorists has been destroyed by the handling of hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, many of whom appear to have been scooped up in Afghanistan years ago with little attempt to verify any connection to terrorism, and now are in danger of lingering behind bars forever without a day in court.

To lend his lobbying an utterly false sense of urgency, President Bush announced last week that he had taken 14 dangerous terrorists from the secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons where he had been holding them for years and sent them to Guantánamo to stand trial. But none of the prisoners is going anywhere, and the current high-pressure timetable is related only to the election calendar.

The Geneva Conventions

DOJ_NMG_0063470

One section of the administration bill would put American soldiers in grave jeopardy by rewriting the Geneva Conventions, condoning the practice of hiding prisoners in secret cells, and permitting the continued use of interrogation methods that violate the Geneva Conventions at the C.I.A. prisons.

Mr. Bush has made it clear that he plans to continue operating the C.I.A. camps. And he wants Congress to collaborate by exempting the United States from a provision in the Geneva Conventions that prohibits "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment." Mr. Bush says this wording is too vague, but that's a dodge. What he really wants is Congressional authority to go on doing things to prisoners in C.I.A. jails that are clear violations of international rules.

He also wants Congress to rewrite the War Crimes Act, which makes it a crime to violate the Geneva Conventions. The administration's goal here is to avoid having C.I.A. interrogators, private contractors or the men who gave them their orders called to account for the immoral way the administration has run its terrorist detention centers.

The opposition to these provisions by legal scholars, military lawyers and a host of former top commanders of the armed forces has been overwhelming. In recent days, two former chairmen of the joint chiefs of staff, Colin L. Powell, and John W. Vessey, wrote to Senator John McCain urging him to go on fighting the White House. "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," General Powell wrote.

More than two dozen former military leaders and top Pentagon officials, from both parties, wrote to Senator John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, expressing "profound concern" about undermining the Geneva Conventions. Their objections involve a simple equation: The Conventions protect captured American soldiers. If America mistreats its prisoners, American soldiers are in danger of the same, or worse.

Defining the Enemy

Senators Warner, McCain and Lindsey Graham have formed a principled spine of resistance against their party's attempt to steamroller the White House legislation through Congress. But their own bill — the only competing proposal to emerge so far — shares some big problems with the president's. One is its scope. Both bills draw the definition of "unlawful enemy combatant" so broadly that it could cover almost anyone that a particular administration decides is a threat, remove him from the judicial system and subject him to a military trial.

The law should cover actual terrorists and those who engage in hostilities against American forces outside an army or organized resistance group. But the White House bill also includes anyone who gives "material support" to a terrorist group or anyone affiliated with a terrorist group. Legal experts fear this definition could cover people who, for example, contribute to charities without knowing they support terrorist groups, or that are not identified as terrorist fronts until later. It could be used to arrest a legal resident of the United States and put him before a military commission.

It also could be used to capture foreign citizens in their native countries, or anywhere else, a concern that America's allies have raised repeatedly. This is not just a theoretical problem. This sort of thing has already happened.

Stripping the Courts of Power

The White House wants to strip the federal courts of any power to review the detentions of the prisoners in Guantánamo Bay. This provision has no real bearing on the handful of genuine terrorists who were recently shipped there from abroad. Their cases are likely to be brought before military commissions, whose judgments could be appealed to higher courts, including the Supreme Court. But it has a profound impact on the hundreds of others at Guantánamo Bay. Many of them, perhaps the majority, committed minor offenses, if any. The administration has no intention of trying them, and wants to prevent them from appealing for help in court.

This week, nine current and former federal judges, including a former F.B.I. director appointed by Ronald Reagan, begged Congress not to give in to White House pressure on this point. "For 200 years, the federal judiciary has maintained Chief Justice Marshall's solemn admonition that ours is a government of laws, and not of men," their letter said. "The proposed legislation imperils this proud history."

.

The nation is in this hideous mess because Mr. Bush ignored the advice of people like this when he tried to set up prison camps beyond the reach of the law. It's hard to believe their warnings will be ignored again, but the signs are ominous. Last week, the military's top lawyers told the House Armed Services Committee that they strongly opposed the rules of evidence and other due-process clauses in the White House's bill. The committee just went ahead and passed it anyway. Only eight of the 28 Democratic members had the courage to vote "no."

Bill Frist, the majority leader, has already introduced the horrible White House bill on the Senate floor. Senators Warner, McCain and Graham have come up with a serious alternative, and they deserve enormous credit for standing up to Mr. Bush's fearmongering — something many Democrats seem too frightened to do. (It was good to see the Senate Armed Services Committee Democrats join them in rejecting the president's bill yesterday.)

DOJ_NMG_0063471

But their bill still has serious shortcomings, and should not be rushed through Congress in the current atmosphere, which has very little to do with stopping terrorists and everything to do with winning seats in November.

There is no urgency. Mr. Bush could have tried the 14 new inmates of Guantánamo Bay at any time if he had just done it legally. It's hard to imagine that anyone in the White House is really worried about a swift resolution of their cases. Many members of Congress who succumb to the strong-arming will know, in their hearts, that they were doing the wrong thing out of fear for their political futures. Perhaps the voters will not judge them harshly this fall. But history will.

No Wonder Some Seek Terrorism At The Movies (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

"An event of this consequence is very hard to understand." The event former Congressman Lee Hamilton was describing earlier this week is September 11, 2001. But of course September 11 itself is not hard to understand. They came, they killed.

For many people this is sufficient understanding of 9/11. They believe the job now is simple: Resist and stop more of their killing. However, unlike the proponents of apocalyptic Islam, most normal people in time seek a degree of understanding, even of an enemy who fights by the rules of pre-civilization. Mr. Hamilton, the vice chairman of the 9/11 Commission, was commenting on ABC's now-controversial movie, "The Path to 9/11." The hard-to-understand path to which Mr. Hamilton alluded is obviously not a single event but the origins and organization of the Islamic terrorist movement that began years back and besets the U.S. and the world today.

One can only agree with Mr. Hamilton. The war on terror is more complex, nuanced and indeed more interesting than the general public has been given to believe.

For instance, one oft-cited benchmark of its progress is the status of Osama bin Laden. That he is presumably still alive and at large is taken to mean that President Bush's offensive against the post-9/11 terrorists has "failed," as John Kerry noted this week on the eve of September 11. The Bush administration, Mr. Kerry told CNN, "failed to capture and kill Osama bin Laden when they had him in the mountains of Tora Bora. And that's why we are more threatened today with an al Qaeda that has reconstituted itself in some 65 countries."

This is the Alien vs. Predator model of fighting terror. Bin Laden himself has picked up on the tendency of our political culture to reduce complexity to melodrama. For 9/11, al Qaeda released a propaganda documentary on al-Jazeera this week, depicting masked men training, while Bin Laden walks among them. The New York Times described bin Laden in the 9/11 tape as "looking almost regal."

As to the war in Iraq, daily readers of first-line Internet news services such as Yahoo News know that this event has been reduced simply to body-count headlines. Yahoo News's homepage at mid-day Wednesday: "Bombings, mortar attacks kill 39 in Iraq."

If this is the available public context, then serious people have to assemble an understanding of terror as best they can. It isn't easy. In his comment on the ABC movie, Lee Hamilton said that "news and entertainment are getting dangerously intertwined." But given the alternative, it makes sense to me if people seek a better sense of the obsessions and compulsions inside Islamic terrorism in movies such as "United 93" or ABC's remarkable "The Path to 9/11."

The narcissistic whining of the Clinton coterie over how they're reflected in "The Path to 9/11" was an irrelevant diversion from its real value. The word "Clinton" isn't heard in the film's first 90 minutes, which recreates with startling realism the thunderous basement bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993, an explosion stunning to many of us seated at our desks at the Journal's offices across the street that day.

Screenwriter Cyrus Nowrasteh and director David L. Cunningham deserve thanks not obloquy for trying to give us a palpable feel for the terrorist's terrain -- Pakistan, Afghanistan, Brooklyn -- the world of Ramzi Yousef, the 1993 bomber, and his uncle Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, or "KSM," identified in the 9/11 Commission Report as the main architect of September 11 and some 3,000 deaths.

KSM is one of the 14 al Qaeda captives whom President Bush revealed last week had been transferred from secret CIA prisons to Guantanamo to await trial. Congress, in the wake of the Hamdan decision, is now arguing over which panoply of legal rights given to accused U.S. soldiers at court martial will be extended to these prisoners if tried by a military commission.

Read through the 14 Guantanamo detainee biographies posted on the White House Web site, and one gets a rare feel for the events that distinguish the lives of these individuals from the daily goals of everyone else in the world -- lives simply dedicated to the mass murder of innocents, and not just in lower Manhattan. Indeed, the narrator of Bin Laden's 9/11 tape conveys their milieu: "Planning for September 11 did not take place behind computer monitors or radar screens . . . but was surrounded with divine protection in an atmosphere brimming with brotherliness . . . and love for sacrificing life."

DOJ_NMG_0063472

Here are some of the brothers, now at Guantanamo. Hambali: Indonesian. Learned radical Islam in Malaysia. Co-planned Bali resort bombing (200 killed); financed Jakarta Marriott bombing; tried to assassinate Philippine ambassador; involved in bombing 30 Indonesian churches on Christmas eve. Ahmed Khalfan Ghailani: Tanzanian-born forger. Complicit in 1998 East Africa embassy bombings (well-depicted in "The Path to 9/11"). He was also Osama's cook. Mohammed Nazir Bin Lep, aka, Lillie: Architecture degree, Polytechnic University Malaysia; later studied bombmaking with Dr. Azahari bin Husin (deceased). Hoped to achieve martyrdom in post-9/11 attack on Los Angeles. Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri. Planned 2002 bombing of USS Cole. Involved in planned attacks in Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Qatar, the Strait of Hormuz, the Strait of Gibraltar and Port of Dubai.

Read all 14 of these histories devoted to "sacrificing life" to put in context the denunciations of warrantless wiretaps and the Swift financial monitoring program.

These and the others await the divine protections of American law that Senators Warner and Graham wish to give them. Republicans are also arguing among themselves over the degree of access to classified intelligence this group should receive at trial. Democrats, other than saying they'll support the more liberal version, are contributing almost nothing to the new system. If a Democrat wins the White House in 2008, we may assume she or he will receive, as payback, a similar level of limp support from the GOP in the same war on terror.

Say this for the Guantanamo 14: They have unity of purpose. Long term, our disunity could prove to be a big advantage to them.

Federal Judge Refuses To Reinstate Key Padilla Terrorism Charge (FLSUNSEN/AP)

By Curt Anderson, The Associated Press

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 15, 2006

MIAMI -- A federal judge refused Thursday to reinstate a key terrorism charge in the case against alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla and two other defendants, raising the possibility of delays in their trial if prosecutors appeal the ruling.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke ruled in August that a charge of conspiracy to ``murder, kidnap and maim" people overseas must be dismissed because it duplicated other charges in the same indictment. Cooke said at a hearing Thursday that she stands by that decision.

``I do not think I am in error in this case," Cooke said. ``These are so similar that a reasonable jury could be confused." The dismissed charge is important because it is the only one in the indictment that carries a potential life sentence.

Padilla and the others remain charged with two terrorism material support counts, but a life sentence is only possible if prosecutors can prove that support conspiracy led directly to someone's death.

Prosecutors are likely to ask the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to review Cooke's decision, which could delay the planned Jan. 22 trial date. Cooke asked prosecutors to expedite any appeal in an effort to stay on schedule.

Padilla, a 35-year-old former Chicago gang member and convert to Islam, is charged along with his co-defendants with being part of a North American support cell for violent Muslim extremists worldwide. Padilla was arrested in 2002 and held for 3½ years as an enemy combatant, initially for what U.S. officials called a plot to detonate a radioactive ``dirty bomb" inside the United States.

He was added late last year to an existing Miami terrorism case amid a high-level legal battle over whether President Bush had constitutional authority to hold him without charge during wartime. The Miami indictment does not mention the ``dirty bomb" allegations, claiming only charging that Padilla was an al-Qaida recruit and attended a training camp in Afghanistan.

On the dismissed conspiracy charge, prosecutors argued that it did not duplicate a second, material-support conspiracy charge in the indictment against Padilla and co-defendants Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi. Even if it did, prosecutors said the time to deal with that issue was at sentencing, if they are convicted.

``All the court has to do is not punish the defendants twice," assistant U.S. attorney Brian Frazier said.

But defense lawyers disagreed, saying that multiple charges have psychological impact on jurors by making a defendant appear more guilty. And, they said, jurors presented with long indictments sometimes will choose to compromise by acquitting on some charges and convicting on others.

``That creates, in the minds of the jury, a bias," said Jeanne Baker, one of Hassoun's attorneys.

In siding with the defense, Cooke found that prosecuting all three terrorism charges would violate the Constitution's ban against double jeopardy, or forcing a defendant to face the same charges twice.

In other rulings, Cooke:

--Ordered the government to turn over medical records from Padilla's military custody. Defense lawyers want to see if Padilla was given any drugs that might raise questions about his competency or whether there was any misconduct committed by interrogators.

DOJ_NMG_0063473

--Refused a defense request for a list of people who attended an al-Qaida camp at the same time Padilla allegedly did in 2000. The judge said that information was exempt from disclosure because it was internal investigative material.

--Rejected for similar reasons a defense request for identities of others who filled out al-Qaida applications that were found along with one prosecutors say was Padilla's in a binder in Afghanistan. Prosecutors intend to call as a witness a member of the so-called ``Lackawanna Six'' cell in upstate New York to testify that he filled out a similar form.

--Allowed Hassoun's wife to testify via video hookup from Beirut, Lebanon, about the actions FBI agents took before searching their home in suburban Sunrise in 2002. Defense lawyers say she fears arrest if she and her three children return to the U.S. Hassoun, who is allegedly Padilla's recruiter, claims the FBI search was illegal and that evidence seized should be thrown out.

Judge Orders Government To Share Medical Records Of Terror Suspect Jose Padilla (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 15, 2006

A federal judge in Miami ordered prosecutors Thursday to turn over medical records for accused al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla, a move that could reveal details of his treatment during 31/2 years in military custody.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke included in her ruling all records relating to physical and mental evaluations of Padilla or medication taken by or administered to Padilla while held as an enemy combatant in a South Carolina Navy brig.

Defense attorneys said they intend to use the records to argue the government engaged in unconstitutional conduct by interrogating the former Broward County resident and imprisoning him for years without giving him access to some legal rights.

"The government's interrogation strategies and isolation techniques with regard to Mr. Padilla during his incarceration at the Brig are at the outer limits of civilized propriety," the attorneys stated in a court brief. "The government should not be able to shield themselves from disclosure."

After a brief but feisty exchange, Cooke rejected government arguments that the sensitive records have no relevance to the criminal charges against Padilla. She also dismissed admonitions in the government's legal briefs that the matter should be left to the discretion of the executive branch because of profound national security concerns related to Padilla's detention.

"These are his records," she said.

"No, these are the government's records, your honor," retorted attorney John Drennan of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Padilla, 35, was arrested in May 2002 at O'Hare International Airport and later transferred to military custody on suspicion he intended to carry out a terror attack on U.S. soil.

His treatment sparked one of the biggest controversies in the Bush administration's war on terror. Critics charged the president had abused his power by locking up Padilla, who is a U.S. citizen, without charges.

In 2005, as the U.S. Supreme Court considered taking up a case challenging Padilla's detention, the government switched course, adding him to an ongoing criminal case in Miami. He is charged with participating in a North American terror cell and traveling to the Middle East to receive military training.

It is not clear precisely what the medical records could reveal about Padilla's treatment or whether their contents will be made public.

Padilla's attorneys said they would look for information related to "whether the government engaged in outrageous misconduct," including evidence related to "the government's employment of psychological pressure through conditions of confinement and interrogation."

Prosecutors called Padilla's request "a thinly veiled fishing expedition" for records that "have nothing to say about whether Padilla committed the offenses charged in the indictment."

Miami criminal defense lawyer David O. Markus said the government's position "doesn't pass the smell test."

"The real question is not why Padilla would want his own records, but what is the government afraid of?" Markus said.

Cooke denied a separate request from defense attorneys Thursday for evidence related to accusations that Padilla attended an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. She also stood by her August ruling dismissing one of the main charges against Padilla and his co-defendants because it duplicated allegations in other counts.

The U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment on whether the rulings would be appealed.

'Alternative' CIA Tactics Complicate Padilla Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

When alleged Al Qaeda sympathizer Jose Padilla landed in Chicago in May 2002, he was met by federal agents armed with a warrant authorizing them to take him into custody.

To obtain their warrant, the agents told a federal judge that two weeks earlier a confidential source had revealed that Mr. Padilla was plotting to build and detonate a radiological "dirty" bomb in the United States.

What the agents did not tell the judge is that their "confidential source" was not speaking voluntarily. His information had been obtained in controversial interrogation sessions at a secret Central Intelligence Agency prison overseas.

The confidential source was a man named Zayn Abu Zubaydah, the same individual identified last week by President Bush as the first Al Qaeda suspect subjected to harsh interrogation tactics by US officials.

"We knew that Zubaydah had more information that could save innocent lives, but he stopped talking," the president said in a speech on Sept. 6. "So the CIA used an alternative set of procedures."

In 2002, the agency's pressing goal was intelligence-gathering to disrupt possible terror attacks rather than a law-enforcement operation to gather evidence that might be used against American citizens in American courts. But now, four years later, the information from those harsh interrogation sessions conducted by or at the behest of the CIA is playing an important role in government efforts to convict Padilla in a terror conspiracy case in Miami.

The case is emerging as a major test of whether such intelligence information is admissible in US courts. And it highlights the difficult debate over military commissions currently under way in Congress, which is wrestling with how best to protect national security while also preserving America's tradition of due process and fair trials.

In a series of pretrial motions, Padilla's lawyers argue that information from Mr. Abu Zubaydah and another confidential source used to justify the May 2002 warrant was the product of torture. They say information obtained through torture cannot be used in court and that any evidence seized from Padilla during his Chicago arrest must be excluded from use at his trial. Padilla fails in bid to exclude evidence

Last week, one day before Mr. Bush publicly acknowledged the secret CIA prisons and interrogations, a federal magistrate judge in Miami rejected Padilla's arguments.

US Magistrate Judge Stephen Brown ruled that defense attorneys had failed to offer enough proof concerning the identity and treatment of the confidential sources the government used to justify the warrant.

In addition, Judge Brown ruled that even if the information the confidential sources provided was the product of torture, defense lawyers had presented no evidence that the FBI agent who prepared the warrant application was aware that they had been tortured. Short of a deliberate effort by that agent to intentionally mislead the court, the defense motion must be denied, the magistrate judge ruled.

Padilla's lawyer, Andrew Patel, says the decision is being appealed to US District Judge Marcia Cooke, the trial judge in the Padilla case. He declined any further comment on the case.

In an earlier brief, Mr. Patel wrote: "The government's claim of ignorance appears either to be incredible or the product of conscious avoidance."

In his speech, Bush justified the harsh tactics as essential to prevent terror attacks. But he also asked Congress to formulate special rules so that Abu Zubaydah and 13 other individuals could be tried by military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, despite their harsh treatment while in CIA custody.

The special provisions are necessary, in part, because the US criminal justice system excludes coerced statements as too unreliable to present in court. There is also a blanket ban on information obtained through torture.

Bush insists that torture was not used in the CIA operations. But he declined to identify the specific interrogation practices.

Legal experts say that procedures such as simulated drowning, induced hypothermia, and noise bombardment are highly coercive and can lead subjects to say whatever they think will help stop the harsh treatment. Human rights experts say these kinds of techniques can amount to torture. Congress debates coercive tactics

The president's public disclosure has prompted a debate in Congress over whether to endorse the CIA's "alternative" interrogation tactics. But Bush is also asking lawmakers to grant retroactive legal immunity to US interrogators who engaged in or were present during these practices. The request is being made despite the president's assurance that they are legal and do not amount to torture.

The government has never acknowledged the identities of the two sources used for the 2002 warrant. Defense lawyers and other analysts identified them by cross-referencing the unique information the sources provided to the government with public sources and documents that matched the same information. In addition to Abu Zubaydah, defense lawyers say the second source used to obtain the Padilla warrant was an Ethiopian named Binyam Mohammed.

Mr. Mohammed is one of 10 individuals being held at Guantánamo Bay who had been facing war-crimes conspiracy charges before the military commission process was struck down by the Supreme Court. Because of those charges, he has been afforded access to a lawyer.

According to an affidavit signed by Patel, Mohammed was being held in Pakistan at the time the Padilla warrant application was prepared. US agents wanted incriminating information about Padilla. The affidavit says Mohammed was hung on a wall with a leather strap around his wrists for a week by his Pakistani jailers. He was beaten with a leather strap, and was questioned with a loaded gun pressing into his chest, the affidavit says.

DOJ_NMG_0063475

It says he was questioned by four individuals who identified themselves as agents of the FBI. The affidavit adds that Mohammed says he is sure that if he sees them again or sees their photos he will be able to identify them.

Mohammed has told lawyers that US agents were not happy with his level of cooperation against Padilla and sent him from Pakistan to Morocco. There, according to an Amnesty International report, Moroccan interrogators used a razor blade to make 20 to 30 small cuts on his genitals. This was done once a month for 18 months, the report says. Eventually, Mohammed was sent to Afghanistan and then Guantánamo.

The specific issue in the Padilla case is whether federal prosecutors in Miami can use evidence seized from Padilla at the Chicago airport and use statements Padilla made during nearly eight hours of questioning by customs, immigration, and FBI agents before he was given Miranda warnings and placed under arrest.

After arresting Padilla, agents found the names and telephone numbers of individuals the government says were Padilla's Al Qaeda recruiter and his sponsor. They found the e-mail address of Ammar al-Baluchi, a key aide to Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 terror attacks. And they discovered a cellphone that had allegedly been provided to Padilla by Al Qaeda officials.

In addition, they confiscated $10,526 in cash, most of which they allege had been provided to Padilla by Al Qaeda leaders in Pakistan a month earlier. During questioning, agents say Padilla told them that he received the money in an envelope from an individual in Pakistan, but then said it was money he had earned.

Such evidence could play a critical role in Padilla's terror conspiracy trial, set to begin in January. Judge Cooke has already criticized the government's case as being "very light on facts." She has dismissed the most serious conspiracy count in the indictment. Evidence: 220 tapped conversations

The bulk of the evidence against Padilla's alleged coconspirators is 220 intercepted conversations. But there are only 28 instances where Padilla speaks or is allegedly mentioned, according to court documents. And none of the 28 conversations directly implicates Padilla in any acts of violence, his lawyers say.

In contrast to the skimpy evidence in the Miami criminal case, the government has assembled a mountain of intelligence information about Padilla's alleged actions and cooperation with Al Qaeda. But virtually all of it was obtained from interrogations during his 3-1/2 years in military detention as a presidentially designated enemy combatant, or through the harsh interrogation of other enemy combatants overseas. As such, it is generally ineligible for use in the criminal court system.

The 2002 warrant issue is important, legal analysts say, because it could lead to wider use in American courts of the fruits of harsh interrogations overseas. And it highlights the difficulty of blending proactive intelligence operations with law-enforcement efforts, these analysts say. Zayn Abu Zubaydah

He's a Palestinian, born in Saudi Arabia, and the first significant member of Al Qaeda captured - in March 2002 in Pakistan. Intelligence officials say he:

· Headed the reorganization of Al Qaeda in Pakistan, as well as planned attacks on US interests.

· Had connections to a plan to blow up the US Embassy in Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia-Herzegovina, as well as a planned attack on the American embassy in Paris.

· Is thought to have briefed Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber, who was arrested on board a flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001

· Is a master of disguise who used at least 37 aliases

· Is the first Al Qaeda suspect subjected to harsh interrogation, according to President Bush in a speech Sept. 6. He was interrogated in Thailand and initially questioned by the FBI, which gave him some humanitarian aid. A CIA team was later sent in. It apparently forced him to strip and stand in a cold room and subjected him to loud music.

Source: Various news reports

10 Things To Know About Guantanamo (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The Pentagon successfully avoided being on David Letterman's Top Ten list for many years. So this week Secretary Donald Rumsfeld 's speechwriters tried to help, sending out "Ten Facts About Guantanamo" to highlight what a nice place it is.

The first fact notes that the inmates include some truly nasty terrorist trainers and bombmakers. The second says "More money is spent on meals for detainees than" on U.S. troops stationed there. "The average weight gain per detainee is 20 pounds."

"The Muslim call to prayer sounds five times a day," we are told, and arrows point "toward the holy city of Mecca."

DOJ_NMG_0063476

The prisoners receive free medical, dental and psychiatric care, and in 2005 "there were 35 teeth cleanings." The other 400 or so housed there will have to wait awhile.

Fact No. 5 notes that the Red Cross visits "every few months" and that there's regular contact between the terrorism suspects and their families.

"Recreation activities include basketball, volleyball, soccer, ping-pong and board games," according to Fact No. 6. "High-top sneakers are provided."

We are told that upon release, everyone gets "a Koran, a jean jacket, a white T-shirt, a pair of blue jeans, high-top sneakers" -- a second pair -- "a gym bag of toiletries" (remember not to try to take the liquids onboard), and "a pillow and blanket for the flight home."

Fact No. 8, probably one of the most important, notes that, contrary to what you might have heard, the prisoners actually really want to be in Guantanamo. "The mother of a detainee stated: 'Of course they wanted to stay there. . . . They had human rights and good living standards there. They had dentists and good meals -- everything they wanted.' " Turns out, this quote from a March 2004 edition of the London Times was a Russian mother comparing Guantanamo with Russian jails.

There was "Arabic language TV," a large library with books in 13 languages. "The most requested book is 'Harry Potter,' " we're told.

And Fact No. 10. "In 2005, Amnesty International stated that 'the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay has become the gulag of our times.' "

This last fact was intended as a shot at Amnesty for comparing a veritable five-star hotel with the infamous Soviet labor camps. After all, the commies never gave away high-tops.

We're told some Pentagon folks balked at putting the list up on the Pentagon Web site, but an updated version -- minus the Russian mother quote -- is up there now at http://www.defenselink.mil/home/dodupdate .

Matt Latimer , director of the Pentagon writers group, who put together the list, said, "We welcome the chance to let people know there's more than one side to the story in Guantanamo." Latimer said, "We've gotten a lot of kudos from people who are glad we are at last . . . defending the facility."In the Scary Old Land of Oz

Most books on the Iraq war tend to be grim reads -- unrelenting, head-shaking, disastrous military decisions, one page after another.

But a new book by our colleague and former Post Baghdad bureau chief Rajiv Chandrasekaran offers tales of U.S. ineptitude in Iraq that are so wondrously mind-boggling that some sections are laugh-out-loud funny.

Of course it's gallows humor, since the book, "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," chronicles life inside the heavily fortified U.S. enclave, the Green Zone, during the first year of the oft-chaotic U.S. reconstruction program.

It's an account of how clueless but politically connected munchkins end up in important positions in the Coalition Provisional Authority while knowledgeable veterans are frozen out. As a handwritten sign in a British housing compound bar admonished: "Yee-haw is not a foreign policy."

There are scenes of visiting U.S. officials who invariably find extraordinary progress amid obvious disaster.

Thus Tommy Thompson , former secretary of health and human services, pops in to visit a Green Zone hospital and says the military-run facility -- which served mostly Americans -- shows how the United States had begun to "reestablish Iraq as a center of excellence for medical protection and medical care."

But, Chandrasekaran notes, "none of that excellence was evident outside the Emerald City." It was only a five-minute drive from the make-believe land of Oz to the huge Yarmouk Hospital. "It was, quite simply, a disaster," he writes as he describes the horrific conditions there.Oh, You Know, One of Those Middle States

Outgoing D.C. Mayor Tony Williams , at his weekly news briefing Wednesday, talked about meeting with House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner to talk about getting voting representation in Congress.

Williams went on about how Sensenbrenner is from Illinois, and how that's a great state, always supportive of civil rights, home of Abraham Lincoln , our greatest president and so on.

At the end, one reporter asked: But isn't Sensenbrenner from Wisconsin?

Well, whatever, Williams said, it's a "core American value" were talking about.

U.S. Sends 2 Gitmo Detainees To Kuwait (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

Two Kuwaitis released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay returned on Friday to their homeland, where their lawyer said they would face trials on terrorism-related charges.

The U.S. military said an administrative review board had recommended the two men be transferred back to Kuwait from the prison in southeastern Cuba, where the U.S. now holds about 455 men on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0063477

Two two men, Omar Rajab Amin, 41, and Abdullah Kamel al-Kundari, 32, who had been held at Guantanamo for four years, arrived at an airport in Kuwait early Friday, said Khaled al-Odah, who heads the Kuwaiti Family Committee, an advocacy group for men held at the prison.

They were taken to a hospital for a medical examination and to meet with their families.

"They are very skinny and exhausted, but they looked OK," al-Odah said. "They are very happy, but worried at the same time."

Both men had been held at Guantanamo since January 2002, but had not been charged with any crimes. The military said that they had ties to charities with links to terror groups and that their names had been found on the hard drive of a computer seized from a suspected al-Qaida member, according to their attorney, David Cynamon, and military documents.

Cynamon said the two men had only traveled to Afghanistan to help refugees from the country's civil war and have no connection to any terror groups.

The lawyer predicted they would be cleared by the courts in their country — as were five other Kuwaitis previously released from Guantanamo.

Another Kuwaiti released from Guantanamo was acquitted of terror-related charges, but an appeals tribunal overturned the acquittal and sentenced him to five years in prison.

Al-Kundari was a former member of Kuwait's national volleyball team who before his arrest worked as an engineer for the Ministry of Water and Electricity, according to U.S. documents previously released to The Associated Press.

He told a military panel that he considered al-Qaida a "vicious" terrorist group, according to transcripts.

Amin, who attended college in Nebraska, was accused by the military of being a terrorist financier, which he denied. He told the panel he had never fought against U.S. forces and only wanted to return home to be with his family, according to the transcripts.

The U.S. said authorities have determined that about 130 of the remaining prisoners at Guantanamo are eligible for release or transfer but the timing will depend on negotiations with their home countries.

Mosque Leaders' Trial Continues (CAPN9)

By By: Steve Ference

Capital News 9, September 15, 2006

The trial of two Albany men accused of supporting terrorism continued on Thursday. Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain are accused of being involved in a plot to buy a surface-to-air missile. They were arrested in an FBI sting in 2004.

On Thursday, jurors saw lengthy video clips showing Mohammed Hossain speaking with an FBI informant named Malik posing as a Pakistani businessman. In the video, Malik showed Hossain a surface-to-air missile and began discussing how Malik would pay Hossain to launder $50,000 to import the fake missile to a terrorist group. But the question is, did Hossain fully understand the transaction and the situation he was put in?

Federal prosecutors didn't waste time getting to the crux of their case against two suspected terrorists. Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref are on trial for supporting terrorism, stemming from a 2004 sting operation. They were back in court Thursday, as was our Steve Ference.

In a 2001 meeting, Malik showed Hossain the missile system and asked, "Do you know what this is?" Hossain said, "No." Malik said, "This is for destroying airplanes. This is sensor heat, you know?" He added, "We get $50,000 for these." Hossain said, "Hmm, good money can be made from this."

Later, in February 2003, Malik asked, "Have you heard of [a particular terrorist group]?" Hossain said yes, although it turns out he thought that was a music group, not a terrorist group.

Later that year, Hossain told Malik, "Non-believers will gradually convert to Islam, sir. There is no need for us to kill."

Later, a Kurd who had survived a gas attack in Saddam Hussein's Iraq testified that he was familiar with an organization called the IMK, a political group in Iraq that he pointed out Aref had once been a member of.

This could be problematic for Aref because one of the charges is that he lied on an immigration document by writing "none" instead of indicating he had ties to the group. But the defense is expected to argue it wasn't Aref's handwriting so he shouldn't be found guilty of this lesser charge.

There was also some drama in the courtroom Thursday. Aref jumped up out of his seat smiling and waving hello to the witness who identified him as being part of that political group -- an obvious cultural divide between those who are conducting the trial and the defendants.

DOJ_NMG_0063478

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senate OKs Legislation To Tighten Security At Seaports (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted without dissent Thursday to tighten security at U.S. seaports by scanning nearly all incoming cargo for nuclear weapons or "dirty bombs."

The bill, approved 98-0 in a pre-election push on national defense, would increase safeguards on the rail systems that pick up cargo from ports and authorize 1,000 new agents to screen containers coming off ships.

The legislation does not go as far as some Democrats demanded in requiring inspections for all U.S.-bound cargo before it leaves foreign ports. Almost 11 million containers are shipped annually to the USA.

The Senate plan, which authorizes spending $835 million next year, "works toward a goal of getting to 100% screening" of cargo leaving foreign ports, said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., one of the authors of the bill.

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, said the measure, similar to one the House approved in May, was "the most comprehensive approach to border security we have taken."

The Senate bill requires inspections of suspicious high-risk cargo at foreign ports. It also sets up a pilot program to scan for nuclear or "dirty bomb" materials in all U.S.-bound containers at three to-be-determined foreign ports. The trial would help determine whether mandatory inspections would bottle up commerce and drive up costs.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said that could be too late to prevent massive explosions at U.S. ports or in harbors outside large cities.

"We don't want to be in a situation where we say, 'What if? What if we had done more?' " Schumer said.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., responded, "This is about the practicality of making sure that we have something that works."

Noting the politics of the issue, Coleman added: "The election season is upon us. It's getting very close. … Let us step away from the sloganeering."

Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Homeland Security Department, has said that nuclear weapons are a grave threat. Such weapons create gigantic fireballs fed by nuclear chain reactions.

"Dirty bombs," in contrast, would use conventional explosives to scatter radioactive material. This kind of blast probably would not cause many deaths, but the fear of contamination could cause panic while any land or buildings hit with radioactive particles might be unusable for years.

James Jay Carafano, homeland security fellow at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the Senate plan largely ignores security gaps such as the threat from small boats that could detonate explosives next to larger ships, as happened in the 2000 attack on the USS Cole in Yemen that killed 17 Americans.

The legislation would make available $400 million for security grants and expedite incoming cargo from previously approved manufacturers and other business partners.

The White House said it largely supports the Senate plan.

The administration has spent about $10 billion on port security since the Sept. 11 attacks. About 65% of cargo is already screened for nuclear or radiological materials. The Homeland Security Department aims to increase that number to 80% by the end of the year and to almost 100% by the end of 2007.

Senate Unanimously Votes To Tighten Security Measures At Ports (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The Senate voted without dissent yesterday to tighten security at U.S. seaports by scanning nearly all incoming cargo for "dirty bombs" and other nuclear weapons.

The bill, approved 98 to 0 in a pre-election push on national defense, would increase safeguards on the rail systems that pick up cargo from ports and authorize 1,000 new agents to screen containers coming off ships. But the legislation does not go as far as some Democrats demanded in requiring inspections for all U.S.-bound cargo before it leaves foreign ports. Almost 11 million containers a year are shipped to the United States.

The plan, which authorizes spending $835 million next year, "works toward a goal of getting to 100 percent screening" of cargo leaving foreign ports, said Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.), one of the bill's authors. Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) said the measure, similar to one the House approved in May, was "the most comprehensive approach to border security we have taken to date."

DOJ_NMG_0063479

The Senate bill requires inspections of suspicious high-risk cargo at foreign ports. It also sets up a pilot program to scan for nuclear or "dirty bomb" materials in all U.S.-bound containers at three to-be-determined foreign ports. The trial would help determine if mandatory inspections would bottle up commerce and drive up costs, as Republicans fear.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said that could be too late to prevent massive explosions at U.S. ports or in harbors outside large cities.

James Jay Carafano, homeland security fellow at the Heritage Foundation, said the Senate plan largely ignores security gaps such as the threat from small boats that could detonate explosives next to larger ships, as happened in the 2000 attack on the USS Cole in Yemen that killed 17 Americans.

The bill would make available $400 million for security grants and would expedite incoming cargo from previously approved manufacturers and other business partners. It also included special items for landlocked states, including $40 million for northern border air patrols over Great Falls, Mont., requested by Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), and extending the daily hours at a New Mexico border crossing, sought by Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.).

The White House said it largely supports the Senate plan. The administration has spent about $10 billion on ports security since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. About 65 percent of cargo is already screened for nuclear or radiological materials. The Department of Homeland Security aims to increase that number to 80 percent by the end of the year and to almost 100 percent by the end of 2007.

Senate Approves Bill To Tighten Port Security (MCT)

By Les Blumenthal

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate approved a port-security bill Thursday that its sponsors said would make the nation safer from terrorist attack, after it rejected a plan to inspect every inbound cargo container for nuclear weapons.

The measure, approved 98-0, would require installing radiation monitors at the country's 22 largest ports and would authorize a pilot program involving three foreign ports to scan all cargo containers headed to the United States.

It also would establish a new office within the Department of Homeland Security to coordinate port security and would order the department to prepare a plan for getting cargo moving again after an attack. One study estimated that a 12-day shutdown of the ports could cost the U.S. economy $58 billion.

"We have done a lot to secure our ports, but they are still too porous," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. "This bill represents a multipronged approach to plug the holes in our port security."

Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., the bill's lead author, who has been pushing for tougher port security since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, said Senate approval cleared the way for possible final action before the end of the year.

"A big hurdle has been passed," Murray said. "It's a huge step in a very positive direction."

The House of Representatives has approved its own version of the bill, and a compromise will have to be negotiated. Congress is scheduled to recess in early October but could come back after the November elections to finish pending legislation.

Senate passage of the bill comes more than two years after the 9-11 commission concluded that the nation's ports could be more vulnerable to attack than commercial aviation. More than 95 percent of the nation's trade - worth nearly $1 trillion - flows through more than 360 U.S. ports every year. Virtually all of it is carried on 8,500 foreign-flagged vessels that make 55,000 calls at American ports annually.

About 5 percent of the nearly 11 million cargo containers that arrive in the United States annually is opened and inspected. Some are scanned for nuclear material.

Congress' Government Accountability Office has raised questions about the effectiveness of the program that identifies which "high-risk" containers are inspected and has expressed concern about the effectiveness of the radiation monitors now being used.

Efforts to pass a port-security bill had languished until an uproar last February over the disclosure that a Dubai company had been approved to operate a handful of U.S. ports.

The measure picked up more steam over the past few weeks as congressional Republicans have ratcheted up their national security agenda. Democrats said Republicans were scrambling to shore up their national security credentials for political reasons before the elections.

"Five years after 9-11, repeated failures by Bush Republicans have left our ports vulnerable and open to terrorist attack," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said in a statement.

Republicans dismissed such allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0063480

"This is an important bill for our homeland security," said Maine Sen. Susan Collins, the lead Republican sponsor of the measure.

Murray said any political motivations for moving the bill weren't important.

"To me it doesn't matter," she said. "Getting it done is the right thing to do."

The Senate tabled, 61-37, an amendment offered by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that would have required that 100 percent of the cargo containers headed for the United States be scanned within four years. Shippers would have picked up the cost.

"What are we waiting for?" Schumer said. "This mandates we inspect all cargo - no pilot programs, no tests, all containers - for nuclear weapons."

Schumer said the Homeland Security Department had been "derelict" by not requiring 100 percent inspections, that the technology existed to do it and that the cost would be $8 per container, not much when considering that it cost $2,000 to ship a container from Hong Kong to the West Coast.

Collins said the bill would move toward 100 percent inspections when it was "proved and feasible." Doing it prematurely could create a massive backlog of containers waiting on the docks to be inspected, she said.

The 22 large ports that would receive radiation scanners handle about 98 percent of the containers that come into the United States. Schumer's amendment would have required that the scanning take place overseas, before the containers are shipped.

The bill would authorize almost $3.3 billion in port-security funding over the next six years and another $400 million in grants to individual ports. Since 9-11, seaports have sought more than $4.3 billion in federal aid for security. The Department of Homeland Security has provided about 20 percent of the amount requested, about $876 million.

Chemical-plant Security Vexes Congress (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK

A toxic battle is brewing on Capitol Hill over how to secure the nation's chemical plants from terrorist attack.

At issue is whether the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) should have the authority to require chemical plants to implement specific security measures, such as switching to safer chemicals or using armed guards. The chemical industry and House Republican leaders believe it should not. Instead, they favor allowing companies to come up with their own security proposals that can then be reviewed and approved by DHS.

On the other side are environmentalists, some security experts, moderate Republicans, and Democrats. They believe DHS should have the ability to require companies to make security improvements, as long as companies have an opportunity to appeal requirements to which they object.

But all sides agree on one thing: It's way past time for the government to come up with some kind of legislation requiring improved security at the nation's chemical plants.

"It's unacceptable we don't have a piece of legislation on such a significant critical infrastructure that, if attacked, could have potentially catastrophic consequences," says Frank Cilluffo, director of George Washington University's Homeland Security Policy Institute in Washington.

Several factors are responsible for the lack of legislation five years after 9/11. In the first few years after the attacks, the chemical industry convinced congressional leaders they could self-regulate. The American Chemistry Council (ACC), which represents 133 chemical manufacturers, set up standards and guidelines to help companies identify their vulnerabilities and create security plans to address them. The ACC says its members have spent $3 billion enhancing security in the past five years.

But investigations done by the media, the Government Accountability Office, and environmental groups made it clear that while some industry players have done a good job in "raising the bar" for security, as Mr. Cilluffo puts it, not all have. Significant vulnerabilities remained, some in densely populated urban areas. Eventually, even the ACC conceded that some kind of legislation was needed to bring uniformity to security in the industry.

"We've been very clear that we want legislation passed this year and what it would look like," says Scott Jensen, a spokesman for the ACC. "It would be risk-based, performance oriented, and it would not include [inherently safer technologies]."

Known as IST in the industry, this essentially means switching from some of the most deadly chemicals to less harmful ones whenever it's technologically and economically feasible.

DOJ_NMG_0063481

This summer, the House Committee on Homeland Security unanimously approved a compromise bill that would give DHS the authority to require some high-risk facilities to use safer chemicals when feasible. If a company disagreed with DHS, the bill set up an interagency appeal process.

It was a hard-fought compromise. But now, its advocates contend that the chemical industry, in conjunction with the White House and the Republican leadership, is reneging on the deal. Instead of bringing it to the floor for a vote, House Republican leaders are amending the Homeland Security appropriations bill: It would give DHS the authority to require chemical plants to develop vulnerability assessments and security plans, but it would specifically forbid DHS from requiring any specific security measure. It reads, "Nothing in this section authorizes the Secretary directly or indirectly to require any particular security measure." Environmental advocates say that line is aimed at ensuring that DHS cannot require companies to switch to safer chemicals when feasible.

"The industry didn't like what was passed in committee, and now they're using the appropriations process to craft a drastically weak, completely industry-friendly version and present it as a fait accompli," says Andy Igrejas of the National Environmental Trust, a nonprofit environmental advocacy group based in Washington. "A congressman can oppose it, but to do so, he or she'd have to vote against Homeland Security appropriations just six weeks before an election."

Mr. Igrejas adds, "There was an open process where competing proposals led to something that was a deal [Republican leadership] agreed to honor, and now instead, under industry pressure" it's going back on its word, he says.

But Mr. Jensen of the ACC disagrees. He says the industry is simply using the legislative process to advocate what it believes is right.

"We're not against IST. The chemical industry developed and created it," he says. "However, what we are against is banning chemicals under the guise of security. We think the legislation should work toward securing those chemicals, rather than banning them."

Some security experts say they're not surprised the sides remain so polarized, but contend it's crucial to get legislation passed soon.

"I'd at least like to see some kind of starting point so we can pull together more and better information so we can figure out how to proceed in the long run," says Jack Riley, a security expert at the RAND Corp. in Arlington, Va.

The House appropriations bill for Homeland Security is still being negotiated, but is expected to be voted on before Congress recesses for the November elections.

Suspended Muslim Safety Expert Sues DHS (AP)

By Wayne Parry, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. -- An Egyptian-born aviation security expert is suing the U.S. government, claiming he was wrongly suspended from his Transportation Security Administration job based on a classified FBI file the government won't let him see.

Wagih H. Makky filed the lawsuit Thursday in federal court in Newark, alleging he was harassed and discriminated against at work after the Sept. 11 terror attacks based on his nationality and his Muslim religion.

The lawsuit claims Makky is one of the world's leading experts in designing and evaluating technology to prevent explosives from being smuggled onto airplanes and rail cars. Makky, 55, a U.S. citizen, most recently worked at the TSA aviation center outside Atlantic City.

Following the Pan Am jet bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988, Makky was chosen to create a Federal Aviation Administration unit to focus government efforts to prevent terrorist attacks on American airliners.

According to the lawsuit, a new supervisor in 2002 asked Makky during their first meeting about his ethnic background. When the U.S. invasion of Iraq began in March 2003, the supervisor placed him on administrative leave, based on the classified file, according to the lawsuit.

In August 2005, Makky was suspended without pay, and remains suspended.

The lawsuit names the Department of Homeland Security among others as defendants. The lawsuit did not specify damages. A Homeland Security spokesman did not return a call seeking comment Thursday.

Makky could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Air Cargo Faces Tighter Screening (AP)

By Denise Lavoie

The AP, September 14, 2006

BOSTON -- Packages taken to airline ticket counters for shipment on passenger planes will have to go through the same security screening as checked baggage, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0063482

Such packages _ brought to an airline's counter by individuals looking to get a package to another destination or by courier services _ already were being screened for the past several months at most airports around the country.

But the screening now will be mandatory for 100 percent of those packages, Chertoff said at a news conference at Boston's Logan International Airport.

"We closed that gap earlier this year, but we're now making this a legal requirement," Chertoff said, announcing that a formal directive was signed Thursday.

Chertoff said the move was in response to concerns that the packages were not being screened for explosives.

Chertoff cited Logan as being the first airport in the country to begin screening 100 percent of its passengers' checked baggage for explosives. Logan had begun the package screening four months ago, using X-ray and explosive sensors that are used to screen baggage on a system of conveyor belts.

Despite the new requirement, most of the cargo on passenger planes, which comes from larger freight shippers, remains subjected only to random checks. Freight forwarders who accept bulk packages and arrange shipment are required to have government-approved security plans and attend TSA training. Air cargo companies must register with the government and be approved by the TSA before they're allowed to send cargo on passenger airliners.

U.S. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House Homeland Security Committee who has criticized the lax screening procedures for counter packages, said he was pleased that the TSA had closed the loophole _ but wanted more done.

"Until the Bush Administration physically screens all cargo on passenger planes for explosives and requires all cargo to arrive at the airport in a form that is screenable using existing screening technology, passenger planes are vulnerable to terrorist attack by people who don't even fly on the planes they seek to bring down," he said in a statement.

In May the TSA announced new air cargo security requirements, including criminal background checks for airline and freight workers and additional screeners to check the packages delivered to ticket counters. It also announced plans to use more bomb-sniffing dogs to screen air freight and to hire more air cargo inspectors.

Meanwhile, cargo pilots have complained about the vulnerability of cargo planes as the government focused on protecting passenger airliners.

The visit by Chertoff and Hawley comes three days after the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which were launched from Logan when hijackers boarded planes at the airport and crashed them into New York's World Trade Center.

Chertoff: Fee Up In Air For Registered Traveler (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 15, 2006

BOSTON — With opposition mounting, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday that he is “still looking at” how much to charge air travelers for a program that would speed them through airport security.

Chertoff said he supports the idea of making people in the Registered Traveler program “pay their own weight,” which could cost up to $200 a year.

“We shouldn't necessarily have the taxpayer pay to subsidize people who want to go through the Registered Traveler program,” Chertoff told reporters at Boston's Logan International Airport. “We want to be fair. … Now exactly what the right amount of money is going to be and how that's going to work, I think, is something we're still looking at.”

Chertoff's comments come days after the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) disclosed that it plans to charge travelers $100 to $120 to enroll in Registered Traveler and at least $70 a year for every year after their first in the program. The Homeland Security Department oversees the TSA.

The government costs are in addition to roughly $80 annually that program participants would have to pay to companies operating the program.

Under Registered Traveler, people who pass a voluntary background check would receive a fingerprint-embedded ID card that would give them access to special security lanes with expedited screening.

The heftier charge stunned some TSA advocates. On Thursday, a coalition of 10 companies seeking to provide services for Registered Traveler called on the TSA to reduce the fee, saying it will “stunt, if not eliminate” the program.

The group, called the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition, also questioned whether the TSA can charge fees to recoup costs of TSA screeners at Registered Traveler checkpoints. Of the $100 the TSA proposes charging, $70 would pay for screener salaries.

TSA chief Kip Hawley defended the proposed fee after a news conference here with Chertoff and said that $100 is “a reasonable estimate” of the cost for each Registered Traveler.

DOJ_NMG_0063483

TSA To Review Proposed Registered Traveler Fee (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Transportation Security Administration is reviewing plans to charge a hefty fee to travelers who want to sign up for a program that aims to expedite trips through airport security.

This week the agency sparked a battle with the private companies that want to offer Registered Traveler when it said it plans to charge an annual fee of $100 per person to cover background checks and the full cost of airport screening. The companies, which expected a fee of about $30, say too few people will sign up if fees are too high. Any fees charged by TSA would be in addition to the charges levied by the companies that provide the service, which run about $80 a person.

Yesterday, a TSA official said the fee amount is now under review.

"The proposed fee will stunt, if not eliminate RT programs, thus undermining the promise of better aviation security and much needed customer service improvements," the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition, which represents private companies that want to provide the service, said in a statement.

Insurers Press For Terror-Backstop Renewal (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins And Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the White House and many in Congress reluctantly agreed to create a temporary government program to backstop the insurance industry in the event of another attack. Officials feared making the government a force in the insurance industry, but they knew the private sector would need time to establish a market for coverage against acts of terrorism.

Now, some in the business and insurance community want to create a long-term or permanent terrorism insurance program. Under the program set up by the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act, the government steps in to help make an insurer's payouts if the losses from a foreign terrorist attack exceed that insurer's deductible.

With more than a year remaining before the program expires, a politically savvy group -- including insurance companies, real-estate owners, financial services firms and former American International Group Chief Executive Maurice Greenberg -- is working to press the issue.

Industry representatives aren't coordinating efforts and haven't agreed on a plan. For example, the plan offered by the real-estate industry conflicts with one from the insurance lobby. But early efforts show that creating a permanent terrorism insurance system will be a priority next year for the financial-services industry.

At a speech in New York today, Mr. Greenberg is expected to say that the government must help the industry if terrorists strike with a weapon of mass destruction. The insurance industry should be able to cover claims from a less catastrophic attack, according to his prepared remarks.

"The industry can handle the impact of another 9/11, what it can't is the aftermath of a dirty bomb or a poisoned water supply in a major city," Mr. Greenberg will tell the Barbon Institute for Risk Management and Insurance, an industry think tank.

He also will propose a group of industry leaders and government officials to develop a long-term terrorism insurance plan. Mr. Greenberg says Washington should allow insurance companies to create tax-free accounts to build reserves to cover claims from terrorism.

The response from his industry colleagues and Washington lawmakers to Mr. Greenberg's proposal will be a test of his political sway. Mr. Greenberg was once seen as the voice of the insurance business in Washington, at times to the chagrin of the insurance lobby. He was ousted in March 2005 amid regulatory investigations into AIG's accounting. Mr. Greenberg controls C.V. Starr & Co., a global insurance and investment firm.

Meanwhile, other industry players are lobbying. Earlier this week, lobbyists for large U.S. real-estate owners traveled to Washington to pitch their solution. Owners of shopping malls, hotels and office buildings say insurers can't offer the level of terrorism insurance they need, and they worry that there would be no coverage if the government exits the market. They propose a $30 billion fund paid for by insurance companies that can be tapped to cover terrorism claims. Under the plan, the government would keep serving as an insurance backstop for five to seven years until the fund is operational.

Before 9/11, losses caused by terrorism were included in standard insurance policies. But insurers paid out $32.5 billion as a result of the attacks, according to the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. Some insurance companies balked at providing the coverage at all. Many insurance companies considered terrorism, by its nature, too unpredictable to insure. Businesses, meanwhile, were confronting the prospect of having no insurance to protect against terrorism. Pressed by several sectors, the Bush administration reluctantly stepped in.

DOJ_NMG_0063484

The American Insurance Association wants to extend the basic structure of the current program. The group suggests having the government largely take over paying for attacks involving nuclear, biological, chemical and radiological weapons. Attacks involving conventional weapons would be covered by insurers up to the point where a traditional federal backstop would kick in.

The Bush administration is opposed to a permanent reinsurance program. The backstop "was intended to provide temporary assistance as the industry adapted to a post-9/11 world, but the ... continued presence of a government-provided subsidy could crowd out the chances for a private market to develop," a Treasury Department spokeswoman said.

But other political forces may increase chances that the industry will succeed. The chief sponsor of the bill that created the program, Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.), will be the senior Democrat on the Senate Banking Committee next year.

Amazing Device Sucks Up Sludge -- And Tax Dollars (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Sure, it was a national emergency, but the Transportation Department's inspector general finds $935 an hour for a Sewer Hog a tad piggish.

In a new post-Katrina audit, the inspector general's office told the Federal Highway Administration that the state of Mississippi had overspent by $772 an hour on the Sewer Hog, a high-speed swiller used to clear flooded storm drains.

Desperate to reopen U.S. 90 along the Gulf Coast, Mississippi transportation officials turned to Texas-based Garner Environmental Services Inc., exclusive operators of the Sewer Hog. Together with its partner the Grit Gator, the mobile-home-size contraption sucked slop and sand from about 200 miles of three-foot sewer lines.

But it also hogged the budget. State highway officials -- and the feds -- paid $1.7 million for services that the report said ought to have cost $294,000.

It is not easy to estimate what a rare breed like the Sewer Hog should cost, and like a homeowner with an overflowing toilet, Mississippi highway officials opted to mop first and ask questions later. They were overcharged, the report's authors say, partly because they failed to run the Sewer Hog through a formula designed for pricing specialized equipment and negotiate in advance.

Using that formula, "the rental rate for this specialized equipment would have been $163 per hour," the report read. "In our opinion a rental rate of $935 per hour for the Sewer Hog was higher than what may be considered reasonable, even under the catastrophic conditions that were created by Hurricane Katrina."

The inspector general's office recommends that the Mississippi Department of Transportation consider taking Garner Environmental Services to court to recover part of the bill. Company representatives did not respond to repeated requests for a comment.

The Sewer Hog "was a big thing," said Todd J. Zinser, the acting inspector general, referring to the overcharge.

But it should not, pointed out IG spokesman David Barnes, be confused with a Smart Pig. Smart Pigs root through pipelines looking for leaks -- and they will star in an upcoming report on pipeline safety, he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet With Musharraf And Karzai (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

President Bush has scheduled separate White House meetings later this month with the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan, neighboring countries whose relations have sometimes been strained by terrorist hideouts along their border.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf is meeting with Bush on Sept. 22. Days later, on Sept. 26, Afghan President Hamid Karzai is due in the Oval Office. The meetings were announced amid a growing Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan.

"The visit will be an opportunity for the president to congratulate President Karzai on the progress Afghanistan has made over the last five years and to reaffirm America's commitment to stability and reconstruction in Afghanistan," White House press secretary Tony Snow said of the Karzai visit.

The resurgent Taliban, trying to topple the U.S.-backed Karzai government in Kabul, has adopted a dangerous change in tactics, copying the lead of insurgent attacks in Iraq. Since the start of the year, 173 people — including 151 Afghan civilians — have been killed in suicide bombings across the country, NATO announced Wednesday.

Military commanders have called for 2,500 extra troops to help the NATO force, which took control of the coalition in the south on Aug. 1. But NATO nations have failed to agree.

DOJ_NMG_0063485

Snow said that in addition to strategizing about countering the threat of militant extremists, Bush and Karzai will talk about Afghanistan's drug trade, need for good governance and faltering economy.

Pakistan was once a key Taliban supporter, but switched sides to become an ally of the U.S. in its campaign against terrorism following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Still, relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan have been strained for years, mainly over allegations by Afghan officials that Pakistan hasn't done enough to go after the remnants of the ousted Taliban regime, which Afghani leaders say have established hideouts in Pakistan along the mountainous border. Pakistan has rejected such charges.

Recently, cross-border relations have improved, and Karzai and Musharraf pledged in meetings in Kabul earlier this month to jointly fight militants.

The Musharraf-Bush sessions follow their meetings in March, when the president traveled to Pakistan. He also visited Afghanistan and India on that trip.

Kerry Faults Bush's Afghanistan Strategy (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, September 15, 2006

Democratic Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, accused the Bush administration of pursuing a "cut and run" strategy in Afghanistan that has emboldened terrorists and made the U.S. less safe.

"The administration's Afghanistan policy defines cut and run," Kerry said in remarks at Howard University on Thursday. "Cut and run while the Taliban-led insurgency is running amok across entire regions of the country. Cut and run while Osama bin Laden and his henchmen hide and plot in a lawless no-man's land."

Kerry's "cut and run" accusation echoes criticism Republicans have leveled at Democrats who have challenged Bush's handling of the Iraq war.

A potential 2008 presidential candidate, Kerry lashed out at the administration on the same day the White House announced meetings later this month with the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan.

"John Kerry lacks the credibility on the war on terror to be taken seriously," said Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz. "The junior senator from Massachusetts would be well served by not using his own agenda's mantra to falsely attack this administration's foreign policy."

Afghanistan has been plagued by an upsurge in violence by the Taliban, which is trying to topple the U.S.-backed government in Kabul. Military commanders have called for an extra 2,500 troops to help the NATO force in Afghanistan.

Kerry wants at least 5,000 additional troops sent there, contending that the Bush administration has focused on Iraq while failing to respond forcefully to threats in Afghanistan and Iran.

"The central front in the war on terror is still in Afghanistan, but this administration treats it like a sideshow," said Kerry, adding there are seven times more troops in Iraq than Afghanistan.

"When did denying al-Qaida a terrorist stronghold in Afghanistan stop being an urgent American priority?" Kerry said. "How is it possible that we keep sending thousands of additional U.S. troops into the middle of a civil war in Iraq but we can't find any more troops to send to Afghanistan?"

The Republican National Committee dismissed Kerry's criticism.

"John Kerry lacks the credibility on the war on terror to be taken seriously," said spokesman Danny Diaz of the four-term senator, a longtime member of the Foreign Relations Committee. "The junior senator from Massachusetts would be well-served by not using his own agenda's mantra to falsely attack this administration's foreign policy."

Militants Regroup In Western Afghanistan (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2006

As NATO troops exert pressure on Taliban forces in southern Afghanistan, militants have regrouped in western provinces and ignited violence that has killed a dozen people in two days, officials said. Up to 200 Taliban fighters poured into Bakwa in Farah province. They surrounded a police compound and fired rocket-propelled grenades at policemen before being driven out, said Maj. Gen. Sayed Agha Saqeb, the police chief.

NATO commanders have asked for reinforcements to the 20,000-strong force in Afghanistan. Poland pledged to add a 1,000-strong mechanized force but said the troops would not be deployed until February.

Spain says no law broken with CIA flights

Spain may have been a stopover for secret CIA flights, but there is no evidence any laws were violated, Foreign Minister Miguel Angel Moratinos said. He said Spain did not help transfer terror suspects to U.S. agents. U.S. officials have told the Spanish government they were not aware of any secret passengers aboard CIA planes that stopped on the way to such places as Kabul, Afghanistan, or the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, Moratinos said.

DOJ_NMG_0063486

Moratinos was the first government minister to testify to a European Parliament committee in Brussels investigating alleged CIA secret flights and detention centers in Europe used for interrogations.

Giovanni Fava of the European Union assembly said in a report this year that 125 CIA-related flights landed at 10 Spanish airports from 2003 through 2005.

Castro recovering well, a friend says

Cuban President Fidel Castro made an appearance of sorts on the sidelines of the Non-aligned Movement summit in Havana when state television showed photos of him chatting with an old friend, Argentine congressman Miguel Bonasso, in Castro's home. Bonasso said the Cuban leader claimed to have regained nearly half the 41 pounds he said he lost since intestinal surgery in July. "Fidel was as lucid and penetrating as ever," Bonasso wrote in a first-person article about their encounter in the Pagina/12 newspaper. Castro, 80, has not appeared in public since the surgery. He temporarily ceded power to his brother, Raul, the defense chief.

Poland Commits New Troops To Nato Force (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Stephen Fidler And Jan Cienski

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

Poland on Thursday committed 1,000 new troops for Nato's force in Afghanistan, after a formal meeting of the alliance on Wednesday failed to meet an urgent military request for hundreds of extra soldiers.

The Polish troops will join the 100 already on the ground in Afghanistan but are unlikely to arrive until February 2007.

The push for reinforcements put the spotlight on Nato's struggle to help establish a stable government in Afghanistan and on its long-term prospects as a military alliance.

At an emergency meeting on Wednesday, Nato's 26 member countries came up with no commitments for any new soldiers – in spite of a call last week by General James Jones, Nato's supreme commander, for up to 2,500 troops.

Nato said: "We have had indications in terms of force generation to fill the outstanding requirement...the operation commanders, including Gen Jones, are confident that they have sufficient forces in the theatre to be able to complete the operation successfully." The alliance said it had managed to clear Taliban insurgents from 55 per cent of the area surrounding their former stronghold of Kandahar.

Lord Garden, a former senior air force officer who acts as a defence spokesman for Britain's Liberal Democratic party, said: "Part of the problem... is Nato funding. If you volunteer, not only do you provide the troops, you have to provide the money to fund them."

Diplomats sought to emphasise that the Nato mission was a long way from failure. Victoria Nuland, US ambassador to Nato, said: "One of the things that is getting lost here is that the operation against the Taliban is a huge success. The extra troops will allow us to win faster and more decisively and to continue reconstruction at the same time."

However, casualties taken by British troops in the southern province of Helmand have increased controversy over the mission.

NATO's Afghan Test (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

IN AFGHANISTAN, the NATO alliance is engaged in the bloodiest and most important land battle in its 57-year history. Some 6,000 British and Canadian troops have been fighting near-daily engagements with the resurgent Taliban militia in the southern provinces of Kandahar and Helmand, killing more than 500 of the enemy in the past month while suffering three dozen deaths of their own soldiers. The campaign is fateful in several respects: It could prove a turning point both for Afghanistan and for NATO, which hopes to demonstrate that an alliance forged for the Cold War in Europe can tackle the West's 21st-century challenges.

For that reason, it's been encouraging to see the courage and apparent effectiveness of the British and Canadian troops, who are supported by U.S. and Afghan forces; it's been equally disheartening to witness the response of other NATO governments to an urgent request for more soldiers and aircraft to ensure the Taliban's defeat. At a special pledging conference at NATO headquarters in Brussels on Wednesday, the alliance's 26 governments failed to make any new commitments of troops.

NATO's top commander, U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, wasn't asking for anything exceptional when he urged the alliance last week to provide an additional 1,000 soldiers to serve as a reserve battalion as well as 1,500 more air support personnel and a squadron of helicopters. In fact, those forces were supposed to be part of NATO's commitment to southern Afghanistan; only 85 percent of the planned force was provided. The NATO force, which totals 8,000, including Dutch troops in a third province, is barely adequate for its principal planned mission, which was to help extend the authority of the Afghan government to southern Afghanistan and support aid and development projects.

DOJ_NMG_0063487

As it has turned out, the NATO troops have encountered fierce resistance from thousands of Taliban fighters who have infiltrated the region since last spring and are staging large-scale assaults. The unexpected intensity of the combat has raised domestic pressure on the Canadian and British governments, though both are so far standing firm. But other NATO governments are failing to commit their own soldiers as reinforcements; even worse, governments that already have troops in Afghanistan, such as Germany, are refusing to consider transferring some of them to the south from the relatively peaceful bases they occupy.

There's no question that placing soldiers in harm's way is one of the hardest steps for a democracy, and rightly so. But European governments that say they are committed to NATO and its mission in Afghanistan cannot continue to watch from a distance as American, British and Canadian soldiers do the lion's share of the fighting -- and dying. If NATO is to be an enduring military alliance, its other members must step forward.

9/11, Osama Reflection: Reverse Cut And Run? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Memories, views and reviews of 9/11 on the fifth anniversary this week should make us reflect on what we've done right and wrong since then. The scorecard:

· President Bush united us with his immediate pledge to get Osama bin Laden “dead or alive” for plotting and executing the 9/11 attacks.

·When that hunt went bad, Bush's preoccupation with going after Iraq's Saddam Hussein, who had nothing to do with Sept. 11, divided us.

Because Bush and his buddies misled us about weapons of mass destruction, there was public and political support for the Iraq war in the beginning. But now a big majority of you say invading Iraq was a mistake.

In this column back on Oct. 4, 2002, I wrote:

“Congress is ‘debating' but President Bush and his cohorts are demanding a virtual blank check to wage war in Iraq. They'll probably get it. That's a mistake.”

Currently, we have about 147,000 troops in Iraq, about 21,000 in Afghanistan. We actually “cut and ran” from the hunt for bin Laden in Afghanistan to carry out our Iraq misadventure.

In this column, I've often suggested we should take our troops out of Iraq “sooner rather than later.” We're viewed with disdain by many there and by most around the world as an “occupation” force.

Bush says we must “stay the course” and not “cut and run.” Since we cut and ran from Afghanistan during our Osama hunt years ago, maybe we should reverse that course now.

Redeploying our troops to fulfill our pledge to get bin Laden could make for a worldwide celebration by freedom lovers. Letting him stay on the loose is the biggest boost for terrorists, in Iraq and around the world.

CIA Learned In '02 That Bin Laden Had No Iraq Ties, Report Says (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The CIA learned in late September 2002 from a high-level member of Saddam Hussein's inner circle that Iraq had no past or present contact with Osama bin Laden and that the Iraqi leader considered bin Laden an enemy of the Baghdad regime, according to a recent Senate Intelligence Committee report.

Although President Bush and other senior administration officials were at that time regularly linking Hussein to al-Qaeda, the CIA's highly sensitive intelligence supporting the contrary view was apparently not passed on to the White House or senior Bush policymakers.

Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) and two GOP colleagues on the committee disclosed this information for the first time in the panel's report on Iraq released last week. They wrote in the "additional views" section of the report that the Cabinet-level Iraqi official "said that Iraq has no past, current, or anticipated future contact with Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda" and that the official "added that bin Laden was in fact a longtime enemy of Iraq."

On Sept. 25, 2002, just days after the CIA received the source's information, President Bush told reporters: "Al-Qaeda hides. Saddam doesn't, but the danger is, is that they work in concert. The danger is, is that al-Qaeda becomes an extension of

DOJ_NMG_0063488

Saddam's madness and his hatred and his capacity to extend weapons of mass destruction around the world. . . . [Y]ou can't distinguish between al-Qaeda and Saddam when you talk about the war on terror."

According to the three Republicans, the CIA said it did not disseminate the intelligence about the lack of a Hussein-bin Laden connection because "it did not provide anything new."

But other information obtained at the same time from the same source that paralleled what administration officials were saying was immediately passed on to "alert" the president and other senior policymakers, the three Republicans said. A "highly restricted intelligence report" conveyed the source's claim that although Iraq had no nuclear weapon, Hussein was covertly developing one and had stockpiled chemical weapons, according to the committee members.

CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano said he could not provide additional information about the situation beyond what is in the Senate report, but he added that "the agency's decisions to disseminate intelligence are not guided by political considerations."

Committee staff members would not expand on the report's language other than to say the Hussein-bin Laden material was maintained within the CIA at a high level with limited access.

Former senior CIA officials said it was unclear what happened to the Hussein-bin Laden information, although two former aides to then-CIA Director George J. Tenet said they could not remember if they received the original information. "Nothing was withheld from the White House," one former aide said, although there was "a lot of debate inside the agency about the Saddam-al-Qaeda relationship" because it was the focus of repeated questions from administration officials, including Vice President Cheney and his then-chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

The high-level Iraqi official, who was not identified in the Senate report, was Naji Sabri, then foreign minister. A senior CIA officer, after months of trying, was able to question him through a trusted agency intermediary when Sabri was in New York City around Sept. 19, 2002.

According to former intelligence officials, the CIA case officer filed two separate reports describing his questioning of Sabri. One, involving the Iraq weapons program, would go to analysts interested in that subject, the officer believed; the second, about Hussein and bin Laden, would go to the CIA counterterrorism center. The officer, however, passed his material on to senior agency officials in New York and was not aware of how it was eventually distributed.

Sabri's role as an intelligence source for the CIA has already been publicly reported. New details, including a payment of $200,000 to the intermediary and a secret signal system to assure the CIA officer that Sabri was cooperating, are contained in the recently released book "Hubris," by Michael Isikoff of Newsweek and David Corn, Washington correspondent for the magazine the Nation.

U.S. Says Sectarian Killings Up In Iraq (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, September 14, 2006

Sectarian killings have surged in parts of Baghdad not yet included in a security offensive, the U.S. military said Thursday, while bombings and other insurgent attacks killed four American soldiers and wounded 25 in the capital region.

Police reported finding 20 bodies dumped on streets, many of them victims of reprisal killings in the escalating conflict between Shiite and Sunni Arabs. Six people died when a car bomb exploded at a soccer field in Fallujah, raising the death toll across Iraq to at least 28.

One of the few positive developments for the U.S.-led coalition and the national unity government was the reported killing of a senior member of al-Qaida in Iraq and the capture of another.

Shiite politicians, meanwhile, said they had made progress in trying to break a deadlock over legislation to establish autonomous regions as part of a federated Iraq. Sunni Arabs oppose the bill, fearing it could split Iraq into three sectarian and ethnic cantons.

The worst violence in Baghdad came at midday when a suicide car bomber attacked U.S. troops on the western outskirts of the city, killing two Americans and wounding 25, the U.S. command said. It said six of the wounded had returned to duty and 15 were not seriously injured.

Two more U.S. soldiers also were killed in the Baghdad area, one when his patrol was hit by small-arms fire and the other when a roadside bomb exploded. The command also announced the killing of a soldier Wednesday near the northern city of Mosul, raising to at least 2,676 the number of U.S. military personnel killed since the war began, according to an Associated Press count.

Violence has intensified over the past two days, with more than 140 people either killed by attacks or their bodies found dumped in the streets of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0063489

"There was a spike in violence in Baghdad over the past 24 hours from murder-executions," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the U.S. command's spokesman. "Most of those are associated with sectarian violence, not all necessarily, but a large portion."

He said the violence had intensified in areas that have not been reached by Operation Together Forward, a security campaign launched Aug. 7 with 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers.

"The terrorists and death squads are clearly targeting civilians outside of the focus areas," Caldwell said.

In areas that have been part of the operation, U.S. and Iraqi forces have cleared more than 52,000 buildings, found 32 weapon caches, detained 91 people and seized more than 1,200 weapons, Caldwell said.

"Overall, as part of the Baghdad security plan, we have seen a sustained reduction of level in the violence of attacks and murders in the focus areas," he asserted.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that "there is a lot of progress being made" to stabilize the Baghdad area and toward the U.S. goal of turning over security in much of the country to Iraqi forces by the end of the year.

As for the continuing bloodshed, McCormack said, "Al-Qaida clearly has an interest in fomenting sectarian violence in Iraq."

Iraq's Interior Ministry reported that Abu Jaafar al-Liby, who it described as either the second or third most important figure in al-Qaida in Iraq, was killed by police earlier this week.

Four other insurgents were killed and two were arrested in the raid, a ministry spokesman, Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, told The Associated Press.

Al-Liby was in charge of the Baghdad sector of al-Qaida in Iraq, Khalaf said. He said two letters were found on his body — one addressed to Osama bin Laden and the other to Abu Ayyoub al-Masri, who is thought to be al-Qaida in Iraq's leader. Both letters pledged loyalty and promised more attacks, Khalaf said.

Caldwell said U.S. military forces also had captured a senior al-Qaida figure and personal associate of the group's new leader. He was arrested along with 70 others Tuesday in a series of 12 raids, the U.S. spokesman said.

The man, who was not identified, led assassination, kidnapping and bomb-making cells in Baghdad, and played a key role in al-Qaida's activities in Fallujah before it was attacked by U.S. troops in November 2004, Caldwell said.

Another U.S. officer, Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, said the man was adept at making car bombs and roadside bombs and liked to set off explosives himself. "This terrorist's capture is a significant blow to al-Qaida, and another step toward defeating terrorism in Iraq," Johnson said.

On the federalism issue, members of the major Shiite political coalition, the United Iraqi Alliance, said they had made some headway in persuading leaders of other parties to support the proposed legislation, which could be introduced next week.

Alliance leaders sent delegations to the Shiite holy city of Najaf to meet with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and Grand Ayatollah Mohammed al-Yaqoubi, spiritual leader of the Fadhila party.

Iraq Violence Continues (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

Five American soldiers and 22 bodies found in Baghdad are among 41 deaths reported. A U.S. general acknowledges a rise in killings in the city.

BAGHDAD — Death squads continued to sweep through the Iraqi capital, leaving behind a grisly trail of at least 22 bodies Thursday, some of them handcuffed and decapitated. At least 19 people were killed or found dead in other violence throughout the country, including five U.S. soldiers whose deaths were reported Thursday.

A U.S. military spokesman acknowledged that despite a major operation to combat death squads and curb sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Arab paramilitary fighters in Baghdad, violence had increased.

"There was a spike in violence that did occur in the city over the last 24 hours," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV told reporters. "And a large portion of those … are from murder, execution-style-type activity."

The grim toll came one day after the discovery of 60 bodies in Baghdad's streets and dozens of other slayings in and around the capital.

Caldwell, however, said that areas such as the troubled Dora district in south Baghdad had seen major improvements in security. "If you go down to the Dora area … where they've focused the operations and continue to operate today, you can walk very freely through that area," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0063490

But nearly half of the corpses found in Baghdad on Thursday had been dumped on Dora's outskirts. All of those victims wore handcuffs and had torture marks and bullet holes where they had been shot at close range, Iraqi police Capt. Mohammed Hanoon said.

In other violence, a suicide bomber detonated an explosives-laden truck near an electrical substation on Baghdad's western outskirts, killing two U.S. soldiers. The concussion and shrapnel from the blast injured 25 other soldiers even though the explosion occurred outside thick concrete blast walls, U.S. Army spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said.

It wasn't immediately clear why the soldiers were at the substation, or whether the bombing had any effect on the power supply in Baghdad.

The military reported that two other soldiers had died in the capital on Thursday; one was shot to death in southeast Baghdad and another was killed by a roadside bomb.

And a U.S. soldier in the northern city of Mosul was shot Wednesday and died after being taken to a military hospital, a military statement said.

Also Thursday, a car bomb in southeast Baghdad killed nine people, including two Iraqi policemen, and injured 29 other people. Interior Ministry officials also reported that two worshipers were killed when gunmen attacked a mosque with AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenades.

In the northern city of Tall Afar, about 40 miles west of Mosul, a man detonated an explosives vest near a checkpoint, killing one man and injuring three other people.

In the northern oil hub of Kirkuk, gunmen killed a tribal sheik and local councilman named Abdullah Khalaf Azzawi and his son as they were driving home.

The U.S. military also announced a flurry of anti-guerrilla activity in the western province of Al Anbar, a haven for foreign insurgent fighters. Caldwell said U.S. and Iraqi forces had killed 66 suspected insurgents and arrested 830 others this month.

Witnesses said U.S. Marines raided a funeral 20 miles west of Ramadi, where Sunni Arab-led insurgents and U.S. troops have battled for months. After the burial ceremony, U.S. forces arrested at least 60 men at the gathering.

Caldwell also announced that U.S. and Iraqi troops had conducted 25 raids in and around Baghdad, capturing 70 suspected insurgents, including an associate of Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Ayyub Masri.

Caldwell did not release the name of the detainee.

solomon.moore@latimes.com

A General's Candor On Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus led the 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 invasion of Iraq and the first year of the occupation. Then, for 15 months, he took charge of training and equipping Iraqi security forces, and he returned to the United States last year. Army insiders have said they believe he may return to Iraq next year, perhaps as the replacement for the senior general there, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. Yesterday Petraeus had this to say about sectarian tensions in Iraq, in response to questions at the Brookings Institution:

The February bombing of the gold-domed mosque in Samarra was "hugely harmful" and a "very, very devastating blow" to security efforts, he said. "It took the gloves off the . . . Shia militia," starting "a downward spiral that is very hard to arrest. . . . It's had a horrific effect on the security situation," he said, evidenced by the violence in Baghdad that is "played out sadly day after day."

One of the most serious effects of the upswing in sectarian fighting is that it is "tearing at the efforts to restore the rule of law," he said, adding that it is vital to ensure that Iraqi army units are not "infected" by sectarianism.

Iraq Official Says Syrian Help Needed (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

The Associated Press, September 15, 2006

Iraq will spend more on jobs and reconstruction to battle the insurgency in the restive west, but neighboring Syria must clamp down on terrorists crossing the border, Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh said Thursday.

Saleh met with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and told a Pentagon news conference he did not request more American troops for Anbar province because that would be a military decision.

A senior American commander in Iraq, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said this week the military can't defeat insurgents in Anbar with current troops levels — and that political and reconstruction progress is needed to win over people in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0063491

Saleh said it is important to "get our Syrian neighbors to behave more responsibly ... and to clamp down on the presence and activity of some of the former regime leaders who are presently in Syria, as well as some of the terrorists that are going across the borders."

The U.S. and Iraqi governments have long accused Syria of not doing enough to stop insurgents crossing into Iraq to fight U.S. troops. Syria denies that, saying it is impossible to fully control the long desert border.

For his government's part, Saleh said, officials are working to build up Iraqi security forces and are working with tribal chiefs in Anbar to make the "environment ... less permissible for these terrorists and extremists to act."

"And we need to move in fast with economic reconstruction," said Saleh, who was meeting later Thursday with Vice President Dick Cheney.

"I personally met with the governor of Anbar 10 days ago or so. And we have agreed to release a lot of funds," he said. "We need to do a lot more to make sure that people will see benefit with security, as well. It's not just a matter of security operations. People need to see reconstruction and they need jobs being made and so on."

Saleh laid out a timetable for legislation over the next six months that he said also will move Iraq forward, saying for instance that by the end the year it will pass a law that will distribute oil wealth to all sectors of Iraqi society.

Kurds in the north and some Shiite Muslims in southern Iraq — Iraq's two chief oil regions — want regional control over oil production and revenues. But Iraq's Sunni Muslims and much of the Baghdad government want to maintain national control over Iraq's petroleum resources.

Other legislation will focus on investment law, disarming and demobilizing private militias blamed for much of the violence in Iraq and reforming the de-Baathification commission. That body worked on purging members of Saddam Hussein's ousted Baath Party from the military and government, a move some believe helps fuel the insurgency.

In A Volatile Region Of Iraq, U.S. Military Takes Two Paths (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

AL-FURAT, Iraq -- With a biker's bandanna tied under his helmet, the Special Forces team sergeant gunned a Humvee down a desert road in Iraq's volatile Anbar province. Skirting the restive town of Hit, the team of a dozen soldiers crossed the Euphrates River into an oasis of relative calm: the rural heartland of the powerful Albu Nimr tribe.

Green Berets skilled in working closely with indigenous forces have enlisted one of the largest and most influential tribes in Iraq to launch a regional police force -- a rarity in this Sunni insurgent stronghold. Working deals and favors over endless cups of spiced tea, they built up their wasta -- or pull -- with the ancient tribe, which boasts more than 300,000 members. They then began empowering the tribe to safeguard its territory and help interdict desert routes for insurgents and weapons. The goal, they say, is to spread security outward to envelop urban trouble spots such as Hit.

But the initial progress has been tempered by friction between the team of elite troops and the U.S. Army's battalion that oversees the region. At one point this year, the battalion's commander, uncomfortable with his lack of control over a team he saw as dangerously undisciplined, sought to expel it from his turf, officers on both sides acknowledged.

The conflict in the Anbar camp, while extreme, is not an isolated phenomenon in Iraq, U.S. officers say. It highlights two clashing approaches to the war: the heavy focus of many regular U.S. military units on sweeping combat operations; and the more fine-grained, patient work Special Forces teams put into building rapport with local leaders, security forces and the people -- work that experts consider vital in a counterinsurgency.

"This war was fought with a conventional mind-set. The conventional units are bogged down in cities doing the same old thing," said the Special Forces team's 44-year-old sergeant, who like all the Green Berets interviewed was not allowed to be quoted by name for security reasons. "It's not about bulldozing Hit, driving through with a tank, with all the kids running away. . . . These insurgencies are defeated by personal relationships."

The real battles, he said, are unfolding "in a sheik's house, squatting in the desert eating with my right hand and smoking Turkish cigarettes and trying to influence tribes to rise up against an insurgency."Cutting Deals

Under the glittering chandeliers of his newly remodeled salon, Sheik Jubair adjusted his fine, white cotton dishdasha , or traditional robe, and lit a cigarette.

As if on cue, the American team sergeant leaned over and handed him an ashtray.

The 63-year-old sheik is the de facto ruler of the Albu Nimr, a wealthy tribe whose influence stretches from Anbar's violent capital of Ramadi up the Euphrates to Haditha. Jubair knows the U.S. military needs his tribe as much as it needs the military. Shunned in the 1990s for plotting against Saddam Hussein, the tribe backed the U.S.-led overthrow of Hussein in 2003. But Jubair now faces threats from Anbar's entrenched Sunni Arab insurgency, which he said put a $5 million bounty on his head.

DOJ_NMG_0063492

Week after week, the team has spent long hours cultivating Jubair -- funding his projects, buying his son a PlayStation, even holding his hand during treatment at a U.S. military hospital for an infected toe. In return, Jubair has supplied hundreds of police and army recruits, as well as intelligence targeting insurgents in the region.

During a recent visit at his home in al-Furat, Jubair pressed the team sergeant for a hospital, a gas station, a school, payment for a damaged car and a mosque. "We don't do mosques," the sergeant replied.

One minute the tough and temperamental Jubair was unbuttoning his shirt to show off a wound acquired in the Iran-Iraq war. The next, he was pouting because the American team dared visit his nephew and rival, Sheik Hatem, a.k.a. the "boy king," who officially heads the tribe and lives in the same compound.

"He's young and doesn't know anything," Jubair scolded the team sergeant. "If you give him projects, I will close the city council and come here!"

For the Americans, such engagement is as vital as it can be maddening. "Sometimes I feel like I'm dealing with teenagers," the sergeant said. "They even do the 'mom' and 'dad' thing with me" and the team captain.

It's also work that involves keen judgment and knowing when to cut deals. After the team arrived in January, it captured a former police colonel accused of stealing cars and $60,000 in pay and killing another police officer. But when the colonel was detained and sent to Abu Ghraib prison, sheiks Jubair and Hatem pleaded for his release. "They said you will increase your wasta and all that," the team sergeant said, "so we secured his release, a controlled release."

The compromise helped win the tribe's backing for a local police force. But it also heightened frictions with the U.S. Army battalion, whose convoy transporting the detainee had hit a roadside bomb.A Clash of Cultures

Every night like clockwork at the U.S. military camp -- known as a forward operating base, or FOB -- outside Hit, a loudspeaker atop the Special Forces team house blasts an alert that the Army battalion is about to shoot off flares.

"Attention on the FOB! Attention on the FOB!" a male voice boomed one recent night. "There will be an illumination mission in 10 minutes. Go Cowboys!"

"I've tried to figure out a way to cut that wire," the team sergeant muttered as he stood on the roof, bemoaning the battalion's predictable tactics.

The clash of military cultures was apparent from the start in late January, when the Special Forces team captain, scruffy after days in the desert, arrived at the Hit camp and introduced his team's mission to Lt. Col. Thomas Graves, commander of the 1st Battalion, 36th Infantry Regiment. Graves, a close-shaven West Point graduate from Texas, said nothing and walked away, according to team members.

"We grow our hair a little longer," the team sergeant said. "We wear mustaches, and the conventional Army doesn't want to deal with you because they look at you as undisciplined. We're the most disciplined force in the Army!"

To Graves, the problem boiled down to communication and his battalion's limited, or "tactical," control over the Special Forces. "It's not that they have long hair. I don't care if they're frickin' from Mars," said Graves in the camp's chow hall. "They have a responsibility to tell us what they were doing, but they refuse to do it."

Graves said the Green Berets and their Iraqi army scout platoon once shot at his tanks; he said he never investigated the incident but declined to explain why. Concern over his troops' safety led him to initiate steps to remove the team, he said, adding, "I don't care if you're frickin' naked, just don't shoot at my tanks!"Training Iraqi Forces

At a desert firing range outside Hit, a squad of Iraqi army scouts attacked a line of silhouetted targets, emptying their AK-47 assault rifles and then switching effortlessly to pistols. Next, they practiced sweeping a room, pivoting through the doorway and shouting bursts of Arabic.

Training foreign military forces is a core Special Forces mission -- and the top priority of the U.S. command in Iraq. The Iraqi scout platoon, recruited from the Albu Nimr tribe and coached by the team in Hit, displayed an agility and confidence unusual among Iraqi soldiers. And the Americans fostered loyalty in the platoon.

"We've been to their homes, we've treated their children. They are our partners," said the team captain, an energetic officer from Los Angeles.

"We walk with them as brothers," said Mokles Ali Muklif, the Iraqi platoon leader.

But last spring, when the scouts spotted a roadside bomb during a solo mission and warned U.S. forces about it, they were detained by Graves's battalion, blindfolded and forced to sit in bitter cold for seven hours before the team could secure their release. "I was livid," the team sergeant said.

Later, when the Special Forces team offered to give advanced training to the entire Iraqi army battalion, Graves rejected the idea. Morale continued to drop in the Iraqi battalion, its manpower down to 60 percent after hundreds of soldiers quit over lack of pay, poor food and duty far from home. "We could have had the battalion conducting unilateral ops, and 1-36 could be sitting back at the firm base," the team captain said.

DOJ_NMG_0063493

Instead, the team threw all its energy into mobilizing the Albu Nimr tribe behind a police force -- first in its territory of al-Furat, then in the broader region including the contested town of Hit.A Recruiting Drive

Col. Falah Salah Shimra, 41, a portly tribesman with an imposing demeanor, examined the charred shell of a police station destroyed by a bomb planted on the roof.

Chief of al-Furat's growing tribal police contingent of several hundred men, Shimra minimized the attack on his fledgling force. "Basically, within our area we have no threat at all," he said. "The threat is from outside."

Nearby, tribal police manned a checkpoint, wearing blue shirts as uniforms. None had body armor. Most used their own rifles and ammunition and patrolled in their own vehicles. Many had gone for months without wages until the Special Forces team helped cut through red tape and graft to secure their full pay in July.

Once they get more equipment, Shimra said, he plans "to extend our security all around Hit and get rid of the insurgents."

Indeed in July, backing from tribal leaders led to Hit's first successful police recruiting drive.

"We knew there would be no people in Hit, so to facilitate success we put out word in al-Furat," the team sergeant said.

But a dispute emerged when Graves decided to "lock down" Hit with tanks and hold the recruiting drive at a frequently mortared U.S. combat outpost inside the town rather than in a safer tribal area across the Euphrates. "It's the most dialed-in place!" said the team sergeant, whose men narrowly missed being struck by a mortar shell during the drive.

In the end, only three Hit residents volunteered. But about 150 tribesmen crossed the river to sign up. Graves said he considered the police recruitment to be one of the U.S. military's biggest achievements in his area, and he acknowledged the Special Forces team's help in enlisting the tribesmen. "They deserve credit for that," he said of the team, whose tour ended last month.

The Special Forces soldiers realize there are drawbacks to relying on the tribe, which is focused on protecting its own territory and interests and which imposes tribal law that can undercut civil authority. Every decision, from firing a policeman to averting revenge killings, requires the sanction of tribal leaders such as Jubair. But the reality in Anbar, the team captain said, is either to "engage the tribes . . . or leave them to the will of the insurgency."

Iraqis Feel Weight Of High Prices, Few Jobs (CSM)

By Dan Murphy And Awadh al-taiee

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

CAIRO AND BAGHDAD

When the top Marine commander in Iraq addressed criticism that US forces appeared to be losing the political, if not the military, fight in Anbar Province recently, he said that success rests as much on restoring a measure of economic stability and basic services as it does on ending Iraq's sectarian bloodshed.

"Economic development and the establishment of social order and public services ... are the conditions which must be set that will result in the support of the local people, and ultimately cause the defeat of this terrorist-backed insurgency," Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said earlier this week.

But Iraq's economy is weaker than at any point since the US invasion. Some estimate joblessness at 60 percent (the CIA shows a 30 percent rate for 2005), and prices for foodstuffs and basic goods have doubled - and in some cases tripled - since 2003.

Earlier this month, Iraq's planning minister, Ali Baban, said the rise in the consumer price index (CPI) - the basket of goods and services used to measure inflation - increased by nearly 70 percent in July compared with 12 months earlier. In July 2005, the CPI rose by 30 percent.

While the daily death toll frightens Iraqis - it topped 100 in the past two days alone - the country's economic grind is eroding the standards of living of millions of Iraqis and leading to mounting frustration in a country where the average monthly wage is less than $200.

Take Ahmed Obeidi, who saw an improvement in his life immediately following the war but now says he goes to sleep at night terrified about his family's prospects. Until 2003, he was a mason whose tiny daily wage - about $2 - nevertheless was enough to keep his wife and three children clothed and fed.

After the war, he picked up construction work on US-funded projects. Prices rose that first year, but his daily wages had soared to $10, allowing him to save small amounts for the first time in his life. But as security in Baghdad collapsed starting in early 2004, opportunities to work dried up.

Soaring prices reflected the lack of security. Oil smugglers took advantage of rising corruption and distracted security services, and the cost of hauling goods rose to reflect the risks of ambush. Significant US reconstruction spending was deflected to security: Of more than $12 billion spent through the middle of this year, at least $4 billion went to security.

DOJ_NMG_0063494

That doesn't take into account informal security arrangements. Long-haul truckers in Baghdad, food wholesalers, and even local retail shops say small weekly protection payments to corrupt cops and militias have become standard.

Now, Mr. Obeidi is happy to find five days of work a month. "I don't know what we'll do if the five days ... run out," he says. "The only jobs are [with] the police or the Army, but I can't join because of my age. I don't have a degree, so a government job isn't an option. I feel like my whole life is collapsing gradually with the country."

Yet, as Baghdad residents, the Obeidis are fortunate. While the price of bread has almost tripled, the price of meat has doubled, and prices for gas and electricity increased nearly four-fold, those in major cities are eating better than their rural counterparts.

A report sponsored by the UN's World Food Program late last year found that nationwide, 1 in 4 Iraqi children under age 5 suffered from either "acute or chronic malnutrition." The number was 1 in 3 in rural areas in the south.

Iraq's economic problems pose a great conundrum for policymakers. Usually when wages are flat and unemployment high, prices are stable, because consumption also stays flat. In developed economies like the US, inflation walks hand-in-hand with economic growth and job creation. But in Iraq, violence is driving the price increases, destroying jobs and testing a social net that was already weak before the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime. Economic despair, in turn, generates new recruits for the sectarian militias most responsible for the economic decline.

Falah Hassan works in a small grocery store in western Baghdad for about 7,000 dinars, or $5, a day. He says he asked his boss for higher wages to compensate for higher prices, but understood why he said no. "Our customers are dwindling, and they buy less when they do come in."

Trained as a butcher, he says he was recently offered $10 a day to work in a meat market near Baghdad's Adhamiyah neighborhood, a stronghold for Sunni Arab insurgents, but says the dangers of traveling the four miles to his new place of work outweighed any potential benefit.

"I'd love the money, but what are the chances I'll get killed if I travel those roads to work? Then my family would have nothing," he says. "If this continues, soon we'll be like ants, eating what we can find by the side of the road."

Like many Baghdadis, he blames the economic situation on the government's security failures. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki came to office this year promising to flood Baghdad's streets with Iraqi and local troops, and restore safety. But July was the second-deadliest month on record - belying US and Iraqi government claims that their efforts were making progress.

"We're a country rich with oil and yet we have children who are starving," says Mr. Hassan. "I don't know of a better measure of a government's failure than when it's people don't get enough to eat."

Judge Tells Hussein, 'You Are Not A Dictator' (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 — The chief judge in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein assured the defendant on Thursday that he was "not a dictator," a day after a court prosecutor demanded the judge be removed for showing bias toward Mr. Hussein and letting him harangue witnesses.

One witness, a Kurdish farmer, testified that in 1988 he had pleaded with Mr. Hussein for the life of his wife and seven young children. He said a furious Mr. Hussein shouted, "Shut up and get out."

In court, Mr. Hussein jumped up to defend himself.

"Why did he try to see Saddam Hussein?" he asked the judge, referring to himself in the third person, as is his habit in court. "Wasn't Saddam a dictator and an enemy to the Kurdish people, as they say?"

The judge replied: "I will answer you: you are not a dictator. Not a dictator," he repeated. "You were not a dictator."

Mr. Hussein, smiling, replied, "Thank you."

The judge said: "The people or those who are around the official make him a dictator, and it is not just you. This is the case all over the world." The judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, is a Shiite who had served as a judge in Mr. Hussein's government.

Mr. Hussein and six other former high-ranking officials are charged in connection with the killing of at least 50,000 Kurds, including many in chemical weapon strikes in a 1988 military campaign to eliminate them from the mountainous parts of Iraq's far northeast.

The courtroom exchange happened on a day in which 49 bodies were found, apparently killed, around Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said.

Five American soldiers also died in fighting on the outskirts of Baghdad and in northern Iraq, the military said.

Also Thursday, an Iraqi deputy prime minister, Barham Salih, said officials here would introduce legislation in Parliament next month to disarm Shiite militias that have stoked an ongoing cycle of sectarian violence in Baghdad and throughout Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0063495

Mr. Salih, speaking to reporters in Washington, cast the legislation as an advanced step in a process that is already under way to urge militia leaders, foremost among them Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric who controls the Mahdi Army, to give up their weapons.

"There are discussions with Moktada Sadr and other political leaders in the country that they all have to make a choice," Mr. Salih said. "Either they are part of the political process and renounce arms and integrate into the country's political system and governing institutions, or the present situation will not be acceptable."

Mr. Sadr's militia is estimated to include up to 20,000 fighters, drawn mostly from poor Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and larger cities in Iraq's south. A competing Shiite militia created and trained in Iran, the Badr Organization, has about 5,000 men, American officials have said.

On Thursday, though, American military units and Iraqi Army and police forces began "clearing operations" in the Shaab and Ur neighborhoods, two districts controlled by the Mahdi Army.

South of Baghdad, elements of Mr. Sadr's militia clashed Thursday with Iraqi troops and the police, injuring a number of police officers and civilians, police and army officers said.

In Diwaniya, about 150 miles south of Baghdad, a joint Iraqi and American patrol raided a Sadr office around 2 a.m., said Brig. Abdul Khaliq Badir Lafta, commander of the Diwaniya police.

The raid ultimately led to a three-hour exchange of gunfire between militia forces and Iraqi police commandos, he said. At one point, armed Mahdi Army fighters tried to storm the governor's building and were repelled by police commandos, said Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanimi, commander of the Eighth Iraqi Army Division in Diwaniya.

'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein During Genocide Trial (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 -- The judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial told the toppled Iraqi leader on Thursday that he wasn't "a dictator," one day after prosecutors accused the judge of bias and demanded his resignation.

Judge Abdullah al-Amiri made the comment shortly after the court heard emotional testimony from a Kurdish farmer who said Hussein told him to "shut up and get out" when he begged the Iraqi president to spare the lives of his wife and seven young children, who were taken into custody in 1988.

Hussein challenged the farmer's testimony, asking, "Why did he try to see Saddam Hussein [if] Saddam Hussein was a dictator and was against the Kurdish people?" according to the Associated Press.

Amiri said from the bench: "You are not a dictator. You were not a dictator. However, the people or the individuals and officials surrounding you created a dictator. It was not you in particular. It happens all over the world."

"Thank you," Hussein replied.

On Wednesday, prosecutors called for Amiri's resignation, saying he had allowed "defendants to go too far, with unacceptable expressions and words" and had "allowed the defendants to treat the chamber as a political forum," according to a pool report.

In a news conference Thursday, Iraqi High Tribunal spokesman Raed Juhi sought to control any damage that the judge's comments might have inflicted on the tribunal's ability to impartially try Hussein.

"The court will continue with its neutrality and its course. The judge is only human," Juhi said. "At the end, the judge will decide guilty or not guilty based on the evidence. This has no effect on the case."

Hussein, Ali Hassan al-Majeed, also known here as "Chemical Ali," and other co-defendants are facing charges of perpetrating atrocities against Kurdish villagers in northeastern Iraq during the so-called Anfal campaign in 1987 and 1988. They stand accused of killing 50,000 to 100,000 Kurds, many of them with poison gas.

Meanwhile, in the southern town of Diwaniyah, U.S. and Iraqi troops stormed the office of radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in a pre-dawn raid. Sahib al-Amiri, a Sadr aide, said the soldiers took computers from the office and some weapons from office guards but did not take anyone into custody. A U.S. military spokesman confirmed that the raid occurred but did not provide details.

Later Thursday morning, Sadr loyalists headed to the governor's office in Diwaniyah to protest the raid, but guards shot at the people and into the air to drive them away, Amiri said. Several protesters, he said, were wounded.

Elsewhere, a car bomb exploded Thursday morning near a Shiite mosque in northwest Baghdad's Hurriyah neighborhood, killing three people and wounding 15 and causing damage to the mosque, according to Col. Abdulrahman Awaiyed of the Interior Ministry.

A second car bomb detonated near the passport office in central Baghdad, killing three guards and wounding 17 civilians, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0063496

Officials in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, announced plans to start a security operation modeled after the one being carried out in some of Baghdad's most volatile neighborhoods to tame sectarian violence. The campaign in Basra, where British forces have responsibility for security, is expected to pull British troops from across the theater and send them from neighborhood to neighborhood. Basra is plagued by rising crime and power struggles between Shiite political parties backed by militias.

British and U.S. officials said the effort will also concentrate on reforming police stations in targeted neighborhoods by weeding out police who are loyal to Shiite militias or involved in crime. "We have to dare to say an institution is corrupted," said Abdal al-Jhabar, a deputy interior minister for southern Iraq. "We have to clean this up."

'You Were Not A Dictator,' Judge Tells Hussein At Trial (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

The comment is likely to renew the prosecution's call that the jurist step down from the case.

BAGHDAD — The chief judge in Saddam Hussein's trial for genocide against Iraq's Kurdish population said in court Thursday that the deposed Iraqi president had not been a dictator.

The comment seemed sure to raise anew prosecution objections about the judge, Abdullah Amiri, a veteran Iraqi jurist who has drawn praise in court from Hussein this week.

On Wednesday, the chief prosecutor, Munqith Faroon, asked that the judge step down because, Faroon said, he had allowed Hussein to turn the proceeding into a political forum.

The exchange Thursday came during the testimony of a Kurdish villager, Abdullah Mohammed Hussein, 49, the latest in a series of witnesses to describe Iraqi military abuses during the Anfal military campaign in the late 1980s.

The campaign left as many as 100,000 Kurds dead and is the origin of the charges against Hussein and six codefendants.

As he faced Hussein in court, Mohammed Hussein said he had once met with the former Iraqi president when he made his way to Baghdad to ask about the fate of his missing wife and children.

Mohammed Hussein's unusual testimony prompted Hussein to question how it was possible that a supposed "dictator" like himself would have agreed to an audience with a humble Kurd like Mohammed Hussein.

"You were not a dictator," said the judge, who also served as a jurist during Hussein's rule.

Hussein went silent for a moment, as if he himself could not believe what he had heard, prompting the judge to repeat, "You weren't a dictator."

The judge did not make clear exactly what he meant, and he and Hussein soon moved on to other topics.

The Kurd said the Iraqi army offensive had caused him to lose track of his wife, Aysha, and seven of his children, the youngest being a baby girl, Shleer, just over 3 months old. He said Iraqi forces who invaded his village, Sedir, took all eight into custody.

"I did not know what had happened to my wife and children," said Mohammed Hussein, who testified that he escaped into Iran with son Ali, 9.

Six months later, after an amnesty was issued for Kurds, Mohammed Hussein said, he returned to Iraq and enlisted in the army. But he said doubt haunted him about the fate of his family, and he seized upon the idea of going to Baghdad to see Hussein.

Once in the capital, Mohammed Hussein said, he made his way to the presidential office and asked for an interview with Hussein, who would occasionally see ordinary petitioners in an effort to project a magnanimous image.

The Kurd said he was told to write a formal request and, three days later, was ushered into an office to meet with Hussein.

"I prayed to Allah to put mercy in Saddam's heart, so that he would release my loved ones," Mohammed Hussein testified.

However, Mohammed Hussein said, Hussein became agitated once he told him that his family had been detained during the offensive in Kurdistan.

" 'They were just lost within the Anfal wave!' " Mohammed Hussein quoted Hussein as telling him.

Mohammed Hussein said he pressed the president on the point.

" 'Do not talk!' " the witness said Hussein then told him. " 'Get out of here!' "

Mohammed Hussein said he saluted the Iraqi leader and left, but had a feeling Hussein would release his relatives. It never happened.

Several years later, Mohammed Hussein said, he was informed that Kurdish authorities had discovered three identity cards while excavating a mass grave. Among them, he said, were the documents of his wife and sons Nasir and Jamal.

Hussein seemed suspicious of the Kurd's account and asked if the witness had kept a copy of the interview request submitted to the office of the presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0063497

Mohammed Hussein said no: "Saddam took it from me."
patrick.mcdonnell@ latimes.com
Times staff writer Suhail Ahmed contributed to this report.

The Right Troops In The Right Places (NYT)

By Seth Moulton
The New York Times, September 15, 2006

APPROACHING the city of Karbala last year for a meeting with a local Iraqi Army commander, my convoy of four Army Humvees came across hundreds of bearded men in green camouflage uniforms lining the road. They were directing traffic and searching vehicles for bombs — good things — and they waved us through, just as Iraqi security forces should.

But we don't issue green uniforms to Iraqi troops.

After the meeting, I sent an e-mail message to my headquarters in Baghdad, asking whether an entire Iraqi battalion, usually 700 to 1,000 soldiers, had been newly authorized for this relatively peaceful province.

Of course, it hadn't. This was another new militia. And even though the militia had already been approved by Iraqi officials, and recruited, outfitted and deployed in daily operations, no senior American commander in Baghdad knew about it.

Still, it wasn't hard to explain how this could happen in Karbala, a major city just two hours from Baghdad. There were hardly any Americans there.

The last American base in Karbala was closed in the summer of 2005. Ostensibly our departure was a victory — an area turned over to Iraqi control. The American troops weren't sent home, though; they were simply shifted north to a town near Falluja, where they were needed more.

For most of 2005, I worked for the American commander in charge of training Iraqi security forces. My job was to keep tabs on Iraqi troops in several provinces south of Baghdad that were mostly Iraqi-controlled. As a young Marine lieutenant, I was honored to have the responsibility, but it was a sign of how thinly our forces are stretched. My team of two marines could have used about 50 more.

Time and again I watched as American forces drew down, and militias blossomed in the resulting power vacuum. The first provinces we are handing over to our Iraqi counterparts are in the heart of the Shiite south, an area where anti-American violence is minimal but ethnic hatred is brewing.

Sunni insurgents started attacking Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of all Iraqis, to destabilize the new Iraqi government. The Shiites' ethnic-based response, however, carried out by their militias, is what ignited the deeply sectarian violence that now threatens outright civil war. The premature departure of American troops from the places where the militias were born only feeds their growth. A good Iraqi friend from the area told me recently that Iraqis now call this time "the militia era."

In the long term, we must withdraw American troops, and replacing them with capable Iraqi forces is the right way to do it. But there are two serious problems with how we are putting this strategy into effect.

First, despite all rhetoric in Washington to the contrary, American commanders are being pressured to meet timelines rather than encouraged to wait until Iraqi forces are ready. "Standing up" Iraqi troops is not enough; they must be well-trained.

Second, our strategy is based on consolidating American forces in huge megabases as a means to reduce numbers and, as advocated by several members of Congress, to "move to the periphery." This is exactly the opposite of what has been prescribed for decades to fight a counterinsurgency, or to squelch a fomenting civil war.

American military advisers, and the Green Berets they take after, are our greatest assets in Iraq because they are a model for how to fight insurgents and build indigenous forces. Our advisers teach the Iraqi troops everything from physical fitness to urban warfare tactics, and mentor their officers in leadership and mission planning.

I once visited an Iraqi base where a combination of officer corruption and insurgent activity had led to a severe water shortage. An entire battalion was ready to quit, but the Green Berets embedded with the Iraqis encouraged them to stay while they pressed for a solution — and endured the shortage alongside the Iraqi soldiers. The battalion remained intact, and we discovered new problems with the Iraqi supply system and new tactics of local insurgents.

Our advisers can also thwart militia attempts to infiltrate the Iraqi units, and are better able to judge when the Iraqis are competent to take over. Most important, while sharing intelligence and conducting joint operations, these small groups of American soldiers and marines develop the trust of their Iraqi soldiers and the local populace. Our growing megabases do anything but.

So, what should we do? The obvious prescription to stop the rising violence is more troops, but the wrong kinds of soldiers and tactics only alienate the Iraqi people, strengthening the insurgency. On top of that, the Army and Marine Corps don't have any extra troops to send. President Bush recently sent more American forces back into Baghdad, another place where militias took over after United States troops were withdrawn too quickly. But they too have to come from somewhere, and in turn we should expect those areas to become more violent.

DOJ_NMG_0063498

This makes it all the more important to use the troops we have as effectively as possible.

We need more military advisers, including both Special Forces teams and specially trained conventional units. Our precious few Special Forces troops must focus on mentoring Iraqi troops, rather than on the more exciting diversion of unilateral raids. Some of our best Special Forces units were devoted to hunting down the Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, but violence has only increased in the three months since his death. Had that same manpower and money been devoted to training Iraqi troops and stemming the growth of militias, we would have another Iraqi battalion or two ready to take our places.

While consolidating bases is a short-term way to reduce troop requirements, fielding more adviser teams will eventually allow more Americans to come home. American troops embedded with the Iraqis they train usually require less support than conventional units; many rely on the Iraqis for food, shelter and basic defenses. Green Berets in 12-man teams have already replaced entire battalions of conventional forces in some Iraqi cities.

Yet despite the success of advisers, the Army and Marine Corps still have a habit of sending their least capable troops to fill these positions. Many teams have trouble getting essential supplies like weapons and ammunition, even as the Army finds the resources to man speed traps on its ever-growing bases. Only 1 in 30 Americans deployed to Iraq serves as an embedded adviser. We can't win this war from the Burger Kings and rec centers of our largest bases, nor can we afford the thousands of non-combat troops needed to support them.

Iraq's militia problems are likely to get worse before they get better, and only a legitimate Iraqi government can rid the country of them completely. But we must be sure we are fighting the war we say we are. Both problems with our current strategy — not waiting for Iraqi forces to be ready, and consolidating our bases at the expense of classic counterinsurgency tactics like small adviser teams — emanate from the overriding concern for bringing the troops home.

Pushing for withdrawal timelines is not helping the struggle in Iraq; encouraging the military to better fight the insurgency will. After all, winning the war would be the best reason to leave.

Seth Moulton was a Marine infantry officer in Iraq from March toSeptember 2003 and from July 2004 toOctober 2005. He is writing a book about his service.

World Bank Lists Failing Nations That Can Breed Global Terrorism (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The number of weak and poorly governed nations that can provide a breeding ground for global terrorism has grown sharply over the past three years, despite increased Western efforts to improve conditions in such states, according to a new World Bank report.

"Fragile" countries, whose deepening poverty puts them at risk from terrorism, armed conflict and epidemic disease, have jumped to 26 from 17 since the report was last issued in 2003. Five states graduated off the list, but 14 made new appearances, including Nigeria and seven other African countries, Kosovo, Cambodia, East Timor, and the West Bank and Gaza. Twelve states, including Afghanistan, Somalia and Sudan, made both lists.

"Past international engagement with these countries has failed to yield significant improvements," said the assessment released by the World Bank's Independent Evaluation Group, which reports on the bank's programs to the board of directors. It was timed to coincide with the annual meeting of the bank and the International Monetary Fund this month in Singapore.

Hurdles facing the countries at risk, often referred to as "failed" or "failing" states, include "weak security, fractured societal relations, corruption, breakdown in the rule of law, lack of mechanisms for generating legitimate power and authority" and limited investment resources to meet basic needs, the report said.

To avoid "adverse spillover effects -- such as conflict, terrorism and epidemic diseases -- the international community and the Bank need to find more effective ways" of assisting them, it said.

The Bush administration has described failing states as a major threat to U.S. security. "The danger they pose is now unparalleled," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice wrote in a column that appeared late last year in The Washington Post. "Absent responsible state authority, threats that would and should be contained within a country's borders can now melt into the world and wreak untold havoc.

"Weak and failing states," Rice said, "serve as global pathways that facilitate the spread of pandemics, the movement of criminals and terrorists, and the proliferation of the world's most dangerous weapons."

The administration's updated counterterrorism strategy, published earlier this month, set economic development in "failing states or states emerging from conflict" as a key objective.

DOJ_NMG_0063499

Official U.S. foreign assistance to the least developed countries topped $27 billion in 2005, according to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, more than twice the level when Bush took office. That amount places the United States first among international donor nations in terms of absolute dollars, although Washington remains at the bottom when aid is tallied as a percentage of gross national product. The United States also scores higher than many other countries in the percentage of its aid that is spent on security, trade and food supplies rather than on more traditional forms of development efforts.

In a major restructuring, the administration is increasingly directing assistance toward those countries whose governments are judged as heading in a positive direction in terms of institutional and economic development and U.S. security interests.

In 2002, the World Bank launched its own initiative to expand assistance to fragile states and increased its lending to them by 67 percent, to $4.1 billion, between 2003 and 2005. Its report cited a number of lessons learned in the process.

In several countries, there was either too much aid or too little. Assistance from all international donors, the report said, varied from nearly $200 per capita for East Timor to $15 per capita for the Central African Republic. In a number of cases, an influx of aid was not matched by a domestic reform agenda that would allow the country to adequately utilize it.

In other countries, donors demanded too many reforms, too quickly. In Afghanistan, the report said, "donor reforms have not been selective enough and have led to 120 pieces of legislation."

Donors sometimes disagreed about the goals of overlapping aid programs, making it "difficult to achieve policy coherence" in recipient countries, the report said. "In Afghanistan, for example, the Ministry of Finance receives technical assistance for customs modernization from the Bank, USAID, the European Union" and Britain's development aid program.

Terrorism, Here And There (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

For five years, the Bush Administration has repeatedly made the case that the best reason to take the war on terror abroad is so that it need not be waged at home. And for five years, the claim has been ridiculed by those who argue that "the use of heavy military force to transform Muslim societies over there, if you would, is only likely to increase the number of suicide terrorists coming at us," as the University of Chicago's Robert Pape put it last year.

Reality is otherwise. In the current issue of Foreign Policy, Kim Cragin and Andrew Curiel of the Rand Corporation compare the incidence of terrorism world-wide in the four years preceding and following 9/11. Between 1998 and the end of 2001, there were 2,991 fatalities from terrorism in North America, almost all of them on 9/11. Since then, there have been only three.

By contrast, terrorist fatalities are up nearly everywhere else, more than tenfold in the Middle East. The authors of the study say this means that "the rest of the world is paying with their lives" for the U.S. war on terror. But that's an odd way of damning a policy that aims to keep America safe. Even stranger is the suggestion that the U.S. is to blame for al Qaeda's explicit policy of targeting fellow Muslims. Such targeting has long been part of Osama bin Laden's explicit strategy, and his deputy, Ayman al Zawahiri, recently made it clear again when he warned the Gulf States that terror was coming their way.

It's a tragic fact that so many Muslims have been murdered in terrorist atrocities. But it is also the case that Arab regimes such as Saudi Arabia that once tolerated or funded terrorism have belatedly come to recognize its dangers. That's progress for them -- and safety for Americans.

DOJ:

Poetic Justice: DOJ Whistleblower On D.C. Ethics Committee (NLJ)

By Peter Geier, Staff reporter

National Law Journal, September 15, 2006

"Poetic justice" is what a former U.S. Department of Justice ethics attorney calls her appointment to the District of Columbia Bar's legal ethics committee while a disciplinary complaint has been pending against her with the D.C. bar.

And some poetic justice may go a long way for whistleblower Jesselyn A. Radack, who was the subject of a Justice Department complaint before the D.C. Bar's Office of Bar Counsel when she was named in June, 2005 to the committee that advises the bar on the rules of professional conduct.

Radack is the former Justice Department ethics advisor in the case of "American Taliban" John Walker Lindh who quit her government job, lost a private-sector position and was the subject of a criminal investigation, all involving the Lindh case. Saying that she leaked information to the press, the Justice Department referred Radack to the state bars where she is licensed-and was even put on the federal "no-fly" list.

DOJ_NMG_0063500

"Because of this episode, I am dedicating my life to whistleblowers," said Radack, who started work last May at Grayson & Kubli, a private practice in McLean, Va., that handles government contracts, telecommunications and whistleblower law.

She also decided not to pursue the action she filed against DOJ that a federal judge in Washington recently dismissed. [NLJ, Aug. 28].

"I'm in a new job and ready to let go of it," Radack said. "It was empowering to put them on the defensive for once and finally get my version of the events down in a public forum."

Radack claims that she was pushed out of her job as general counsel to DOJ's Office of Professional Responsibility for not playing along with her superiors after federal law enforcement officials disregarded her advice on handling Lindh, dubbed the "American Taliban" when he was captured in Afghanistan.

U.S. District Judge Henry H. Kennedy Jr. recently found that DOJ did not violate its own policy when it sent referral letters to the Maryland and D.C. bars. Radack v. U.S. DOJ, No. 04-1881 (D.D.C.).

Actions 'really scary'

But Radack quoted a footnote in Kennedy's opinion in which he wrote: "It is clear, though, that she has sustained injury in the form of a damaged reputation and reduced employment prospects."

"The scope and breadth of what they are doing is really scary," she said, adding that the outcome of her lawsuit implies that the government "can go after you if it can show that something you did in the private sector that it didn't like relates back to something you did when you were working for them."

Charles S. Miller, spokesman for DOJ, said that the department would say with regard to Radack only that "We're pleased with the court's decision."

Radack lost her civilian job in the Washington office of New York's Hawkins Delafield & Wood after she gave a Newsweek reporter copies of legal memoranda that she had written on the Lindh matter once she suspected that they had disappeared from the file.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III, presiding over the Lindh case, ordered a three-week investigation into how Newsweek got material that had been filed with the court under seal.

Radack claims that the DOJ used Ellis' order as a pretext to get her fired from Hawkins Delafield, place her under criminal investigation, help Hawkins Delafield contest the unemployment compensation she sought, refer her to the state bars where she is licensed and put her on the "no-fly" list.

The "no fly list" identifies people suspected of posing "a risk of air piracy or terrorism or a threat to airline or passenger safety." It is maintained by the Transportation Security Administration, part of the Department of Homeland Security, which the Justice Department oversees.

But time-and Radack-have moved on. The criminal matter was closed without charges being brought, the Maryland bar complaint was dismissed and she is working again.

While her ethics committee appointment will have no bearing on the Office of Bar Counsel's handling of her case, she is nonetheless pleased for the vote of confidence.

"I have lived to fight another day, but it will be other people's fights," she said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Want Enron-linked Convictions Reinstated (AP)

By Kristen Hays

AP, September 15, 2006

Federal Enron prosecutors today asked the entire U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals to hear arguments about reinstating fraud and conspiracy convictions against four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives that a three-judge panel threw out in a split decision last month.

The 2-1 decision slapped the Justice Department by overturning most convictions against the four men, who were found guilty in 2004 of participating in a sham 1999 deal that allowed Enron to post bogus profits.

The three-judge panel ruled that evidence was insufficient to support convictions against one of the Merrill defendants. Regarding the other three, the opinion said prosecutors employed a flawed theory that they deprived Enron of its right to their honest services because, even though the deal was a sham, it was consistent with corporate goals and did not rob the company or shareholders of money or property.

The panel affirmed convictions of perjury and obstruction against one of the three who lied to a grand jury about the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0063501

In today's filing, prosecutors said the reversal "threatens to insulate from punishment proven criminal conduct by corporate employees as long as their fraudulent goals are shared by senior executives, without regard to the obvious interest of a legitimate business entity and its stockholders in the honest services of all corporate employees."

Prosecutors said a rehearing before all 14 5th Circuit judges is warranted to correct the panel's "cramped and unworkable" interpretation of the honest services theory.

Thomas Hagemann, who represents Daniel Bayly, one of the three who was head of investment banking for Merrill, said he wasn't worried that a re-hearing before all 14 5th Circuit judges would make a difference.

"With all due respect to the Justice Department, we remain convinced of the justice and the correctness of the majority opinion's decision on honest services," Hagemann said.

Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University College of Law, said appellate courts, including the 5th Circuit, have examined the honest services issue before with differing opinions. That may prompt the entire 5th Circuit to take another look, she said.

"When courts have trouble deciding whether conduct is within or outside the 'honest services' language of the statute, then how can we expect lay people to know if what they are doing is criminal?" she said. "What really needs to happen here is for Congress to rewrite the law so that it is clear and people know what is legal and what will be considered criminal."

Bayly and James A. Brown, both of Darien, Conn.; Robert Furst, of Dallas; and William Fuhs, of Denver, were each convicted of conspiracy and fraud for helping push through a loan from the brokerage disguised as a purchase of three Enron-owned power plants on barges in Nigeria so the energy company could appear to have met quarterly earnings targets. Brown also was convicted of perjury and obstruction.

The four were sentenced in 2005 to prison terms ranging from 2.5 years to nearly four years.

Fuhs, Bayly and Furst were released from prison on appeal bonds earlier this year, but Brown was not.

A fifth defendant convicted of fraud and conspiracy for helping push through the deal, former mid-level Enron finance executive Dan Boyle, did not appeal and is in prison. A sixth defendant, former in-house Enron accountant Sheila Kahanek, was acquitted.

Former Willbros Exec Pleads Guilty To Bribery (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

HOUSTON — A former executive of a subsidiary of Willbros Group Inc. pleaded guilty Thursday to violating a federal law by conspiring to bribe government officials in Nigeria and Ecuador to obtain gas pipeline work in the two countries, the Justice Department said.

Jim Bob Brown, 44, is to be sentenced Nov. 30 for violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

Brown, who worked for Willbros International Inc. in Nigeria and South America, admitted that he and another Willbros International executive arranged for the payment of about $1.5 million in cash in Nigeria in 2005 as part of a conspiracy to obtain gas pipeline construction business there.

Brown also said he and other Willbros International executives approved of a scheme from at least 1996 to early 2005 in which fictitious invoices were submitted from the company's Nigerian operations. The money was used to make payments to officials with Nigerian revenue agencies and courts to get lower taxes and to influence litigation.

The Justice Department said Brown also admitted that in 2004 he conspired to pay at least $300,000 to officials of the Ecuadorean government oil company to obtain a gas pipeline rehabilitation contract.

HP's Shares Rising Above The Fray (SFC)

By Benjamin Pimentel, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 15, 2006

Despite scandal, company steadily bounces back

Four years ago, Hewlett-Packard's bid to buy Compaq Computer turned into a bitter boardroom battle, jangling nerves on Wall Street and sending the company's stock plunging to as low as $14.

One would think that the current scandal at HP -- with shocking revelations of corporate spying that could possibly lead to criminal charges -- would also rattle investors' confidence in the technology giant.

But that hasn't happened.

Instead, the Palo Alto company, which is considered one of the big comeback stories of the past two years in the tech industry, has managed to remain a favorite of investors. The boardroom scandal has not turned into a material event for the company, at least in Wall Street's eyes.

DOJ_NMG_0063502

For proof of that indifference, look no further than HP's stock, which has remained steady over the past two weeks, trading above $36, up nearly 50 percent from a year ago. It dipped slightly last week at the height of the scandal but steadily bounced back this week.

The stock closed at $36.25, down 12 cents, Thursday. That's just 13 cents below where it was the day the scandal broke last week.

"I personally think this is a big soap opera," analyst Eric Ross of ThinkEquity Partners said of the uproar over the HP board's use of questionable tactics in its probe of directors, journalists and employees involved in suspected media leaks. "Realistically, I just don't think anybody cares."

The lack of reaction on Wall Street also speaks to the financial industry's focus on the bottom line. Some analysts say disputes involving ethics and morals appear to hold little sway when compared with returns.

"That's really what shareholders are looking at -- the financial performance," said Michael Cohen, director of research at Pacific American Securities.

Mark Lanyon of Morningstar portrayed the controversy as "lots of sound and fury" that ultimately will not have a serious impact on financial performance.

Cindy Shaw, an independent financial analyst and former HP employee, said it could be "a bit of a distraction as HP comes down the homestretch of its fiscal year," which ends in October.

"Sales productivity could be impacted if clients want to talk about it, so some business could slip into the following quarter," she said in an e-mail. "I also see minor potential for this to swing buyers that are on the fence between two vendors to decide against HP."

But even such distractions would hurt HP's earnings by only a penny or two this quarter.

"Then, I would expect HP to be off to the races again," she added.

Cohen of Pacific American Securities said he doesn't think the time HP sales representatives spend chatting with customers about the scandal would be a big deal.

"Everyone is going to want to talk about it," he said. "If I was in the field and I'm a buyer and here comes the HP guy, I'm going to see him as a source for 'Let's talk about what's going on.' But even if they spend time shooting the breeze, they usually do that on other topics to keep the networking alive."

He said HP's stock was seriously affected during the battle over the Compaq merger because it involved a transaction that had long-term implications for the company's direction.

"It was a question of the future of the company with two alternate paths, with or without Compaq," he said.

The current scandal "is just board intrigue" that will probably not affect HP's operations.

However, he said, investors could become concerned if charges are filed against HP executives or board members.

The company faces several state and federal investigations, including probes by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, the Justice Department and Congress.

Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to indict people within the company and outside.

"If you start seeing board members being indicted, that could lead to a depression in the stock a little," Cohen said. "But even with indictments, I still think that the financial results of the company will likely remain mostly unaffected."

Ross of ThinkEquity Partners echoed this point, saying the penalties HP could face will likely be insignificant.

"We're talking about probably a drop in the bucket," he said.

Referring to other companies embroiled in recent major scandals, he added: "This is serious stuff, but this isn't Enron or WorldCom."

Another reason for continued investor confidence in HP is that while the scandal has hurt Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, it has left CEO Mark Hurd virtually unscathed.

Dunn spearheaded the disastrous investigation into the media leaks. She will step down from her post in January and will be replaced by Hurd.

Ross noted that a company board's role is to pick members of the management team and define the company's long-term direction -- a role the HP board accomplished with Hurd's hiring.

"Now that Mark Hurd is there, Patricia Dunn has done her job," Ross said. "She brought Mark Hurd in -- she's not needed."

Lerach Sues HP Directors, GC Over Records Scandal (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 15, 2006

It was Thursday afternoon and the press was sweating: For three days no one new had decided to go after Hewlett-Packard's board of directors for their recent descent into public ignominy.

Not to fear, though: At about 4 p.m., plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach joined Congress, the California attorney general, the San Francisco U.S. Attorney, and federal regulators. Representing an HP shareholder, Lerach filed a suit accusing board members and executives of breaching their fiduciary duty for a litany of reasons, including their ongoing use of top Silicon Valley lawyer Larry Sonsini.

Lerach's complaint is the latest result of a mess that began early this year when HP board Chairwoman Patricia Dunn initiated a probe in which an investigator lied to access private phone records of other directors and several journalists.

And while it's not yet clear how state Attorney General Bill Lockyer or U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will proceed -- Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to bring state charges, while Ryan's office met with HP lawyers on Monday -- Lerach's claims are quite explicit in the derivative suit he filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court in California.

The lead partner at Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins argues in the suit that 10 HP board members and executives -- including Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins -- should be forced to pay damages to the company.

Lerach wrote that the defendants "breached their fiduciary duties to HP, committed gross mismanagement, abused their control of HP, and have engaged in a gross dereliction of their duties, as well as corporate waste and attempted enrichment" by seeking to solidify their positions within the company by investigating board members Thomas Perkins and George Keyworth.

The scandal first became public last week when The Wall Street Journal reported on Perkins' ongoing attempt to get HP to admit that he left the company in protest of the investigation.

In that probe, a contractor -- Boston-based Ronald DeLia, according to the Journal and Lerach's complaint -- used pretexts to access the board members' phone records to find out who was leaking information to reporters.

HP spokesman Ryan Donovan wouldn't comment on the suit Thursday. "We normally don't comment on any kind of pending suits," he said. Lawyers at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius representing HP in the federal investigation couldn't be reached by press time.

But Lerach had plenty to say. "It looks like a case of internal board warfare a little bit, and you don't necessarily think of that as a derivative suit," he said. But since the matter blew up publicly, he added, it's become very expensive for the company to handle.

Lerach said that, like most derivative cases, his suit is largely focused on getting better corporate governance protections in place. "But money should not be deemed insignificant," he said. "There's going to be a great cost to this scandal. It ought to be borne by the individuals responsible."

One part of the mess Lerach says is particularly troubling is the board's ongoing reliance on GC Baskins and Sonsini, who Lerach says advised the firm on the leak probe, the subsequent investigation of that probe, and recent board meetings discussing how to deal with the aftermath.

"Throughout the investigation, the controversy surrounding this investigation, HP's SEC disclosures regarding this investigation and its aftermath, the HP board has continued to rely upon the advice and counsel of Baskins, the in-house general counsel of HP, despite the fact that she was personally involved in structuring and implementing the investigation which utilized illegal tactics," the complaint says.

Lerach also wrote that "Wilson Sonsini and Sonsini are conflicted and would be key witnesses and possible defendants in any ultimate legal action," so the board should have sought independent counsel.

A Wilson Sonsini spokeswoman did not return a call for comment by press time.

Lerach said Thursday that state derivative cases tend to move slowly, and he's not yet sure who is representing HP in the case.

"I bet you it won't be Wilson Sonsini," he said.

N.Y. AG's Office Objects To Grasso's Request For New Judge (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 15, 2006

The New York attorney general's office Wednesday filed an objection to former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's request that Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Charles Edward Ramos recuse himself from presiding over the government's excessive pay lawsuit against Grasso.

"Grasso may have been permitted to treat the New York Stock Exchange as a fiefdom for his personal enrichment, picking the members of the Board and placing those over whom he had the most significant regulatory authority on the compensation committee, but he cannot be permitted to pick and choose the judge who will preside over his trial," the government said in its affidavit.

Grasso's attorneys argued in a motion filed last week that Ramos should recuse himself after he participated in ex parte settlement discussions in the case.

They also argued that the judge made factual and legal comments on the case during settlement discussions that would make it difficult for him to preside over the case.

Finally, Grasso said last week that he was unaware that the judge had applied twice for a position at the Stock Exchange and that in his second application Ramos had cited to a case he decided in which he had addressed the issue of excessive compensation.

The government called Grasso's arguments baseless, deceitful and disingenuous. It said Grasso and his attorneys were in fact aware that Justice Ramos had applied twice for a board position at the Exchange.

Hedge Margins Draw The Focus Of Fed Official (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

A top Federal Reserve official believes regulators need to examine whether banks and securities dealers are imposing adequate margin requirements on hedge funds.

Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, believes margin requirements that are sensible in normal times may prove too thin in stressful market conditions and could actually aggravate violent market moves.

While he doesn't assert that margin rules are too low or say what regulators should do, his remarks suggest regulators may soon turn their attention to margin practices after pressing Wall Street to improve how they handle complex and fast-growing credit and equity derivatives.

Mr. Geithner, in remarks to be delivered in a speech in Hong Kong this morning, noted regulators are overhauling rules on how much capital banks must maintain to guard against loan and trading losses. "It is critical," he said, that that effort "be reinforced with more attention by supervisors to margin practice ... within the major financial institutions." An advance copy of Mr. Geithner's remarks was made available yesterday in New York.

Margin requirement refers to the amount of collateral a bank or dealer requires from a client, such as a hedge fund. In the event the client loses money on its position and isn't able to meet its obligations, the bank or dealer can sell the collateral to protect against loss. For example, the initial margin requirement for individual stock investors is 50%, meaning they must put at least half the value of their stock purchase up as cash or some other form of collateral. Big institutional customers typically enjoy far lower margin requirements -- zero in the case of some reputable hedge funds. Once their position turns unprofitable, they are subject to a "margin call," meaning they must post additional collateral.

"Collateral plays an increasingly important role in counterparty credit risk management," Mr. Geithner noted, "particularly for highly leveraged counterparties" such as hedge funds, which are investment pools for wealthy investors that use borrowed money to make big bets on stocks, interest rates, currencies, and other markets. Banks and dealers limit their risks by varying collateral as trading positions move for or against their clients. But he noted that while this makes sense for each individual firm, collectively it can aggravate big moves in the market.

"As financial firms demand more collateral, funds are forced to liquidate positions, adding to volatility and pushing down asset prices, leading to more margin calls and efforts by the major firms to reduce their exposure to future losses," his remarks said.

Mr. Geithner's remarks were part of a broader speech in which he was set to praise the role of hedge funds in making the overall financial system safer and more stable by providing "improved liquidity," or adding to the pool of buyers and sellers in a particular market, making pricing more efficient, and creating a diversity of opinion and new opportunities for investors.

He also was set to note that banks today have capital equal to 8.5% of their assets, a larger cushion against losses than the 6.5% level of the early 1990s. These developments, he said, indicate the financial system is better protected against financial shocks than it was in 1998, when it was rocked by Russia's debt default and the near-failure of hedge fund Long-Term Capital Management.

Still, Mr. Geithner has in the past year increasingly warned of potential weak spots in the financial system and has played a key role in several continuing efforts to fix specific problems. The New York Fed, the Securities and Exchange Commission, Britain's Financial Services Authority and a group of large banks and securities dealers have in recent months worked to clean up extensive back-office problems in the fast-growing market for credit derivatives, which are in essence insurance policies protecting the holder against a corporate default. Those participants will meet Sept. 27 at the New York Fed to assess progress on cleaning up credit derivatives and to tackle similar problems in equity derivatives.

The New York Fed, SEC and FSA also are already jointly assessing large financial institutions' "stress testing," a routine internal test used to see how much money might be lost under stressful market conditions.

Billionaire In Mexico Settles Case With S.E.C. (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0063505

By Elisabeth Malkin

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 14 — The billionaire tycoon Ricardo Salinas Pliego and the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States reached a settlement on Thursday in the first lawsuit against a foreign company under the corporate governance rules of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Mr. Salinas Pliego, who owns Mexico's second-largest broadcaster, TV Azteca, agreed to pay $7.5 million in penalties and compensation to settle accusations of fraud involving a scheme to conceal a deal between a TV Azteca subsidiary and a company secretly owned by Mr. Salinas.

In the settlement, Mr. Salinas Pliego neither admitted or denied wrongdoing. One of his executives, Pedro Padilla Longoria, agreed to pay $1 million.

TV Azteca, which was also a defendant in the case, said in a statement that the settlement "does not entail economic consequences" for the company. Mr. Salinas Pliego had no comment.

Under the agreement, Mr. Salinas Pliego and Mr. Padilla are forbidden to serve as executives or directors of any publicly listed American company. Mr. Salinas Pliego delisted his companies from the New York Stock Exchange last year, arguing that "excessive regulation" was a burden.

The S.E.C. charged Mr. Salinas Pliego with fraud in January 2005 in connection with a debt deal involving what was then the cellphone unit of TV Azteca. A company called Codisco, secretly owned by Mr. Salinas Pliego and a partner, bought discounted debt owed by the cellphone unit.

The cellphone unit later paid back the debt at full price to Codisco. Mr. Salinas Pliego and his partner each made a profit of $109 million.

Mr. Salinas Pliego did not reveal his involvement in Codisco to his board and to regulators until TV Azteca's lawyer in New York resigned at the end for 2003. That led to investigations by the S.E.C. and the National Banking and Securities Commission of Mexico.

The S.E.C. also accused Mr. Salinas Pliego and his executives of engaging "in an elaborate scheme to conceal Salinas's role," and said that Mr. Salinas Pliego sold TV Azteca stock while his involvement in the debt deal remained undisclosed.

Another executive, Luis Echarte, settled earlier with the S.E.C.

Mr. Salinas Pliego has argued that the debt deal was legal and that his actions helped save the cellphone unit.

The executive, who is not related to former President Carlos Salinas, has a reputation for using his successful companies — which include a national chain of furniture and appliance stores and a bank — to finance unrelated projects.

Through local affiliates, Mr. Salinas Pliego is building a Spanish-language television network in the United States.

Last year, Mr. Salinas Pliego paid $2.3 million in fines to Mexican regulators. Corporate governance advocates in Mexico saw the case as a test of Mexico's new securities laws, which include criminal penalties. Mr. Salinas Pliego was never prosecuted.

The SEC-Saw (WSJ)

By Ira M. Millstein And Harvey J. Goldschmid

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Shareholder access is officially back on the agenda at the SEC, forced there by a recent court decision. And this time around the SEC should seize the opportunity to craft a solution that opens up the proxy to shareholders in a sensible way, a solution that ensures board accountability to shareholders.

The decision last week by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit paved the way for shareholders to propose bylaw amendments allowing shareholders to nominate directors and for those nominations to be included on the company's proxy. The decision turned on the court's analysis of an SEC rule allowing exclusion of any proposal that "relates to an election" and the various interpretations given to that rule by the SEC over the years. The SEC has since announced that it will develop a proposed amendment to that rule and will hold an open meeting on Oct. 18, 2006, to consider the proposal.

This isn't the first time the SEC has considered this issue. Most recently, in October 2003, it proposed new rules for shareholder access to company proxy material. Those rules were designed to shift the balance of power between corporate managements and shareholders, by giving dissatisfied majorities of shareholders a meaningful role in the election process without the need to embark on an expensive proxy contest. Under the process then and now in effect, there are virtually no contested elections for the boards of large public corporations in the U.S. The analogy is to elections in the Soviet Union.

The SEC's proposed rules in 2003 generated an enormous amount of vigorous debate. It even led indirectly to reform in the area of majority voting through the urgings of institutional investors and governance thought-leaders. But the proposed rules themselves never progressed to "final." This occurred for a variety of reasons, including concerns about complexity and potential for abuse by obstructionists, to pure management self-interest in ensuring that director elections remained under company lock and key.

DOJ_NMG_0063506

The October 2003 proposed rules may have stalled, but the reasons they were proposed in the first place are all around us still. Shareholders are still the providers of capital in our economy. They are still responsible for electing directors who will improve performance. And they still lack a meaningful avenue of bringing about mid-course corrections when management is ineffective or wrongheaded and the board is compliant. They still need an avenue to making themselves felt.

The court's decision has opened the door for the SEC to think again about shareholder access and its importance for corporate efficiency, honesty, productivity and profitability. The SEC should strive for a solution that gives shareholders a voice in the director election process. Its recommendation should include safeguards such as minimum holding requirements that may be necessary to ensure that access opportunities are not abused by shareholders with non-efficiency or obstructionist motivations. A uniform approach to shareholder access is key to achieving a balanced result and avoiding the confusion and delay that can reign when ad hoc development by too many cooks is permitted to occur (as with majority voting reform, for example).

We urge the SEC to balance the system and give shareholders the tools to hold boards accountable -- and, in the process, restore public confidence in the fairness and economic rationality of the governance system.

Mr. Millstein is senior associate dean for corporate governance at the Yale School of Management. Mr. Goldschmid is the Dwight Professor of Law at Columbia and a former SEC Commissioner. Both are at Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Deplores Web Predators (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 15, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told an audience in Kansas City on Thursday that the battle against Internet predators is “a fight for our future.”

Gonzales called on all levels of law enforcement as well as parents, educators and private advocacy groups to work together to defeat the “vast and frightening network” of criminals who every day seek to harm children.

“It is brutal. It is heinous, and it is criminal,” he said.

The attorney general spoke to several hundred federal, state and local law enforcement officials from across the Midwest attending the annual Protect Our Children conference.

He told them that the proliferation of child pornography and sexual predators should be seen as “a call to arms” to those dedicated to fighting it.

Halting those crimes is a top priority of the Justice Department. Gonzales promoted an initiative started earlier this year called Project Safe Childhood, which seeks to coordinate law enforcement efforts with endeavors to educate children and parents about the problem and how they fight a “determined and desperate brand of criminal.”

He cited a recent study that found half of Internet users between the ages of 10 and 17 reported being exposed to pornographic material over the Web. And one in seven reported that they were sexually solicited online.

While that was an improvement from five years earlier, when a study found one in five reporting solicitations, Gonzalez said, “One in seven getting solicited is one in seven too many.”

Federal prosecutors in the Western District of Missouri filed 42 child exploitation cases last year and have filed 23 this year, according to a spokesman. Nationwide, federal prosecutors last year charged more than 1,503 defendants in child exploitation cases, according to the Department of Justice.

Gonzales also told the audience Thursday that a new series of public service announcements will begin airing early next year to raise public awareness about the problem’s scope.

Gonzales Asks For Stronger Penalties Against Online Sex Predators (AP)

By David Twiddy

AP, September 15, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Joint federal and local task forces arrested more than 1,600 people nationwide last year who were accused of exploiting children over the Internet, a fivefold increase over 2000.

But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday the problem only continues to grow as the Internet has given child pornographers and people seeking trysts with minors unparalleled access to young users and made it easier to hide from law enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0063507

"The only way to respond to their horrific ambitions is to respond with greater perseverance," said Gonzales, speaking at the Protect Our Children Conference, a three-day event bringing law enforcement from Missouri, Kansas, Illinois and Nebraska together with child advocates and abuse treatment organizations.

In particular, Gonzales said states need to re-evaluate their laws against child exploitation and make them stronger, if necessary.

Missouri, for example, enacted legislation this year that boosts the penalties for many child sex crimes, such as a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years for someone convicted of trying to entice a child into meeting to have sex.

President Bush this summer signed into law legislation that effectively doubles many federal sentences for pedophiles, as well as requires offenders to place their names and locations on Internet databases and be charged with a felony for not providing regular updates.

Gonzales said federal, state and local law enforcement are doing a better job of coordinating their efforts and teaming up with community organizations that teach parents and children how to avoid online predators and deal with the aftermath when children are abused.

He added that his office and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children will begin airing new public service messages early next year to call attention to the online dangers.

"We need to get the public as well as government officials to start thinking about it in the right terms; it is brutal, it is heinous and it is criminal," he said, adding that the pornographic material is increasingly graphic and involving children as young as toddlers and even infants. "Our ultimate goal is prevention because a child who is molested bears a scar that never quite heals."

He added that federal authorities are increasingly reaching out to other countries, where much of the child pornography now traded among pedophiles is made and distributed, to stiffen their own child sex laws.

U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman's office in Kansas City has been among the leaders in the country in attacking online predators, filing 42 child exploitation cases last year, the sixth-highest in the nation. So far this year, the office has filed 23 cases, spokesman Don Ledford said.

Schlozman said the Internet's reach means he's dealing with offenders around the world, so he could be barely making a dent in rooting out local pedophiles.

"Sometimes you don't know exactly if that predator is operating from Overland Park (Kan.) or Bangkok," he said. "We certainly see a ton of it here. So I know it's a huge problem but, 'Is it getting better?' That's really hard for me to say."

US Attorney General Visits KC (WDAF)

WDAF-TV, Fox 4, Kansas City, September 15, 2006

KANSAS CITY, MO. - They are out there and they are preying on our young. On Thursday, one group of criminals was the focus of a visit to the Metro by the U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales.

A national study said that one out of every seven children who go online will be solicited sexually. That statistic was so disturbing that the US Justice Department pledged a crackdown on Internet predators. That's what brought Gonzales to Kansas City.

"It's a wrenching reality that every day children are sexually solicited online," Gonzales said.

In many ways Gonzales was preaching to the choir. He spoke to state, local and federal officials at a conference on child protection. Gonzales' message? The Federal government will lead the fight against Internet predators.

"Everyday we must talk to our kids about what they are seeing, what they are hearing and who they are communicating with online," Gonzales said.

It was a message that rang true to those listening. US Attorney for Western Missouri Brad Schlozman said last year his office prosecuted more than 40 sexual predator cases.

"These predators are acting under a veil of anonymity on the Internet," Schlozman said. "They feel emboldened and they traffic on the Internet."

Captain Paul Carrill heads up the cyber-crimes unit for the Platte County Sheriff's department. He said that what initially surprised him is who the predators are.

"They range from the guy who does nothing and lives at home with his parents and has to take a taxi cab to the meet location, to the other end of the spectrum. You have a very well education, upper-class, well-paid individual," Carrill said.

What many in local law enforcement wanted to know was who will pay for all the tough new programs the federal government wanted to see.

"This is an important issue and I think we will have support in Congress for additional funding," Gonzales said. "But we'll work on that."

He said that it's an issue that can't be ignored and every year it gets worse.

DOJ_NMG_0063508

Email Linda Wagar at linda.wagar@foxtv.com

GOP Officials Say Ney Will Offer Guilty Plea (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney, the Ohio Republican charged with taking gifts, trips and campaign donations from lobbyist Jack Abramoff, is expected to plead guilty to at least one criminal corruption charge possibly as early as today, Republicans officials told the Associated Press.

Ney has consistently denied any wrongdoing but agreed last month to give up his re-election bid for the upcoming election. It is not clear from the Republican officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of pending legal proceedings, if Ney will resign his House seat. The officials did not say what charge Ney would plead guilty to, or whether he would plead guilty to more than one charge. Calls to his congressional office were not immediately returned. Abramoff has been convicted of conspiracy and fraud.

Congress could limit payday-loan interest

A Pentagon official urged Congress on Thursday to limit interest rates on so-called payday loans to military servicemembers because some personnel face debt problems so severe that they have been reassigned and have lost their security clearances. David Chu, undersecretary of Defense, testified that a ceiling is needed "to prevent any lenders from imposing usurious rates" on the estimated 225,000 servicemembers — 17% of the military — who use payday loans.

The annual interest rate would be capped at 36% under the Senate version of a defense bill. The ceiling was not included in a version that passed in the House.

Payday loans are short-term cash advances made by storefront businesses, often clustered around military bases. Borrowers can face huge debt if they don't repay quickly because interest rates can exceed 900%.

House changes rules on 'earmarks'

The House took a step toward curbing "earmarks," the practice of lawmakers anonymously inserting into legislation targeted spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district. A rule change, which passed 245-171, requires lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into bills.

"This doesn't get rid of earmarks, but it makes everyone know who's getting them," said Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., a critic of special-interest spending.

Ohio Congressman Is Said To Agree To Plead Guilty (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio, has agreed to plead guilty to federal criminal charges related to his dealings with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, lawyers and others with knowledge of the investigation said Thursday.

A guilty plea would make Mr. Ney, a six-term congressman, the first member of Congress to admit to criminal charges in the Abramoff investigation, which has focused on the actions of several current and former Republican lawmakers who had been close to the former lobbyist.

People with detailed knowledge of the investigation said Mr. Ney had entered an in-patient rehabilitation center in recent days for treatment of alcoholism, making it uncertain whether he would appear at a court hearing to announce the plea. Lawyers and others would speak only anonymously because of concern that they would anger prosecutors.

They said the agreement with the Justice Department — and the exact criminal charges, which are expected to include conspiracy and false statement — would be disclosed in Washington as soon as Friday and would probably require Mr. Ney to serve at least some time in prison.

Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt members of Congress and other public officials. The scandal was among the factors that led Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the former House Republican leader, who had been close to Mr. Abramoff, to resign in June, his aides said at the time.

Democratic lawmakers and political strategists have seized on the Abramoff case — and a separate bribery investigation involving military contractors that led to a guilty plea last year by Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California — in arguing for voters to return Democrats to power in the House and Senate in the November elections.

Mr. Ney has been under scrutiny by the Justice Department for more than a year over gifts he received from Mr. Abramoff that included a lavish golf trip to Scotland in 2002 by chartered private jet.

The congressman has said in the past the gifts had nothing to do with several official actions he took in support of Mr. Abramoff and his clients, including placing statements in the official Congressional Record on their behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0063509

Mr. Ney announced last month that he would not seek re-election, citing stress on his family because of what he called the "ordeal" of the scrutiny over his ties to Mr. Abramoff.

In May, Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, who left the House to join Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm, pleaded guilty to trying to corrupt Mr. Ney with illegal gifts, including the Scotland trip.

Mr. Ney's lawyers in Washington, Mark H. Tuohey and William E. Lawler, did not return phone calls on Thursday. Nor did Justice Department officials.

Another person familiar with the department's investigation said at least one of the criminal charges in Mr. Ney's guilty plea would involve the accuracy of his claim in a House financial disclosure statement that he won $34,000 in a private London casino during a trip in 2003.

Those winnings were also under scrutiny by the Justice Department, in part because the amount of the winnings coincided to a surprising degree with the amount of debt outstanding on Mr. Ney's credit cards. Mr. Ney's host on that trip was a Cyprus-based aviation company that was seeking Congressional support for sales of airplane parts to Iran.

Before the Abramoff scandal, Mr. Ney was seen by colleagues as positioning himself to rise in the House Republican leadership.

Affable and loyal to the Republican agenda in Congress, he got as far as chairman of the House Administration Committee, a post in which he controlled the allotment of office space on Capitol Hill and management of the House cafeteria and other services.

But in January, he was pressured to give up the committee post; Republican leaders said they feared that the assignment had brought undue scrutiny to the corruption accusations facing Mr. Ney and other Republicans.

Apart from the notoriety he received from the Abramoff scandal, Mr. Ney may be best remembered in Washington for his decision to label French-fried potatoes sold in the House cafeteria as "Freedom Fries" as a protest over the French government's refusal to support the American invasion of Iraq.

G.O.P. Picks Replacement

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Sept. 14 (AP) — Republicans picked a party-backed state senator Thursday in a special primary to replace Representative Ney.

The winner, State Senator Joy Padgett, defeated four other candidates, winning 66 percent of the vote.

Ms. Padgett will face Zack Space, the Democratic nominee, on Nov. 7 for the 18th District race. She said she was not concerned that she could be tied to Mr. Ney and said she would have to work to separate herself from him.

Ney To Plead Guilty In Scandal (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) is expected to plead guilty in the coming days to charges stemming from his association with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and he will blame a long-standing problem with alcohol for behavior that spiraled down to illegality, sources close to the congressman said last night.

Ney, known in Abramoff-related court documents as "Representative No. 1," checked into a rehabilitation clinic for alcoholism yesterday, a senior House official and personal friend said yesterday. Under pressure from Republican leaders worried about losing his seat, Ney announced this summer that he would retire from Congress at the end of the year.

Now, three House sources said, the Justice Department is expected to announce a plea agreement or an agreement to reach a plea bargain as early as tomorrow. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to preempt a legal announcement.

But Ney's Washington attorney, Mark H. Tuohey, said from London yesterday that he expected no immediate developments in the case.

Ney, a popular, soft-spoken Republican, became known as the mayor of the House for the largess he showed to fellow members from his post as chairman of the House Administration Committee. His entanglements with Abramoff, however, became his undoing.

Guilty pleas from Abramoff, two former aides to retired representative Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and Ney's former chief of staff all said Ney accepted gifts and favors in exchange for official actions on behalf of Abramoff's clients. Tickets to events and expense-paid golf vacations helped win Ney's support for legislation, his insertion of comments into the congressional record and his pulling strings to secure government contracts for Abramoff's clients, according to Abramoff, former DeLay spokesman Michael Scanlon, former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony C. Rudy and former Ney chief of staff Neil G. Volz.

For months, Ney has maintained his innocence. Aides in his office did not return calls, and Justice officials would not comment.

Voters in a special primary election in Ohio yesterday selected state Sen. Joy Padgett as the Republican nominee to succeed Ney.

Ohio Congressman To Plead Guilty To Criminal Charge In Corruption Probe, GOP Sources Say (AP)

By Jonathan Weisman

AP, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON – Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, is expected to plead guilty in coming days to charges stemming from his association with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and he will blame a long-standing problem with alcohol for behavior that spiraled down to illegality, sources close to the congressman said Thursday night.

Ney, known in Abramoff-related court documents as "Representative No. 1," checked into a rehabilitation clinic for alcoholism Thursday, a senior House official and personal friend said Thursday. Under pressure from Republican leaders worried about losing his seat, Ney announced this summer he would retire from Congress at the end of the year.

Now, three House sources said, the Justice Department is expected to announce a plea agreement or an agreement to reach a plea bargain as early as Saturday. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they did not want to pre-empt a legal announcement.

Ney, a soft-spoken, popular Republican, became known as the mayor of the House for the largesse he showed to fellow members from his post as chairman of the House Administration Committee. His entanglements with Abramoff became his undoing.

Guilty pleas from Abramoff, two former aides to retired Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and Ney's former chief of staff all said Ney accepted gifts and favors in exchange for official actions on behalf of Abramoff's clients.

Tickets to football games, box seats at concerts, and all-expense-paid, lavish golf vacations helped win Ney's support for legislation, his insertion of comments into the Congressional Record and his pulling strings to secure government contracts for Abramoff's clients, according to Abramoff, former DeLay spokesman Michael Scanlon, former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony C. Rudy and former Ney chief of staff Neil Volz.

For months, Ney has steadfastly maintained his innocence. Aides in his office did not return phone calls Thursday, and Justice Department officials would not comment.

Voters in a special primary election in Ohio on Thursday selected state Sen. Joy Padgett as the Republican nominee to succeed Ney in the largely rural district. Ney personally tapped Padgett to run before he announced his retirement.

Columnist Contradicts Leak Source (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — Robert D. Novak, the columnist who first disclosed the identity of the intelligence officer in the C.I.A. leak case, has disputed statements by his primary source, Richard L. Armitage, who said his mention of her identity was inadvertent.

In his syndicated column published on Thursday, Mr. Novak said that Mr. Armitage, a former deputy secretary of state, had "obscured" the details of their conversation on July 8, 2003, in a way that made Mr. Armitage's disclosure of the identity of the Central Intelligence Agency officer, Valerie Wilson, seem less deliberate.

Mr. Novak wrote that Mr. Armitage "did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests.''

"He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column," the writer said.

Mr. Novak added, "He told me unequivocally that Ms. Wilson had worked in the C.I.A.'s Counterproliferation Division and that she had suggested her husband's mission."

Ms. Wilson's husband is Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador who criticized the Bush administration Iraq policy on July 6, 2003, in an Op-Ed article in The New York Times. Mr. Wilson traveled to Niger in 2002 to examine reports that Iraq tried buy uranium ore and wrote in his article that he found such purchases highly unlikely.

The conversation between Mr. Armitage and Mr. Novak became significant because it led to a criminal referral by the C.I.A. to the Justice Department. A preliminary inquiry was followed by an investigation by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, a special counsel.

Mr. Fitzgerald has not prosecuted anyone for talking to Mr. Novak. He cleared Mr. Armitage of wrongdoing in a letter last February, but he has brought charges against one official, a perjury and obstruction indictment in October 2005 against I. Lewis Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Armitage, who confirmed last week that he was Mr. Novak's main source, disclosed the conversation to the Justice Department in October 2003.

On Thursday, Mr. Armitage said he stood by his account of the meeting. He said that his comments about Ms. Wilson in the conversation came at the end of the interview, were brief and made in response to a question posed by Mr. Novak.

Mr. Novak's new column offered a conflicting account of other aspects of the interview. He said he was offered the chance to meet Mr. Armitage "without explanation" after trying for more than two years to arrange an interview.

Mr. Armitage said he agreed to the interview only after Mr. Novak had interceded with a mutual friend. In addition, Mr. Novak criticized Mr. Armitage for waiting nearly three years before disclosing that he was Mr. Novak's source, writing that it caused "intense pain for his colleagues in government."

Mr. Armitage has said he did not publicly discuss his role because Justice Department prosecutors cautioned against that.

What A Load Of Armitage! (WSJ)

By Victoria Toensing

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Richard Armitage has finally emerged from the cover-my-backside closet, "apologizing" on CBS for keeping quiet for almost three years about being the original source for Robert Novak's July 14, 2003 column stating that Joe Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked for the CIA and had suggested him for a mission to Niger. He disingenuously blames his silence on Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's non-legally based request -- any witness is free to talk about his or her testimony -- not to discuss the matter.

Put aside hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxpayer funds squandered on the investigation, New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85 days in jail, the angst and legal fees of scores of witnesses, the White House held siege to a criminal investigation while fighting the war on terror, Karl Rove's reputation maligned, and "Scooter" Libby's resignation and indictment. By his silence, Mr. Armitage is responsible for one of the most factually distorted investigations in history.

There is a reason the old Watergate question -- What did he know and when did he know it? -- has become part of our investigative culture. It provides a paradigm for parsing a complicated factual scenario.

· Joseph Wilson: In July 2003, when he demanded an investigation of a White House cabal for violating the Intelligence Identities Protection Act by "outing" his wife, Mr. Wilson knew Ms. Plame did not meet the factual requirements for covert status under the Act. She was neither covert at the time of publication nor had a covert foreign assignment within five years. He acknowledged so in his book: "My move back to Washington [in June 1997] coincided with the return to D.C. of a woman named Valerie Plame." As the Senate negotiator for this 1982 Act, I know a trip or two by Ms. Plame to a foreign country while assigned to Langley, where she worked in July 2003, is not considered a foreign assignment. I also know covert officers are not assigned to Langley.

· Richard Armitage: Mr. Armitage now claims he only knew on Oct. 1, 2003 that he was Mr. Novak's source. We should question that claim in light of Mr. Novak's account this week that Mr. Armitage "made clear he considered [the information about Ms. Plame] especially suited for my column."

Mr. Armitage also knew he had met with Bob Woodward on June 13, 2003, telling him about Mr. Wilson's wife's CIA employment and her role in her husband's trip to Niger. But when the FBI interviewed Mr. Armitage on Oct. 2, he admitted to the Novak conversation only, notably forgetting meeting with one of our country's premier investigative reporters. By attributing his longtime silence to Mr. Fitzgerald's request, Mr. Armitage must have forgotten Mr. Fitzgerald was not appointed until Dec. 30, 2003. If Mr. Armitage had come forward during those three months, there might never have been a special counsel.

· Patrick Fitzgerald: What Mr. Fitzgerald knew, and chose to ignore, is troublesome. Despite what some CIA good ol' boys might have told Mr. Fitzgerald, he knew from the day he took office that the facts did not support a violation of the Act; therefore, there was no crime to investigate. Although he claimed in Mr. Libby's indictment that Ms. Plame's employment status was "classified," Mr. Fitzgerald refuses to provide the basis for that fact and, even if true, can point to no law that would be violated by revealing a "classified" (not covert) employment. It was this gap in the law that created the need to pass the Act in the first place.

Mr. Armitage intimated on CBS that, although his "chitchat" was careless, there was perhaps "a conspiracy" in the White House to retaliate against Mr. Wilson. However, Mr. Fitzgerald knew (prior to indicting Mr. Libby) that Mr. Armitage was Mr. Novak's original source, Mr. Libby never spoke to Mr. Novak, and Messrs. Rove and Libby had merely responded to reporters' questions. Hardly acts of initiating a criminal conspiracy. Mr. Fitzgerald knows it is not criminal to discredit a mendacious attack on the president. There was a crime only if Ms. Plame were covert and the person revealed that fact with knowledge of her status. Mr. Fitzgerald learned during the investigation that not one person had any basis to think she was covert. Just ask Mr. Armitage, who asserted in his apologia, "I had never seen a covered agent's name in any memo . . . in 28 years of government."

During the investigation Mr. Fitzgerald learned that a former New York Times reporter, Cliff May, twice told the FBI that, prior to Mr. Novak's column, he had heard in an offhand way from a nongovernment employee that Mr. Wilson's wife worked for the CIA, a clear indication that her employment was known on the street. Ditto columnist Hugh Sidey, who wrote that Ms. Plame's name was "knocking around in the sub rosa world. . . for a long time."

DOJ_NMG_0063512

Mr. Armitage, who came forward after Mr. Libby was indicted, was told in February 2006, after two grand jury appearances, he would not be indicted. Mr. Rove, however, after five grand jury appearances, was not informed until July 2006 he would not be charged. Mr. Fitzgerald made the Rove decision appear strained, a close call. Yet of the two men's conduct, Mr. Armitage's deserved more scrutiny. And Mr. Fitzgerald knew it. Each had testified before the grand jury about a conversation with Mr. Novak. Each had forgotten about a conversation with an additional reporter: Mr. Armitage with Mr. Woodward, Mr. Rove with Time's Matt Cooper. However, Mr. Rove came forward pre-indictment, immediately, when reminded of the second conversation. When Mr. Woodward attempted to ask Mr. Armitage about the matter, on two separate occasions pre-indictment, Mr. Armitage refused to discuss it and abruptly cut him off. To be charitable, assume he did not independently recall his conversation with Mr. Woodward. Would not two phone calls requesting to talk about the matter refresh his recollection? Now we also know Messrs. Armitage and Novak have vastly different recollections of their conversation. Isn't that what Mr. Libby was indicted for?

What Mr. Fitzgerald chose not to know is even more troublesome than what he chose to ignore. When Mr. Armitage came forth in October 2003, why did Mr. Fitzgerald not request his appointment calendar from early May, the time the first story appeared in the national press about an unnamed former ambassador's trip to Niger? Mr. Fitzgerald demanded this type of information from White House personnel. Just think, if he had done so of Mr. Armitage, he would have learned prior to indictment about Mr. Woodward's appointment.

By the time he indicted Mr. Libby on Oct. 28, 2005, Mr. Fitzgerald knew two conflicting facts about the classified nature of the Niger trip: since at least early May 2003, Mr. Wilson was discussing his Niger trip with the press (Nicholas Kristof, the New York Times) and claimed in his July 2003 NYT op-ed that his mission was "discreet, but by no means secret." Yet, the indictment states that around June 9, 2003, the CIA sent "classified" documents to the vice president's office discussing "Wilson and his trip to Niger." If the trip was classified for the vice president, why was it declassified for Mr. Wilson? Did Mr. Wilson violate any law by revealing his trip or did Mr. Fitzgerald choose not to know?

Did Mr. Fitzgerald subpoena Ms. Plame? He could have asked her why, if she were truly covert, was she attending an Eastern Shore meeting in May 2003 with Democratic senators. The first journalist to reveal Ms. Plame was "covert" was David Corn on July 16, 2003, two days after Mr. Novak's column. The latter never wrote, because he did not know and it was not so, that Ms. Plame was covert. However, Mr. Corn claimed Mr. Novak "outed" her as an "undercover CIA officer," querying whether Bush officials blew "the cover of a U.S. intelligence officer working covertly in . . . national security." Was Mr. Corn subpoenaed? Did Mr. Fitzgerald subpoena Mr. Wilson to attest he had never revealed his wife's employment to anyone? If he had done so, he might have learned Mr. Corn's source.

It is not just Mr. Armitage who should apologize. So should Joe Wilson and Pat Fitzgerald.

Ms. Toensing was chief counsel for the Senate Intelligence Committee and deputy assistant attorney general in the Reagan administration.

Former Nev. Politician Pleads Guilty (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

LAS VEGAS -- A former politician and lobbyist accused of ferrying bribes for a strip club owner reached a plea deal Thursday, just days before the start of his trial, authorities said.

Lance Malone, a former Clark County commissioner, has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said. Malone is scheduled to enter his plea Monday.

Authorities in turn have dropped wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud charges, and agreed not to object to Malone serving his sentence concurrently with a three-year sentence a San Diego jury levied against him last summer for similar charges.

Malone's trial was to cap off a three-year FBI probe into corruption and bribery on the Clark County commission. At the center of the probe was Michael Galardi, the former owner of three strip clubs who claimed to have paid off dozens of politicians in Nevada and Southern California with cash and favors.

Authorities said Malone, who was hired as Galardi's lobbyist after losing a bid for re-election, acted as Galardi's bagman, delivering wads of cash to his former colleagues. In return, Galardi said he sought favorable votes on the commission, which was reviewing plans to expand one of his clubs.

Galardi, 44, pleaded guilty in 2003 and testified in Las Vegas and in a related San Diego federal bribery case.

Malone's lawyer did not return a call for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0063513

Russo's Wife To Plead Guilty (MR)

By Ryan Dezember And Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporters

Mobile Press-Register (AL), September 15, 2006

Crystal Russo, the wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, will plead guilty in Mobile's federal court next week to obstruction of justice as part of an agreement with prosecutors, according to a Wednesday court filing.

Crystal Russo, 25, was scheduled to be tried next month for allegedly trying to help her husband hide money that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors this summer in their corruption case against the now-convicted former mayor.

Specifically, she is accused of helping her husband move nearly $96,000 from one bank account to another account that had been hastily created in her maiden name, Crystal R. McDonald, in order to hide the money from federal agents seeking to seize it as part of a March 31 indictment.

Three days after the new account was created at Vision Bank, Crystal Russo tried to withdraw much of the money to pay off the couple's debts, according to the indictment. She was informed that the government had already frozen the account.

On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a Mobile federal jury on numerous counts related to plots by Wall and fellow developer Jim Brown to enrich the mayor in an effort to curry favor in City Hall. Brown pleaded guilty in his own agreement with prosecutors and became the government's star witness in the two-week case against the others.

Steve Russo, 44, was convicted of 22 counts that included those related to his role in moving the money targeted for forfeiture.

Russo, Sutley and Wall are scheduled for sentencing in January. Brown's sentencing is set for November.

Crystal Russo's plea agreement has not yet been released. But a Wednesday filing that followed a Tuesday meeting between prosecutors and her Mobile lawyer, Gordon Armstrong III, says that she will plead guilty to one of the three charges brought against her in June by a federal grand jury.

That charge -- obstruction of justice -- carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison, although prosecutors typically agree to recommend a sentence at the low end of advisory sentencing guidelines in exchange for a guilty plea. Under preliminary calculations by the U.S. Probation Office, such a sentence would be 10 months in prison.

Any sentence less than a year would make Crystal Russo eligible for probation rather than serving prison time. U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose will make the final determination of her sentencing range -- as well as decide whether to follow it -- at a hearing that would be set once Crystal Russo pleads guilty. She is scheduled to plead guilty next Thursday, according to court records.

Besides the obstruction charge, Crystal Russo was charged in June with conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government and the destruction or removal of property to prevent seizure. As part of the plea bargain, prosecutors likely would recommend that the other two charges be dropped.

Neither Armstrong nor federal prosecutors responded to telephone calls seeking comment late Wednesday.

Prosecutors Have Plea Deal With Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — Prosecutors in the Orange Beach corruption probe have reached a plea deal on charges against Crystal Russo, the wife of former Mayor Steve Russo.

She will plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Mobile next Thursday to obstruction of justice, according to a court filing Wednesday. She could be given probation.

Crystal Russo, 25, was facing trial next month for allegedly trying to help her 44-year-old husband hide $96,000 that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors in their probe of the former mayor.

On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a federal court jury in Mobile of fraud and related charges in a real estate scheme in the Gulf Coast resort.

Businessman Arrested On Extortion Charges (SFC)

By Jim Herron Zamora, Christopher Heredia And Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, September 15, 2006

(09-14) 17:07 PDT OAKLAND -- A well-connected Oakland businessman has been arrested on federal charges of extorting bribe money in exchange for using his influence to help a contract applicant win a deal with the city, authorities said today.

DOJ_NMG_0063514

Maurice Himy, 59, of San Rafael was arrested Wednesday by FBI agents on a federal complaint accusing him of interference of commerce by threats or violence. Until March, he owned Spaccio, an Italian men's clothing store on Frank Ogawa Plaza, just steps from Oakland City Hall.

Himy appeared before U.S. Magistrate Wayne Brazil in Oakland today. The magistrate ordered Himy to turn over his passport and released him on his own recognizance. Himy will return to court Sept. 21, authorities said.

Himy's leased silver 2005 Mini Cooper was parked today outside his San Rafael home, where the shades were drawn. No one answered the door, and he did not immediately return a call for comment.

Himy's arrest followed a 17-month investigation by the FBI over the awarding of a city of Oakland contract to provide auctioneering services for city-owned vehicles and surplus property.

According to the complaint, Himy, a person described as a "cooperating witness" and an unnamed city of Oakland official -- identified only as "City Official A" -- began discussing in September 2004 "the payment of thousands of dollars to Himy" in exchange for help in securing the contract for the witness.

Himy has sold suits to Oakland Mayor Jerry Brown and Jacques Barzhagi, the mayor's former senior advisor who was ousted from his post last year after details of a domestic dispute with his wife became public.

The complaint does not name any city officials and Brown's spokesman, Gil Duran, said today, "This has nothing to do with Jerry Brown or the mayor's office."

Duran confirmed that Brown and Himy had traveled together to Agadir, Morocco, in 2004 when Oakland was seeking to establish a sister-city relationship with a city in a Muslim country. Himy is a native of Morocco, Duran said.

Under the deal outlined in the complaint, Himy would receive 8 percent of the commissions if he agreed to help obtain the contract, authorities said.

"Pay me or I will kill the contract," Himy told the witness in a phone call, FBI Special Agent Marlo McGuire wrote in an affidavit.

In April 2005, the witness, wired with a recording device, met with Himy at Spaccio, authorities said. During the recorded conversation, Himy repeatedly demanded money from the cooperating witness, at one point demanding $65,000 in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering contract, the complaint said.

Himy warned the witness, "You try to f -- me up, then I, I'll kill the deal," the complaint said. "I'll let the other guy have it."

In February, the witness learned that his application for the auctioneering contract had been approved.

"Based upon the evidence uncovered during the investigation, there is probable cause to believe that Himy has extorted one or more local business owners seeking to do business with the city of Oakland," McGuire wrote.

"It is probable that the criminal acts of Himy affected commerce or the movement of any article or commodity in commerce since the contract impacted included the sales of used automobiles," McGuire wrote.

Chronicle staff writers Demian Bulwa and Peter Fimrite contributed to this report.

Oakland Clothier Accused Of City Hall Extortion (MERCN/AP)

The San Jose Mercury News, September 15, 2006

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) - A former Oakland clothier with alleged connections to City Hall was charged with one federal count of extortion today on accusations that he received money to help an FBI informant obtain a lucrative city contract.

Maurice Himy, who operated Himco Apparel Inc. in Oakland until March, is accused of greasing the wheels of City Hall to help the informant win the contract to auction surplus city property in February that Himy estimated could generate $1 million in income.

Himy, 59, who remained free after his Wednesday arrest, was to appear in federal court Sept. 21. He faces a maximum 20-year sentence if convicted, authorities said.

The one-count complaint alleges Himy, in exchange for more than $10,000, steered the contract the businessman's way with the help of a City Hall insider. The businessman was not named in an affidavit released today, but he contacted the FBI after Himy allegedly told him the only way he could obtain the contract was through payoffs to Himy.

The informant, who recorded some of his conversations with Himy, initially was rejected for the contract because it was submitted too late but was awarded it in February after Himy intervened, according to court documents. During one taped conversation, Himy allegedly told the informant, ``Pay me or I will kill the contract."

Himy, 59, of San Rafael, did not have a listed phone number and could not immediately be reached for comment.

The affidavit from FBI agent Marlo McGuire of the Oakland branch did not name the City Hall employee, referenced in the affidavit as ``City Employee A," who was associated with Himy to seal the deal.

Erica Harrold, a spokeswoman for City Attorney John Russo, said, ``We haven't been contacted by the FBI and if there are any problems, obviously, we want to see those addressed and remedied."

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan of San Francisco said the investigation is ongoing.

Oakland Clothier Arrested In Corruption Probe (BCNW)

Bay City News Wires, September 15, 2006

(BCN) OAKLAND Federal prosecutors said today that 59-year-old Maurice Himy of San Rafael has been arrested by the FBI on a complaint charging interference of commerce by threats or violence in connection with a public corruption probe in Oakland.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the complaint alleges that Himy was involved in extortion and public corruption involving the awarding of a city of Oakland contract to provide auctioneering services for city-owned vehicles and surplus property.

The complaint alleges numerous discussions between Himy, a cooperating witness, and an Oakland city official, named only as "City Official A," involving the payment of thousands of dollars to Himy in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering city contract that was eventually approved for the cooperating witness.

Prosecutors said Himy's arrest is the result of a 17-month investigation by the FBI.

U.S. attorney's spokesman Luke Macaulay said the investigation is continuing but declined to elaborate further.

Himy was the owner of Spaccio, a men's clothing store located at 140 Frank Ogawa Plaza, adjacent to Oakland City Hall. The store closed in March.

Prosecutors said Himy was arrested Wednesday afternoon in Oakland and made his initial appearance in U.S. District Court this morning before Magistrate Judge Brazil. He was released on his own recognizance, with the condition that he turn in his passport to the U.S. Marshals Service.

Himy is scheduled to return to court on Sept. 21 for identification of counsel.

According to the complaint, discussions began in September 2004 between the cooperating witness and Himy about the Oakland auctioneering contract.

Prosecutors say Himy allegedly provided terms of a contract between the witness and Himy in which Himy would receive 8 percent of the commissions generated by the auctioneering contract in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering contract.

According to the complaint, Himy said, "pay me or I will kill the contract."

The complaint alleges that Himy repeatedly demanded money from the cooperating witness and at one point demanded $65,000 in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering contract.

In February, according to the complaint, the witness received notification that his application for the auctioneering contract had been approved.

The maximum sentence for each count of interfering with commerce by threats or violence is 20 years and a fine of $250,000, plus three years of supervised release.

Three Boston Police Officers Indicted As Result Of FBI Probe (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

BOSTON— Three Boston police officers arrested in Miami in July on federal drug charges were indicted Thursday on charges of conspiring to possess heroin and cocaine with intent to distribute, the U.S attorney's office announced.

Roberto Pulido, 41; Carlos Pizarro, 36; and Nelson Carrasquillo, 35, had gone to Florida, authorities said, to collect a $35,000 payment for protecting a Massachusetts shipment of cocaine that was part of an undercover FBI sting operation. At the meeting, prosecutors said, agents recorded the men agreeing to protect two more cocaine shipments totaling 100 kilograms and also to protect 5 kilograms of heroin.

The new indictment charges all three with one count of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 1 kilogram of heroine, and it charges all three with a count of attempting to aid and abet the possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. Pulido and Carrasquillo also were named in a second count on the attempting to aid and abet charge.

Pizarro and Carrasquillo have been ordered to home detention with electronic monitoring. Pulido was ordered held until trial. Authorities have identified him as the ringleader, allegedly also involved in a wide range of illegal activities from identity theft to trafficking in stolen goods.

Pulido's lawyer, Rudy Miller, has said that prosecutors have based much of their case against his client on the word of a witness he characterized as a "major drug dealer and a suspected murderer." He did not immediately return a message for comment Thursday.

Jeffrey A. Denner, a lawyer for Pizzaro, said Thursday night that he was pleased with the decision to allow his client to return home.

DOJ_NMG_0063516

"We believe that Mr. Pizzaro deserves to be out on conditions as the judge ruled. We expect to now effectively defend him against the charges," Denner said.

Stephen Neyman, an attorney for Carrasquillo, had said his client should be released pending trial because of his good record as an officer and his ties to the community. He did not immediately return a message for comment Thursday night.

Pulido and Pizarro have been Boston police officers since 1996 and Carrasquillo since 1999.

The three each face a minimum sentence of 4 years and a maximum sentence of life in prison, and a $4 million fine on each charge.

2 Of 3 Indicted Cops Freed By Magistrate In Drug Smuggle Case (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet And O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, September 15, 2006

Three alleged crooked cops were suspended without pay by the Boston Police Department yesterday and two of them freed on bail after their indictments by a federal grand jury on drug conspiracy charges.

Roberto Pulido, 41, Carlos Pizarro, 36, and Nelson Carrasquillo, 35, have been in custody since their arrests in Miami in July on charges they agreed to be hired muscle for a shipment of cocaine that turned out to be the bait in an undercover sting. But yesterday, U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Joyce London Alexander, unconvinced Pizarro and Carrasquillo are a flight risk or a threat to the public, set them free pending trial.

The two men return in disgrace to city streets where they once patrolled as respected cops.

Though the judge ruled they posed no threat to the public, the suspended officers' own safety is in question with the Boston Fire Department investigating two alleged fire bombings of Nelson Carrasquillo's Dorchester home.

Pulido, the alleged ringleader, was detained, in part, due to comments he made during the FBI's 2 -year investigation when - as first reported in the Herald - he said he would kill the children of anyone who betrayed him.

The three men were on paid leave until yesterday when the indictments were handed down.

"As soon as the Police Department learned they were indicted, the commissioner moved to change their status to suspended without pay immediately," police spokeswoman Elaine Driscoll said of acting Police Commissioner Al Goslin's actions.

US Grand Jury Indicts 3 Boston Officers (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2006

BOSTON

A federal grand jury yesterday indicted three Boston police officers arrested on drug-trafficking charges. Roberto Pulido, 41; Carlos A. Pizarro, 36; and Nelson Carrasquillo, 35, all of Boston, were each indicted on one count of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 1 kilogram of heroin. Pulido and Carrasquillo were each indicted on a second count of attempting to aid and abet the possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. All three officers were indicted on a third count of attempting to aid and abet the possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. The officers, arrested in Miami in July, are accused of protecting large shipments of drugs into Boston. If convicted, each faces a maximum sentence of life in prison and a $4 million fine on each count. Already on administrative leave, they will be taken off the police payroll. US Magistrate Judge Joyce London Alexander ordered Pulido jailed without bail until the case is resolved and set conditions of release for the other two officers.

Appeals court backs transit station ruling The US Court of Appeals upheld yesterday a lower court's ruling that the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority and the Federal Transit Administration did not act unlawfully when attempting to make Copley station accessible to the disabled. The ruling could be the final blow to the Back Bay preservationists who had sued both agencies, alleging that they violated historical preservation laws in planning changes around the station. Copley station is adjacent to the Boston Public Library and Old South Church, both of which are on the National Register of Historic Places. The two groups' only appeal is to the US Supreme Court.

Hyde Park man sought in fatal stabbing Police said yesterday they were seeking a Hyde Park man in the fatal stabbing in June of a father of two from Dorchester. They accused Michael Scott, 21, of killing James Green, 28, on June 12 on Washington Street near Melville Avenue in Dorchester. They described Scott as black, about 5 foot 5, and 135 pounds. Green's relatives could not be reached last night. Police asked anyone with information about Scott's location to call 617-343-4470 or 800-494-TIPS.

CAMBRIDGE

Jury selection started in shaken-baby case Jury selection began yesterday in the murder trial of a Framingham man charged in the 2004 shaken-baby death of his infant son, the Middlesex district attorney's office said. On Feb. 19, 2004, police responded to a call of an unresponsive baby, 2-month-old William Christian III. He was rushed to MetroWest Medical Center in Framingham, where doctors found multiple fractures and brain swelling. The next day, William Christian Jr., 23, was arrested and charged. The medical examiner attributed the death to shaken-baby syndrome and ruled it a homicide.

BOSTON

MBTA police unions protest TSA patrols Three unions representing MBTA Transit Police protested yesterday about federal Transportation Security Administration teams monitoring key T hubs to Logan International Airport, stating in a press release that they oppose working with TSA employees ``because of safety, supervisory and legal issues.'' This month, a TSA team has been monitoring passengers at South Station, the Silver Line, and the Blue Line's Airport station. The unions said the program ``deceives the public'' by insinuating that TSA employees are police officers. TSA spokeswoman Ann Davis said TSA personnel are not purporting to be law enforcement officers.

Man found dead on North Station stairs MBTA Transit Police are investigating the death of a 40-year-old man found yesterday morning on an exit-only stairway at North Station, officials said. Police said there were no signs of foul play. The medical examiner will determine the cause of death.

Mass. to grant $38m to health facilities Hospitals and community health centers across Massachusetts will share $38 million in grants next month, state Health and Human Services Secretary Timothy R. Murphy announced yesterday. Acute-care hospitals will receive $28.8 million, and community health centers will share $8.2 million. The biggest grants include $4 million for Carney Hospital in Boston, $2 million for New England Medical Center in Boston, and $1.7 million for Brockton Hospital. The Franciscan Hospital for Children in Brighton will get $1 million for a psychiatric and rehabilitation unit and for dental services.

Former Chicago Patronage Chief Returns To Federal Grand Jury (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, September 15, 2006

CHICAGO - Mayor Richard M. Daley's former patronage chief made his second appearance before a federal grand jury in three weeks Thursday as prosecutors pushed ahead with an investigation of City Hall.

Robert Sorich, the former No. 2 man in the mayor's office of intergovernmental affairs, first appeared before the grand jury Aug. 24.

Sorich, 43, returned for another session Thursday, said his attorney, Thomas Anthony Durkin.

"He will appear every time he is subpoenaed and he will answer all of the questions put to him and that is all I'm going to say," Durkin said.

Sorich was one of three former officials convicted by a federal court jury July 6 in what prosecutors called a scheme to use fraud to cover up the fact that they were loading the city payroll with campaign workers.

Sentencing is set for Nov. 15.

U.S. attorney's office spokesman Randall Samborn declined to comment on Sorich's latest grand jury appearance.

At Sorich's trial before U.S. District Judge David H. Coar, witnesses portrayed the office of intergovernmental affairs as the nerve center that ran Daley's political operation. The mayor has been accused of no wrongdoing.

Witnesses said Sorich decided who got city jobs and regularly favored members of "political armies" based in city departments and available for deployment throughout the community to get out the vote on Election Day.

They testified that Sorich, himself, assigned precinct workers to various sections of the city to help Daley and other candidates whose campaigns had the mayor's blessing.

While Sorich had the title of deputy director of the office of intergovernmental relations, he was known as the mayor's patronage chief.

Political patronage is an old Chicago tradition in which the election winners - often stalwarts of the fabled Chicago Democratic Machine - get the city jobs. It was largely prohibited by court order in 1973, but various investigators have found compliance has been spotty at best.

Most recently, U.S. District Judge Wayne R. Andersen appointed a monitor to assure that the order, known as the Shakman Decree, is obeyed.

In appearing before the grand jury, Sorich had immunity from prosecution for anything he might admit, as long as it was the truth.

It is not unusual for prosecutors to call those convicted in corruption cases before the grand jury to "compel" their testimony by granting them immunity and questioning them on pain of perjury for lying.

Former Gov. George Ryan's former inspector general, Dean Bauer, was called before a grand jury after pleading guilty to obstruction of justice and admitting he covered up seven years of Statehouse scandals while he was supposed to be uncovering them. But it was not clear that anything came of Bauer's testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0063518

The City Hall investigation was launched as an inquiry into payoffs to officials from the operators of trucking companies in exchange for work in Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

It evolved into an investigation of hiring fraud, focusing on the office of intergovernmental affairs.

Manhattan: Closing Arguments In Gotti Trial (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Closing arguments began yesterday in Federal District Court in the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti, with prosecutors saying that Mr. Gotti's claim that he quit the Gambino crime family in 1999 was no more than a scheme to avoid a long prison sentence. Miriam E. Rocah, a federal prosecutor, said that Mr. Gotti, left, devised the plan while in federal prison from 1999 to 2004 on unrelated racketeering charges. Mr. Gotti's defense is that he retired from the Mafia before mid-July 1999, a time frame that would protect him from prosecution because of the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges. But the government contends that Mr. Gotti had known that his prison conversations with visitors at Ray Brook federal penitentiary were being recorded, and that was why Mr. Gotti told people that he wanted to leave "the life" behind him.

Gotti's Defense Attacked (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2006

John A. Gotti spent a lifetime rising to the top of the Gambino crime family and the proof was "overwhelming" that he reaped millions of dollars through a murderous racketeering conspiracy that pillaged city businesses, a federal prosecutor said yesterday.

In her closing argument to a Manhattan federal court jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam Rocah said Gotti, the son of the late Gambino boss John Gotti and known as "Junior," had raised a disingenuous defense that he had withdrawn from a life of crime that had paid him so well.

"It just doesn't make any sense and you should reject it," Rocah said of Gotti's withdrawal defense.

The 42-year-old Gotti is on trial for the third time on racketeering charges stemming from his role in the Gambino crime family. The first two trials ended in mistrials. In the current case, prosecutors contend that Gotti, of Oyster Bay, took part in loan-sharking, money laundering and extortion.

The indictment also accused him of plotting the 1992 abduction of radio talk-show host and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa, an incident that led to Sliwa being seriously wounded by gunfire.

Though Gotti isn't charged with murders, Rocah said that the underlying Gambino crime family enterprise policed its rackets with killings. She reminded the jury that one witness had stated that Gotti had plotted to kill two crime family members he believed were stealing construction money kickbacks. That murder plot was shelved when the intended victims showed up with longtime Gambino associate Joseph Watts, who told Gotti his father wanted the two men to keep the cash, Rocah said.

Gotti's main defense is that he had withdrawn from a role in the Gambino crime family by July 21, 1999, five years before he was indicted in July 2004. That date is crucial because it could put the case beyond the statute of limitations.

Rocah tried to belittle the withdrawal defense, saying Gotti was deeply involved in some of the crimes.

"Proof of John Gotti Junior's participation in the charged crimes is overwhelming," said Rocah, as she delivered her summation facing the jury from a lectern.

Rocah said mob turncoats like Michael DiLeonardo told of how he personally paid millions of dollars to Gotti in construction payoffs. Gotti lived a life of luxury with a big home in Long Island that required lots of cash, Rocah observed.

"How does someone who hasn't held a 9-to-5 job in his life get all this money?" Rocah asked rhetorically.

The answer, she said, was through a life of crime. While to many people a cash-flow problem means not having enough money, in Gotti's case it meant trying to find ways to legitimize the illicit cash he had, she said. The prosecution summation continues today.

Prosecutor Tells Jurors Not To Fall For Gotti's `charade' (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- John "Junior" Gotti made millions of dollars leading the Gambino crime family for nearly a decade before claiming he'd quit the mob so he could keep the money and dodge prison, a prosecutor said in her closing argument Thursday at his racketeering trial.

DOJ_NMG_0063519

"Before he had ever been charged with a crime, Gotti was planting the lies that would one day be used in a courtroom like this one," Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam E. Rocah told jurors at Gotti's third trial on the charge in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

Two earlier trials in the last year ended with deadlocked juries.

Rocah dismissed statements Gotti made in prison conversations in which he claimed he had quit the mob and wanted to move to Canada to start a new life. She said it was part of "a charade contrived by Gotti to get himself off the hook."

The statements at the start of closing arguments, which were to continue Friday, illustrated the government's strategy to prove Gotti continued to benefit from Gambino family crimes well after he claimed to have quit the mob before July 1999.

Defense lawyers convinced a majority of jurors at a trial that ended with a hung jury in the spring that Gotti had quit the mob and could not be held accountable for crimes that came to light more than five years after he left his old life.

The government countered that argument at the retrial that began last month by producing new evidence about the actions and statements by Gotti after he pleaded guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 and served a six-year prison sentence.

Rocah said Gotti in the 1999 plea admitted only a few isolated crimes before his best friend began cooperating with the government three years later, detailing a long history of Gotti's supervision of extortion, loansharking, gambling and fraud.

She said Gotti also ordered two 1992 attacks on radio show host and Guardian Angels crimefighting group founder Curtis Sliwa in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air criticisms of his father, John Gotti, who was sentenced to life in prison in 1992 for a racketeering conviction.

The elder Gotti died in prison a decade later. Sliwa recovered from gunshot wounds to resume his radio attacks against the mob.

The prosecutor said the younger Gotti, who has denied ordering the Sliwa attacks, was careful not to get too close to most crimes, relying on associates and soldiers to carry them out.

"He never got his hands too dirty," she said.

In fact, Rocah said, Gotti operated like the chief executive officer of a corporation, "raking in millions of dollars in the 1990s."

She added: "Throughout the 1990s, John Gotti's business was crime, and business was good."

Rocah said Gotti developed a strategy to claim he had quit the mob after an uncle told him in prison that he was being demoted from his leadership role in the Gambino crime family and after he learned that his best friend was cooperating with the government.

"The proof of this defendant's guilt is overwhelming," she said.

The closings began a day after Judge Shira Scheindlin tossed out two new racketeering charges the government brought to try to prove Gotti continued committing crimes after he claimed to have quit the mob.

Gotti's lawyers were scheduled to present their closing argument Friday.

If convicted, Gotti, 42, could face up to 30 years in prison.

JUNIOR'S RETIREMENT 'CHARADE' (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 15, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday took aim at John "Junior" Gotti's claims that he left the Mafia - arguing that prison tapes expose the mob scion's retirement as an elaborately contrived charade.

"Gotti hatched a plan to . . . plant the seed that [he] was out of the mob life," Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam Rocah told a Manhattan federal jury in closing arguments.

"Before he was even charged with a crime, Gotti was planting the lies that would some day be used in a courtroom like this one."

Gotti claims he left the mob in 1999 and can't be prosecuted for racketeering because the five-year statute of limitations has expired.

In wrapping up the defense case, attorney Charles Carnesi tried to cast doubt on the feds' interpretation of a key videotape in the case.

Prosecutors had claimed that Junior's "Dapper Don" dad, John Gotti Sr., was captured on tape a year before his death announcing he was passing the crime-family reins to his brother Peter and three others, including Junior.

The defense insisted the tape simply referred to Junior and two other mobsters copping guilty pleas.

Alleged Galante Ally Pleads Guilty In New York Case (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063520

'Matty the Horse' admits he helped infiltrate labor union

NEW YORK (AP) – Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello, an ailing 86-year-old longtime capo in the Genovese crime family who had ties to Danbury garbage kingpin James Galante, pleaded guilty Thursday to a racketeering charge, admitting he helped infiltrate a union and interfere with a federal grand jury probe.

Ianniello, his wooden cane hanging on a chair beside him, entered the plea before U.S Magistrate Judge Ronald L. Ellis in Manhattan.

A plea agreement signed with the government called for Ianniello to be sentenced to between 1½ and two years in prison. Without the deal, Ianniello would have faced up to 20 years in prison. Sentencing was set for Dec. 14.

He also agreed to forfeit up to $1 million to the government.

Ianniello was indicted in June along with Galante and 27 others in a broad federal racketeering case that involved the garbage industry.

He was a longtime capo who allegedly became one of the family's acting bosses following the 1997 racketeering conviction of Vincent "The Chin" Gigante.

Gigante died in prison at age 77 last December. Long before that, he was dubbed the "Oddfather" for his bizarre behavior, including wandering the streets of Greenwich Village in nightclothes, muttering incoherently.

Ianniello, who lives on Long Island, is free on bail.

In court, Ianniello was difficult to understand as he read a statement admitting his role in efforts to corrupt a union and to prevent the union's leaders and employees from being honest with the government during a federal grand jury probe of mob activities.

Ianniello's lawyer said his client's voice was affected by a stroke.

Ianniello entered his plea to a single count of racketeering, admitting that he received unlawful payments from a labor union and that he conspired to obstruct justice.

Ianniello said he committed the crimes between 1990 and 2005.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy J. Treanor told Ellis that Ianniello participated in a conspiracy in which some union officers lied to federal investigators about various things, including the involvement of organized crime in union business.

Aryan Brotherhood Jury Deadlocks On Death Penalty Verdict (AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

Santa Ana, Calif. (AP) -- A federal jury has failed to reach a verdict in the death penalty phase of the trial of two Aryan Brotherhood leaders convicted in July of murder, racketeering and conspiracy, the jurors announced Thursday in a note to the judge.

The same jurors convicted Barry "The Baron" Mills and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham in July. Jurors were then asked, in a separate proceeding, to determine whether Mills, 58, and Bingham, 59 should be sentenced to death or life in prison without possibility of parole.

After jurors indicated they were deadlocked, defense attorneys asked U.S. District Judge David O. Carter to declare a mistrial, which would result in Mills and Bingham serving life sentences without parole. Prosecutors asked that the judge consider ordering the jurors to resume deliberations and try to break the deadlock.

Carter did not immediately issue a ruling.

Jurors had deliberated for five days in the death penalty phase of the trial.

The case against Mills and Bingham was part of a larger indictment that federal prosecutors hope will dismantle the violent white supremacist which is accused of running powerful gambling operations and drug rings from inside some of the nation's most notorious prisons.

Experts say the full indictment, which lists 32 murders and attempted murders, makes up one of the largest federal capital punishment cases in U.S. history, with more than a dozen people potentially facing execution. More defendants go on trial in Los Angeles later this year.

Mills and Bingham were convicted under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law, and of offenses known as Violent Crime in Aid of Racketeering — laws originally passed to target the Mafia. The so-called VICAR verdicts, which involved the killings of two black inmates in 1997, made Mills and Bingham eligible for the death penalty.

The two were convicted of inciting a race riot at a prison in Lewisburg, Pa., by conspiring to send a secret message to Aryan Brotherhood members. Frank Joyner and Abdul Salaam, alleged members of the DC Blacks prison gang, were killed during the riot.

DOJ_NMG_0063521

Government witnesses testified about a secret note, written in invisible ink made from urine, that was passed from Bingham's high-security cell in Florence, Colo., to Lewisburg. The note read: "War with DC Blacks, TD."

While prosecutors argued at trial that it was an order to incite a race war at the Pennsylvania facility, defense attorneys said the note was merely a warning to other gang members after tensions flared between the brotherhood and the D.C. Blacks at a prison in Marion, Ill.

The guilt phase of the trial exposed some of the brotherhood's long-kept secrets, including how members communicate from behind bars and between prisons that are thousands of miles apart.

Some witnesses testified about a plot to kill an inmate who had assaulted the late mob leader John Gotti in prison. Testimony indicated that Gotti, head of the Gambino crime family, had paid the brotherhood for protection.

One witness said Gotti offered to pay $500,000 for the hit; another testified that he had been passed bullets to hide until the gang could fashion a zip gun with which to shoot Gotti's attacker. The hit never occurred, and Gotti died of cancer in prison in 2002.

Mills and Bingham were also convicted of a count of murder for the killing of Arva Lee Ray, a prisoner slain at the Lompoc, Calif., penitentiary in 1989. They also were convicted of counts of racketeering that included acts of murder and attempted murder.

Mills is currently serving two life terms for murder after nearly decapitating an inmate in 1979. Bingham is behind bars on robbery and drug charges and would have been released in 2010.

The two other men who went on trial with Mills and Bingham — Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson — will be sentenced to life in prison.

Banker Is Charged With Taking $6.1 Million (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 15, 2006

A former vice president of National Penn Bank was charged yesterday with embezzling $6.1 million from bank clients.

Edward G. Mawhinney, 36, of Sewell, allegedly opened lines of credit under customers' names while working at the Philadelphia branch. He was charged by information instead of grand jury indictment. An information is usually a precursor to a guilty plea.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, Mawhinney created fake documents and forged signatures and information on loan applications, loan agreements and tax returns.

"This was a planned, calculated, and well-executed violation of customer trust," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said.

Mawhinney could not be reached for comment. The bank made the case public last year. In a statement, the bank said: "We appreciate and look forward to justice prevailing through the courts and applaud the U.S. attorney and the FBI for their diligent work in this matter."

The company said its parent, National Penn Bancshares, has $5.23 billion in assets and operates 80 branches of National Penn Bank, FirstService Bank, HomeTowne Heritage Bank, and Nittany Bank.

N.J. Banker Charged With Stealing $6.2M (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 15, 2006

A former vice president of private banking at National Penn Bank was charged yesterday by federal prosecutors with stealing and diverting almost $6.2 million of bank funds from 1998 to 2004.

Prosecutors filed the charges against Edward G. Mawhinney, 36, through a criminal information, a process indicating that Mawhinney will plead guilty.

According to prosecutors, Mawhinney, of Sewell, N.J., was responsible for opening loans and lines of credit for customers and managing the accounts.

The charging papers said Mawhinney fraudulently opened lines of credit under the names of existing bank customers without their knowledge and consent.

He did it by forging customer signatures and information on loan applications and federal tax returns. Authorities charged that he also created bogus documents to make the lines of credit appear legitimate.

Then, Mawhinney stole money from these lines of credit to pay his own debts and buy his home, prosecutors said.

He also gave money to benefit third parties without the bank's knowledge or approval. The third parties either got loans that had not been approved by the bank or had delinquent loans paid down or paid off completely.

DOJ_NMG_0063522

Mawhinney is also charged with embezzling almost $699,000 from 2001 to December 2004 that was entrusted to the safe-keeping of the bank.

"This was a planned, calculated and well-executed violation of customer trust," said U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan. "He forged signatures, created phony documents and took $6 million of the bank's money for himself and others."

A spokeswoman for National Penn Bank's holding company said Maw-hinney no longer works at the bank.

National Penn Bancshares has more than $5.2 billion in assets and operates 80 branch offices in Pennsylvania, most of them in the Philadelphia region.

The bank issued a statement yesterday saying they had reached a settlement in November in which some individuals involved in the fraud paid $3.5 million to National Penn.

National Penn said its insurer would put up more than $2.7 million to settle a claim the bank filed regarding the loan fraud. About half that sum already has been paid with the remainder due next month.

Thomas Bergstrom, Mawhinney's attorney, was unavailable for comment yesterday.

Former Company President Admits Stock Fraud Plot (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2006

CAMDEN, N.J. -- The former president of eContent Inc. pleaded guilty Friday, admitting that he and other officers and directors misused company funds for personal expenses.

John P. Sgarlat is the second person to plead guilty in connection with wrongdoing at the company, and the investigation is continuing, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric M. Schweiker.

Sgarlat, 55, of Harvey's Lake, Pa., and Wellington, Fla., also admitted to several schemes, including one in which he improperly issued stock.

Under his plea deal, Sgarlat agreed to pay restitution, in amounts to be determined. He also agreed to forfeit to the government at least $320,000, as well as a vehicle, certain artwork and an autographed Tiger Woods caddie coverall from the 2001 Masters golf tournament. The vehicle, artwork and coverall have all been seized by the FBI.

Sgarlat remains under house arrest pending sentencing next year. He has been under house arrest since his arrest by FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents in February, federal prosecutors said.

The company had been based in Florida while Sgarlat was president in the late 1990s and early 2000s. He was president until April 2001.

He pleaded guilty to two charges: conspiring to commit securities and wire fraud, which carries up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, or twice the gain from the scheme; and a count of money laundering, which carries up to 20 years in prison and a fine up to $500,000 or twice the value of the transactions.

___P>

On the Net:

U.S. Attorney's Office: http://www.usdoj.gov/usao/nj/press/

British Gambling Exec Resigns, Judge Rules He's Free To Leave NY (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - The chairman of British online gambling company Sportingbet PLC, who was arrested last week after New York customs officials discovered his name on a Louisiana warrant charging him with illegal online gambling, resigned on Thursday, the company said.

"Further to its recent announcements regarding Mr. Peter Dicks, Sportingbet confirms that, with great reluctance ... the Board accepted the resignation of Mr. Dicks as Independent Non-executive Chairman of Sportingbet with immediate effect," the company said in a statement posted on its Web site.

Dicks appeared in state Criminal Court in Queens on Thursday, when Judge Gene Lopez adjourned his case until Sept. 28.

The court appearance came a day after New York Gov. George Pataki received a formal request from Dicks and his attorney, Barry Slotnick, to withdraw a warrant the governor had signed that would allow Dicks' extradition to Louisiana.

Slotnick said he and his client argued that Louisiana's request for extradition "is inappropriate and that Peter Dicks has not committed any crimes there or anywhere. He hasn't been in Louisiana for 20 years."

On Thursday in court, Dicks was informed that the governor had withdrawn the warrant. Restrictions on Dicks' $50,000 bail that barred him from leaving New York also were lifted.

"There is nothing pending in terms of any accusations against Dicks in the state of New York," Slotnick told The Associated Press, adding that Dicks was now free to travel back to London, where he lives.

DOJ_NMG_0063523

A Pataki spokeswoman, Jessica Scaperotti, said the governor's decision was made in consultation with prosecutors in Louisiana and New York. "The decision was made to withdraw the extra warrant pending legal review of the arguments raised by Mr. Dick's attorneys," she said.

When he's back in court later this month, Slotnick said, "it's our hope that the (Louisiana) warrant at that time will be totally withdrawn."

Slotnick said Dicks is appearing in court New York on Sept. 28 only "because Louisiana is requesting his presence. But the only one who can order him to Louisiana is Gov. Pataki."

Dicks was arrested at New York's Kennedy International Airport on Sept. 6 following his arrival on a flight from England. Customs, performing a routine name check, discovered he had an outstanding warrant issued by the Louisiana State Police Gaming Enforcement Division.

Last Friday, after his New York arrest, acting Justice John Latella released him on $50,000 bail but ordered him to surrender his passport and stay in the New York metropolitan area during the extradition process.

The Louisiana warrant was issued in May, charging Dicks with gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a $25,000 fine.

Louisiana authorities want to bring Dicks back to stand trial in St. Landry Parish, where the warrant for his arrest was signed.

Dicks, 64, is the second executive of a British Internet sports-betting company to be held in the U.S.

David Carruthers, former chief executive officer of BetOnSports PLC, was arrested in July. The company fired Carruthers, who remains under house arrest in the St. Louis area awaiting trial, and closed its U.S. Web sites.

The founder of Abingdon PLC, a private equity firm, Dicks is also a director at Nasdaq-listed Polar Technology Trust PLC and Standard Microsystems Corp. He has been non-executive director at Sportingbet since 2000.

Sportingbet shares soared more than 25 percent to close at 192 pence ($3.60) on the London Stock Exchange. The stock had fallen sharply after Dicks was detained.

Sportingbet Chairman Dicks Resigns After Detention (Update4) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 15, 2006

By Dan Weeks

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Peter Dicks, arrested in New York last week on charges of illegal computer gambling, resigned as chairman of the Internet bookmaker Sportingbet Plc.

Sportingbet's shares surged 25 percent today, the most in four years, on speculation that the resignation makes the London-based company more likely to stay in business.

Dicks was the second manager of a U.K. Web gaming company to be ensnared in a government crackdown after the July arrest of David Carruthers, at the time the chief executive officer of Betonsports Plc. Betonsports was barred from doing business in the U.S., where officials say online wagering sites may launder money and lack safeguards for minors and gambling addicts.

``This is hot money betting that this issue has bottomed out," said Mark Reed, managing director of Teather & Greenwood, a London-based brokerage.

Shares of Sportingbet closed 39 pence higher at 192 pence in London. The stock is still 20 percent below its last closing price before Dicks' detention was announced, and about 40 percent below its close on July 14, the last session before Betonsports said Carruthers had been held.

Separately, a New York state judge postponed consideration of a request by Louisiana state police to extradite Dicks to that state on illegal computer gambling charges.

`Great Reluctance'

New York Governor George Pataki's warrant for Dicks' extradition was ``withdrawn for further investigation," said Nicole Navas, a spokeswoman for Queens District Attorney Richard Brown. The original Louisiana warrant for Dicks remains in effect.

The resignation was accepted with ``great reluctance," the company said in a Regulatory News Service statement. Sportingbet said it will replace Dicks in ``due course."

His departure ``helps the company, as it may find a replacement with a new strategy and fewer personal problems," said Ian Murrell, a trader at Wills & Co. in London.

Dicks, a 64-year-old Briton who also is chairman of London- based Daniel Stewart Securities Plc, was arrested Sept. 6 at New York's John F. Kennedy International airport after getting off a flight from London.

He was released on bail two days later and returned to Queens Criminal Court today for an extradition hearing in Kew Gardens, New York. Judge Gene Lopez set a new hearing date of Sept. 28 and gave Dicks permission to leave the country in the meantime.

Dicks, who received his passport and driver's license back from New York authorities, declined to comment on his charges or extradition. His lawyers, Peter Neiman and Barry Slotnick, also declined to comment.

888 Resignation

``He's appeared, he will appear," Slotnick told the judge at the hearing before Lopez ruled, referring to his client.

The chief executive officer of 888 Holdings Plc, another U.K. online-gaming company, also said he will step down today. John Anderson will be replaced by Gigi Levy, 888's chief operating officer, at the end of the year.

``We are closely monitoring the progress of the recent enforcement actions in the U.S.," 888 said today in a statement. ``888 has no involvement" in sports betting, it said.

Shares of 888, the world's largest online casino, added 2.4 percent to 150 pence in London. PartyGaming Plc, the world's biggest Internet-poker company, advanced 4.3 percent to 110.25 pence, its biggest percentage gain in almost a month.

``These stocks have gotten destroyed and they are still huge cash flow businesses," said Darren Chervitz, research director at New York-based Jacob Asset Management, which invests in Internet companies. ``Someone may be saying this is the time to take a chance."

Venture Capitalist

Sportingbet, which first sold shares to investors in January 2001, accepted almost 150 million sports and gaming wagers in the fiscal third quarter that ended April 30. About four-fifths of clients are American.

Dicks joined Sportingbet as non-executive chairman in 2000, according to the company's Web site. He co-founded venture- capital firm Abingworth Plc and is a director of companies in the U.S. and U.K., including Polar Capital Technology Trust. He also is chairman of Private Equity Investor Plc, a London company that invests in computer and Internet companies.

To contact the reporter on this story: Dan Weeks in London at dweeks1@bloomberg.net

Ex-Prosecutor's Bribery Trial Begins (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

(AP) - DETROIT-A lawyer for a former chief prosecutor accused of helping a convicted rapist get a new trial in exchange for campaign contributions tried to cast him as an ethical man as his trial began Wednesday.

But prosecutors said Carl Marlinga let his political ambitions interfere with the pursuit of justice.

Marlinga's duty "was overcome by a desperate need for money - not to line his own pockets, but to fuel his political ambitions," Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares said in his opening statement to the jury.

Marlinga, the former Macomb County chief prosecutor, is charged with bribery, wire fraud, making false statements to the Federal Election Commission and violating federal campaign finance laws. The charges stem from the 59-year-old's failed 2002 bid for Congress.

If convicted, he could face up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Prosecutors say that Marlinga filed a motion with the Michigan Supreme Court that led to a new trial for Jeffrey Moldowan, who had been convicted in 1991 of kidnapping and raping his ex-girlfriend. Moldowan was acquitted at his new trial after spending more than 10 years behind bars.

They say he also accepted contributions in exchange for helping St. Clair Shores businessman James Hulet, accused of drugging and raping a teenage girl.

Hulet eventually pleaded guilty to assault with intent to commit criminal sexual conduct, a drug charge and a firearm charge, and was sentenced to two years in prison in January 2004.

Marlinga was not personally involved in the prosecution of Moldowan, which was handled by an assistant prosecutor. But he took an interest after being contacted by Ralph Roberts, a prominent businessman who employed Moldowan's sister, Cares said.

Marlinga filed his motion with the Supreme Court as he was approaching an important fundraising deadline in his congressional campaign. Around the same time, Roberts contributed the maximum $2,000 allowed. Later, Roberts gave another $1,600 in his wife's name, and Marlinga also expected Roberts to host fundraisers for him, Cares said.

Charges against Roberts were dropped last year.

Defense attorney Mark Kriger said Marlinga's interventions in the Moldowan case began before he decided to run for Congress and were motivated by a commitment to justice.

"What he did in the Moldowan case, we as citizens should be very proud of," Kriger said.

The federal court trial is expected to last about two weeks. Marlinga spent two decades as chief law enforcement official of Michigan's third-largest county. Before his election to the post, he worked for a time as an assistant U.S. attorney in Detroit - part of the same office prosecuting him now.

Guard Pleads Guilty In Contraband Case (AP-Y)

By Bill Kaczor, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

One of five prison guards charged in a sex-for-contraband scandal that ended in a deadly shootout with federal agents pleaded guilty Thursday to conspiracy to commit mail fraud.

Alfred Barnes, 42, of Thomasville, Ga., agreed to cooperate in the prosecution of other defendants. In exchange, the government dropped charges including witness tampering, bribery and mail fraud.

The five men are accused of taking part in an alleged scheme in which guards reportedly paid female inmates for sex with alcohol, food, money and marijuana over a two-year period. The guards also were accused of intimidating inmates and witnesses to ensure their silence.

Authorities said prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution on June 21 and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and the other defendants.

Hill and Justice Department special agent William "Buddy" Sentner were killed. A prison employee assisting in the arrests was wounded. None of the surviving guards were charged in connection with the shooting.

Barnes testified that families of three female inmates mailed money orders to him and he provided them with cosmetics, jewelry, cigarettes and other tobacco products that he smuggled into the prison. He said he had sexual relationships with two of the women, and "basically just a money relationship" with the third.

Another guard, Vincent Johnson, also pleaded guilty Sept. 6 to conspiring to commit mail fraud in a similar deal with prosecutors. Johnson was not accused of having sex with inmates. Instead, coerced inmates to keep quiet about the scheme and to not cooperate with investigators, according to a statement of fact he signed.

Barnes and Johnson each could face a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and $250,000 fine. Johnson's sentencing is set for Nov. 17 and Barnes' for Dec. 14.

Trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 30 for the other three guards, Gregory Dixon, Alan Moore and E. Lavon Spence.

Feds Lower Boom On Alternative Money (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh, Usa Today

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The government Thursday warned consumers and businesses that it is illegal to use alternative money known as "Liberty Dollar" coins, which organizers promote as a competitor to the almighty dollar.

"We don't want consumers to be fooled," U.S. Mint spokeswoman Becky Bailey says, noting U.S. Attorneys offices across the USA have noticed a marked increase in inquiries about the coins.

The coins' producers vowed to fight the government's decision.

Evansville, Ind.-based National Organization for the Repeal of the Federal Reserve Act and the Internal Revenue Code, otherwise known as NORFED, has been making the Liberty Dollar coins for eight years and claims $20 million is in circulation. The group says the money, unlike official U.S. cash, has a hedge against inflation because it is made almost entirely of silver and is backed by stocks of silver and gold in a vault in Idaho.

The coins are then spent by the group's 2,500 Liberty Associates in stores run by fellow supporters or are accepted unknowingly by clerks who are unaware they are not receiving real money.

The Justice Department has determined that use of Liberty Dollars, which come in varying denominations, "is a crime," according to the Mint, which issued a rare public warning Thursday.

"The United States Mint is the only entity that can produce coins," Bailey says.

The Mint notes the coins share some resemblances to real money, such as the term "Trust in God" instead of "In God We Trust" and use of a torch in the design. Such similarities may confuse people into thinking the money is real, the Mint says.

But NORFED says it will challenge the government, arguing it has never claimed Liberty Dollars were official money and that it has a right to offer an alternative.

"The designs and verbiage ... are original and are not copies of any U.S. Mint currency," NORFED Executive Director Michael Johnson said in a statement.

It's unclear how many people or businesses are unknowingly holding Liberty Dollars, which cannot be exchanged for real money at banks.

In a case in Buffalo, a man and his son are set to go on trial next month after they knowingly tried to buy beer at a Buffalo Sabres hockey game with Liberty Dollars.

The Mint did not say if government officials will seek to prosecute individuals or NORFED after its warning.

DOJ_NMG_0063526

Reed Runk, part-owner of Kendall Funk & Bismark Jewelers in Chambersburg, Pa., says the store has been accepting Liberty Dollars for about a year and has sold a few as well. Runk says the store will continue to accept and sell the coins.

"We just feel that they are something that educates people as to what the monetary systems are like in the world, that they are a fiat system, that if people lose faith in them, they will collapse," he says. Besides, "They are a good-looking coin."

Bond Denied For Litchfield Man Accused Of Producing Child Porn (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. - A federal judge denied bond Thursday for a 65-year-old man accused of creating sexual images of children in a photo studio above a hair salon.

Paul Kincaid, who is charged with possessing child pornography and producing it near his home in Litchfield, will remain in the custody of U.S. marshals pending trail, said Sharon Paul, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield.

"The judge found that he presented a danger to the community," Paul said.

Prosecutors accuse Kincaid of using a Polaroid camera to create sexual images of minors in a makeshift photo studio above a hair salon near his home.

Kincaid's attorney, Jon Gray Noll, said after the judge's ruling that it's too early to say how his client might eventually plea.

"We have to see the pretrial discovery, we have to see how the evidence was obtained," he said. "I've had a lot tougher cases that we've won."

Authorities said they seized hundred of images of child pornography, including photo albums, from Kincaid's home, which is located about 50 miles south of Springfield.

A criminal complaint charges Kincaid with possession and production of child pornography on or about September 2004. Authorities did not release the ages or otherwise identify the alleged victims.

Kincaid was arrested at his home Sept. 6.

A conviction on a charge of producing child pornography carries a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison. The possession charge carries a penalty of up to 10 years, authorities said.

Elderly Women Plead Not Guilty In Los Angeles Hit-run Transient Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

By Andrew Glazer, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A pair of elderly women charged with murdering two transient men and illegally collecting millions from their life insurance policies have pleaded not guilty.

Helen Golay, 75, and Hungarian-born Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, each face two counts of murder and two counts of conspiracy to commit murder for financial gain in the deaths of Paul Vados, 73, a Hungarian native, in November 1999, and Kenneth McDavid, 51, in June 2005. The women are being held without bail as long as prosecutors consider a death sentence for them.

Authorities alleged that Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, convinced the men to sign them on to their life insurance policies and then collected some $2.3 million (â,¬1.8 million) after running them over in secluded alleys.

Superior Court Commissioner James Bianco on Wednesday denied Golay's request to be allowed to have mascara and tweezers to pluck her eyebrows, to wear her own clothes and to be awakened no earlier than 7 a.m. on court days.

"I certainly understand the difficulties of confinement," but sheriffs need time to bring her from her jail in surburan Lynwood to the downtown Los Angles courtroom, Bianco said.

Rutterschmidt's attorney, Michael Sklar, challenged the legality of conspiracy charges against her, but Bianco ruled that the charges could stand. Sklar also said he had not yet received evidence from the state.

Bianco ordered the district attorney's office to provide him with discovery by Sept. 22. Bianco also scheduled a next court hearing for Oct. 5, when a date for preliminary hearings would be set.

Federal authorities arrested the two women in May and charged them with mail fraud in connection with the insurance scheme while the murder investigation progressed.

Former Ramsey Suspect Appears In California Court (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, September 15, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif. — John Mark Karr, briefly a suspect in JonBenét Ramsey's murder, was back in court here Thursday for the first time since he jumped bail five years ago to avoid child pornography charges.

Karr's chief lawyer, Robert Amparan, said the 41-year-old former teacher will fight the misdemeanor charges and has no plans to cut a deal with prosecutors involving a guilty plea in exchange for a sentence of time served and probation.

Karr, unshackled in a blue jailhouse jumpsuit, sat passively as lawyers debated whether cameras should be allowed at his trial on five counts of possessing pornography, brought when investigators allegedly found illicit images on his computer.

Defense lawyer Gayle Gutekunst argued that a simple misdemeanor case had "exploded into a media event" that could make it hard to find impartial jurors.

"The court can put the skids on this and help return the case to what it was in 2001," Gutekunst said.

Judge Cerena Wong rejected TV cameras but said she'd permit one still photography camera. Wong said Karr's trial would begin Oct. 2 but scheduled a hearing to resolve a dispute over whether prosecutors can seek a delay. Karr will get a bail hearing Tuesday.

Authorities here regained custody of Karr this week after the Boulder, Colo., district attorney said Karr no longer was a suspect in Ramsey's December 1996 death because DNA tests failed to put him at the crime scene.

Karr was arrested in Thailand on Aug. 16 after he made phone calls and wrote e-mails claiming to have killed the 6-year-old child beauty queen.

He was brought to Colorado, even though his ex-wife, the mother of his three sons, said he couldn't have killed Ramsey because he was in Georgia that Christmas with his family.

If convicted of the child pornography charges here, Karr could face a maximum of a year in jail on each count, although first-time offenders rarely get a sentence that severe, says David LaBahn, executive director of the California District Attorneys Association. A typical sentence in a case like Karr's is six months, LaBahn says.

Karr already has been in custody seven months — six months in 2001 before he made bail and a month since his Thailand arrest. California defendants get an additional day for every three days of jail time, so he has more than nine months to his credit now.

Once free after a conviction, he would be in a statewide law-enforcement database of sex offenders but not on the public registry created under California's Megan's Law. Only felony offenders appear on that list.

Asked why Karr fled, Amparan noted that he had lost his job and his family after his wife filed for divorce and obtained a restraining order prohibiting contact with her or their children.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Department Closes Investigation Into Teenager's Death (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

Annapolis (AP) - The Justice Department has ended an investigation into the death of a black teenager at a party in Anne Arundel County.

Seventeen-year-old Noah Jamahl Jones was killed in the summer of 2004 in an altercation that involved six white men in Pasadena.

The Justice Department began its investigation after allegations were made that Jones' death might have resulted from a racially motivated attack. But it said Thursday that there is insufficient evidence to pursue criminal civil rights charges.

One of the men was acquitted in state court last year of voluntary manslaughter.

Missouri: Voter ID Law Is Struck Down (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

A judge struck down the state's new voter identification law as an unconstitutional infringement on the right to vote. The law required voters to show a federal or Missouri-issued photo ID at the polls. The judge, Richard Callahan of Cole County Circuit Court, said that was an unconstitutional burden on voters because the paperwork required to get those ID's was not free. In Georgia, a federal judge blocked that state from enforcing its voter identification law during local special elections next week. Georgia's law requires voters show a valid form of government-issued identification.

Judge Strikes Down Mo. Voter ID Law (AP-Y)

By Kelly Wiese

AP, September 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063528

A judge struck down Missouri's new voter identification law Thursday as an unconstitutional infringement on the right to vote.

The law required voters to show a federal or Missouri-issued photo ID at the polls, which Cole County Circuit Judge Richard Callahan said was an unconstitutional burden on voters because the paperwork required to get those IDs is not free.

The right to vote is "a right and not a license," the judge wrote.

Callahan said the requirement is a particular burden to women, the poor, the undereducated and the elderly. Missouri law requires those getting or renewing a driver's license to show they are lawfully in the country, generally with a birth certificate or passport.

Those whose name has changed, such as some married women, also must provide documents showing those changes. And some people may not have the knowledge of how to navigate bureaucracy to obtain a license, he said.

Supporters of voter ID laws say they are needed to protect against voter fraud.

Gov. Matt Blunt, a Republican who backed the law, decried the decision.

"This is a constitutionally sound law that will help improve Missourians' confidence in the elections process and help combat those who attempt to manipulate the system," he said in a written statement.

Secretary of State Robin Carnahan, a Democrat who has been critical of the law, praised the decision.

"This ruling affirms my concern that the law clearly jeopardizes the constitutional voting rights of many Missourians," she said.

Also Thursday, a federal judge in Georgia blocked the state from enforcing its voter identification law during local special elections next week. Georgia's law requires voters show a valid form of government-issued identification, such as a passport or driver's license. If they don't have those, voters can also obtain a free voter ID card.

U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy said that few have obtained identification cards, even though officials know thousands don't have them.

He did not block use of the law during November's general election, explaining that he would hear arguments on that issue later.

Pledge Challenger Newdow Claims Web Scribe Defamed Him (LAW)

By Mike Mckee, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 15, 2006

Sacramento, Calif., atheist Michael Newdow took plenty of grief from conservative commentators two years ago when he tried unsuccessfully to get the words "under God" taken out of the Pledge of Allegiance.

But being called a liar in an online column was more than he could stand -- and a Northern California minister could pay the price.

This Monday, Newdow -- who's both a lawyer and an emergency room physician -- is scheduled to appear in San Francisco's 1st District Court of Appeal to argue that his libel suit against the Rev. Austin Miles should be allowed to proceed.

Newdow claims that Miles -- a self-described "interdenominational chaplain" who writes conservative columns posted on the Internet -- defamed him by accusing him of committing perjury before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals during the pledge case. Specifically, Newdow claims Miles accused him, in posts on two news service sites, of telling the court his young daughter suffered emotional distress as the result of being forced to recite the pledge in her classroom. Newdow insists he never said that.

Instead, he says, he only argued that children, including his daughter, are unduly influenced when a state-run school leads them in a ritual proclaiming the existence of God.

"Had Miles done as any reasonable person would have done -- i.e., simply read the 9th Circuit's panel decision before writing his article," Newdow wrote in court papers, "he would have quickly appreciated that his 'view' ... was 100 percent wrong."

The 9th Circuit in 2002 agreed with Newdow's claim that the pledge, as recited in public schools, violated the First Amendment's establishment clause. But two years later, the U.S. Supreme Court tossed Newdow's suit, voting 5-3 that he didn't have standing to bring it in the first place.

Since then, Newdow has pursued the merits of his arguments by representing an unnamed "Roe" client in challenging the pledge again. That case is now pending before the 9th Circuit, as is a separate case of Newdow's challenging the inclusion of the words "In God We Trust" on American money.

In his case against Miles, Newdow won a $1 million default judgment in Superior Court in June 2004 after Miles failed to respond to the initial complaint. That judgment was later set aside, though, after the trial court found that Miles, through no fault of his own, had no actual notice of the suit.

Immediately thereafter, Miles filed a motion to strike Newdow's libel suit as an attempt to block free speech. Contra Costa County Superior Court Judge Steven Austin denied that motion last year.

DOJ_NMG_0063529

On appeal, Miles' lawyers -- Edward White III, associate counsel at the Thomas More Law Center in Ann Arbor, Mich., and Stockton, Calif., attorney Mark Thiel -- contend their client has shown his online comments were protected speech involving an issue of public interest.

To overcome that presumption, they argue in court papers, Newdow -- as an admitted public figure -- would have to show by clear and convincing evidence that Miles acted with actual malice. White and Thiel contend Miles' comments were based on information from other sources that he believed were accurate.

"When all is said and done," the two argued, "the dispute here is one of semantics and not of malicious falsehood."

That's not what Newdow believes. He even accuses Miles of making up quotes purported to be Newdow's own words.

"This man has no compunction whatsoever about disseminating falsehoods and persisting in flouting the law," Newdow, who is representing himself, wrote in court documents. "His meaningless claim that Newdow must have said something, somewhere -- 'on an Internet site ... or during television interviews' -- that could be used to support his fabrication is nothing but drivel."

Newdow also argues his default judgment should be reinstated, contending Miles actively hid to avoid being served the suit. Newdow says he tried service by mail, made two attempts through a professional service company and hired a licensed private investigator, all to no avail.

"The court will see," he wrote, "that the only inference that can be drawn from the evidence in this case is that Miles sneered at our judicial system and intentionally avoided service."

Miles' lead lawyer, White, couldn't be reached for comment.

Newdow, contacted in his Sacramento office, said Monday he mainly wants to clear his name.

"I think many people think that what he wrote was true," he said. "I'd like to restore my reputation."

The case is Newdow v. Miles, A109660.

Navy Chaplain Guilty Of Disobeying An Order (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

A Navy court decided yesterday to reprimand and dock the pay of an evangelical Protestant chaplain after finding him guilty of disobeying an order by appearing in uniform at a political protest in front of the White House in March.

The chaplain, Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, said he intends to "appeal by all means possible all the way to the Supreme Court."

Klingenschmitt, 38, who belongs to a small evangelical offshoot of the Episcopal Church, has been a vocal critic of the Navy's policies on prayer in ceremonial settings. He has accused his superiors of pressuring chaplains to offer generic, nonsectarian prayers, and he has gained wide attention and sympathy among religious conservatives.

Over the past year, Klingenschmitt worked closely with Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.) and other members of Congress to push the Bush administration to issue an executive order guaranteeing the right of chaplains to pray "in the name of Jesus." So far, the White House has rebuffed the request.

On March 30, Klingenschmitt wore his uniform at a news conference in Lafayette Square in which former Alabama chief justice Roy S. Moore and others decried President Bush's lack of action on the chaplain's complaints. Klingenschmitt maintained that his only participation in the event was to offer public prayers and that he had prior written permission to wear his uniform when conducting "a bona fide worship service or observance."

During court-martial proceedings this week at the naval base in Norfolk, a military prosecutor, Cmdr. Rex A. Guinn, said Klingenschmitt had received clear orders from his superiors not to wear his uniform at media events or political protests. The event in Lafayette Square, he contended, was not a true worship service or observance.

On Wednesday, a jury of five Navy officers found Klingenschmitt guilty of one misdemeanor count of disobeying a lawful order. Yesterday, the same jury determined his punishment: a formal reprimand and forfeiture of pay at the rate of $250 a month for the next 12 months.

That would amount to $3,000, or about 5 percent of his pay. But Klingenschmitt is unlikely to incur the full fine, for two reasons: The jury recommended that Rear Adm. Frederic Ruehe, commander of the Navy's Mid-Atlantic region, suspend the financial penalty, and Klingenschmitt doubts he will remain in the Navy for 12 more months.

"The letter of reprimand is actually the worst punishment because it will be used in a couple of months to kick me out of the Navy in a separate process called an administrative separation board," the chaplain predicted.

Kevin Copeland, a Navy spokesman, said that Klingenschmitt's prediction was "strictly hypothesis at this time" because "the ink isn't even dry on the court-martial yet."

DOJ_NMG_0063530

But among the documents that Klingenschmitt introduced in his defense during the court-martial was a March 22 e-mail from Vice Adm. John C. Harvey Jr., the Navy's head of personnel, to Adm. Michael G. Mullen, the chief of naval operations, recommending Klingenschmitt's "involuntarily release" from the Navy "due to lack of career potential."

The e-mail noted: "This officer is the individual who conducted a hunger strike in front of the White House several months ago and has engaged in other actions concerning [Defense Department] and Navy Religious Ministry policies."

Klingenschmitt served as an Air Force officer for 11 years before becoming a chaplain four years ago. He said he believes the e-mail, which was sent eight days before he wore his uniform at the Lafayette Square protest, "proves this is a reprisal against me for my whistle-blower complaints to Congress and the press."

Jury Recommends Reprimand For Navy Chaplain Who Disobeyed Order By Appearing In Uniform (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sonja Barisic, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

(AP) - NORFOLK, Virginia-A jury on Thursday recommended that a Navy chaplain receive a letter of reprimand for disobeying an order by appearing in uniform at a political news conference at the White House.

The jury also recommended that Lt. Gordon Klingenschmitt forfeit $250 (â‚¬197) pay per month for a year but suggested that the monetary punishment be suspended.

Rear Adm. Frederic Ruehe, commander of the Navy's Mid-Atlantic Region, must decide whether to approve the recommendation.

The jury of five officers at Klingenschmitt's special court-martial determined Wednesday that he had disobeyed a superior officer's order prohibiting him from wearing his uniform during media appearances without prior permission.

The charge centered on a March 30 news conference protesting a Navy policy that requires nondenominational prayers outside of religious services.

Klingenschmitt had argued that he was allowed to wear his uniform if conducting a "bona fide worship service." He said he believes he was punished for making a political speech in uniform because he prayed in Jesus' name.

"Jesus was crucified, Peter and John were flogged and I got a minor reprimand," Klingenschmitt said in a telephone interview after court. "I have not yet become a martyr for the faith."

He said he would appeal the conviction and fight to remain a chaplain if the Navy tries to oust him. He said senior naval officials had already decided to fire him before the event.

Last December, the chaplain went on an 18-day hunger strike in front of the White House over the right to invoke Jesus' name outside such services.

Klingenschmitt had faced a maximum punishment of a reprimand and fines of $41,916 (â‚¬32,945), or two-thirds of his annual salary. He also could have been restricted to base for up to two months.

Military prosecutor Cmdr. Rex Guinn said the government had proved its case.

"Justice was done," Guinn told reporters.

Conservatives Say Religion Under Attack (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, September 14, 2006

Religious conservative leaders, sensing declining alarm over same-sex marriage, are warning that the debate over homosexuality has prompted attacks on religious freedom.

By expanding the discussion from marriage to religious expression, social conservatives say they will reconnect with religious voters and religious leaders who don't necessarily view same-sex unions as a threat.

"There are a number of pastors that said, 'Look, we don't get involved in politics, I'm not going to get involved in this issue, I just want to preach the gospel,'" said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council. "When they realize their ability to preach the gospel may very well be at stake, they may reconsider their involvement."

Perkins and others are building a case file of anecdotes where they say religious people have spoken out against gay marriage only to be punished. Perkins specifically cited the decision by Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich in June to fire his appointee to the Washington area transit board after the board member referred to homosexuals as "persons of sexual deviancy."

The board member, Robert J. Smith, said he was expressing his personal beliefs as a Roman Catholic.

The subject of religious expression will be the main theme of an Oct. 15 gathering in Boston of conservative religious and political leaders that will be broadcast to churches nationally.

Many social conservatives credit the furor in 2004 over gay marriage for mobilizing voters in key states who voted for President Bush. Since then, however, 16 states have passed initiatives or legislation banning same-sex marriage and several court decisions have upheld those bans.

"As the immediate threat has diminished so has the awareness," Perkins said.

Eight states have ballot initiatives in November to prohibit gay marriage, including some states with closely contested congressional races. Perkins said religious conservative groups planned to use direct mail and the Internet to alert voters about the stands candidates have taken on the marriage issue.

ANTITRUST:

Exelon Abandons PSEG Acquisition, Faults New Jersey (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Prospects for big utility mergers dimmed with Exelon Corp.'s announcement yesterday that it has abandoned its acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc., a deal valued at about $17.7 billion that would have created the nation's largest utility company by serving 18 million people.

Exelon blamed its decision, which was expected, on "insurmountable" obstacles, chiefly rate concessions and power-plant divestitures sought by public officials and consumer advocates in New Jersey, where PSEG is based. Exelon, of Chicago, spent more than $100 million pursuing PSEG in a deal announced in December 2004.

The longer the approval process became, the more costly the transaction was for Exelon shareholders. What started out as a $12 billion deal became a $17.7 billion transaction as Exelon's stock price appreciated. Yesterday, Exelon closed down 50 cents at $57.77 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, up from $43.05 when the deal was announced. PSEG's shares rose one cent to $66.15. In after-hours trading, PSEG's shares dropped $5.85, or 8.8%, to $60.30, while Exelon stock rose $1.73, or 3%, to $59.50.

Many industry economists say such combinations can make companies more skillful operators and reduce geographic risk caused by weather. New Jersey officials feared the loss of local oversight. Exelon sought to allay fears by promising to keep PSEG's headquarters in Newark, N.J.

The combination moved forward smoothly. It won approvals from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, Pennsylvania state regulators and the Justice Department, which weighs potential anticompetitive issues. The approval process bogged down at the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities. Many participants argued that the combined company would have unacceptable leverage over wholesale-power markets in the Midwest and mid-Atlantic area and that power-plant divestitures ordered by the federal government were insufficient to fully protect consumers against unfair prices. The companies offered $600 million in rate concessions.

Jeanne Fox, president of the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities, said the relationship between state regulators and PSEG would be constructive despite the failed merger.

The termination will cost PSEG "strategic benefits and the ability to spread risk geographically, but the impact on our earnings is not that significant," spokesman Paul Rosengren said. He said PSEG's earnings next year should go up about 30% from a range of $3.45 to $3.75 a share in 2006 to a 2007 range of $4.60 to $5 a share.

Exelon, PSEG End Merger Over Differences With NJ (MRKTWTCH)

By Matthew Dalton

Market Watch, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Exelon Corp. (EXC) and Public Service Enterprise Group (PEG) announced late Thursday they were breaking off their merger due to insurmountable differences between the two utilities and with New Jersey regulators.

After 19 months of negotiations between the utilities and New Jersey, Exelon and PSEG said the state's conditions for approving the $17 billion deal were too costly. The New Jersey Board of Utilities' approval was the last obstacle to the deal.

The companies said they could not reach an agreement on how many power plants the combined company would be allowed to own and how much New Jersey residents would pay for their electricity and natural gas.

"We are very disappointed that the merger cannot be completed," said John W. Rowe, Exelon's chief executive.

"We simply could not achieve agreement on issues ranging from market power mitigation to electric and gas rate concessions," said E. James Ferland, chairman and chief executive of PSEG.

PSEG's shares dropped 8.9% in after-hours trading to $60.25, while Exelon stock rose 3% to $59.50.

DOJ_NMG_0063532

A driving force behind the merger was the hope that Exelon, a highly regarded operator of nuclear power plants, could improve the performance of PSEG's two troubled nuclear plants, Hope Creek and Salem. The plants have improved dramatically since Exelon began operating them following the announcement of the merger in December 2004. Some investors have been concerned that the plants' performance might regress if the deal fell apart.

PSEG has an option to continue Exelon's operation of the plants for another three years starting in 2007. PSEG said Thursday it would still be a strong company without Exelon and reaffirmed its 2006 earnings guidance of $3.45-$3.75 per share.

"The company took strong steps over the last two years to improve our financial stability and reduce our international exposure," Ferland said.

The U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Justice Department, and Illinois and Pennsylvania regulators had approved the merger. But New Jersey consumer advocates and large industrial firms raised concerns that the combined company would own so many power plants in the state that it could effectively corner the electricity market and raise prices without fear of competition.

In early August, the two companies offered to give PSEG customers $600 million in cash through 2008 and credits against future rate increases for natural gas delivery. Staff of the New Jersey board responded with a counter-offer seeking $820 million through 2011 and the sale of two additional fossil-fueled power plants beyond what the companies said they would sell as part of an agreement with the Justice Department, which approved the deal in June.

The two utilities attempted the merger at a time of record electricity prices, an environment that many believe ultimately derailed the deal.

"One wonders whether the negotiation process would have been as contentious if wholesale power prices weren't so high," Paul Patterson, an analyst at Glenrock Associates.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

Exelon, Public Service Cancel Sale Over State Hurdles (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Jim Polson And Dan Lonkevich

Bloomberg, September 15, 2006

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Exelon Corp. abandoned its $17.8 billion purchase of New Jersey's Public Service Enterprise Group because of an impasse with state regulators over the plan to create the largest U.S. utility company.

The companies faced ``insurmountable gaps'' with the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities, Chicago-based Exelon and Newark, New Jersey-based Public Service said today in a statement. The board was the last regulatory hurdle for the deal.

Exelon agreed to buy Public Service in December 2004. The company said Aug. 30 that completing the transaction was no longer ``more likely than not'' as they tried to allay concern among the regulators that the combined company would be capable of inflating power prices.

``Most observers did feel the odds were getting longer as it took more time,'' said Tom Burnett, director of research at Wall Street Access in New York and a specialist in tracking acquisitions. ``The companies and the folks in the New Jersey regulatory office were just too far apart.''

Exelon Chief Executive Officer John W. Rowe had argued that his company would run Public Service's plants, particularly their nuclear units, more efficiently. He said that would increase the electricity supplied to New Jersey's competitive wholesale market, benefiting customers.

Public Service stock fell $6.18, or 9.3 percent, to $60 in after-hours trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of Exelon rose as much as $1.73, or 3.1 percent, to $59.50 in after- hours trading.

``The deal was enormous and it scared a lot of people,'' said Daniele Seitz, an analyst for Dahlman Rose & Co. in New York, who rates Exelon shares ``buy'' and doesn't own them. ``For the regulators it was a bit much.''

No Agreement

Exelon on July 31 offered $600 million in cash, with additional rate concessions, if New Jersey would agree to approve the acquisition. New Jersey's board made an undisclosed counter proposal on Aug. 17.

The companies had offered to sell power plants and place output from nuclear plants under long-term contracts to win approval from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

New Jersey ``apparently feels that the commitments we had to make to FERC and DOJ, those divestiture obligations, were not enough,'' Public Service Enterprise Group Chief Executive E. James Ferland said in an interview today. ``We don't agree with that.''

The regulators demanded further plant divestitures and constraints on sales from generators the companies would keep, he said.

Not Enough

DOJ_NMG_0063533

``We did not believe the companies offered enough direct and real rate relief," Ronald K. Chen, New Jersey Public Advocate said in a separate statement. ``The companies also would not agree to measures that our experts, and the Board of Public Utilities staff, believed were necessary to ensure that the merged company could not manipulate regional energy markets."

To win federal approval for the acquisition, Exelon previously agreed to sell six power plants in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, as well as place 2,600 megawatts of nuclear-power capacity under contract for as long as 15 years.

The Justice Department on June 22 gave antitrust approval to the deal, provided Exelon sell 5,600 megawatts of power plants. FERC had given approval a year earlier, based on a smaller divestiture and long-term nuclear-output sales.

Blocked Deals

Four of the nine largest U.S. utility takeovers announced in the past three years have been blocked by state officials. The largest deal pending, FPL Group Inc.'s $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy Group Inc., stalled May 31 amid a rate dispute in Maryland that prompted a new state law on utility mergers.

Exelon, owner of utilities in Chicago and Philadelphia, withdrew an offer for Dynegy Inc.'s Illinois Power Co. in 2003 after Illinois lawmakers rejected its terms.

Oregon's Public Utility Commission blocked the $1.4 billion sale of Portland General Electric Co. in March 2005, declaring its acquisition by Texas Pacific Group from Enron didn't benefit customers.

Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Wachovia Corp. in 2004 abandoned an $800 million bid for Tucson utility owner UniSource Energy Corp. after the Arizona Corporation Commission demanded the buyers put up more money, reducing the planned borrowing to finance the transaction.

Duke Energy Corp. closed on the $9 billion acquisition of Cincinnati-based utility owner Cinergy Corp. on April 3, less than 11 months after announcing the deal, after winning regulatory approval by five states as well as federal officials.

``If you can fly below the radar screen, you're fine," Seitz said. ``Look at the Duke-Cinergy merger. It went like a letter in the mailbox. Nobody cared."

To contact the reporter on this story: Jim Polson in New York at jpolson@bloomberg.net ; Dan Lonkevich in New York at dlonkevich@bloomberg.net

US Urges European Regulators To Lay Off Apple DRM (IDG)

By Nancy Gohring, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, September 15, 2006

DOJ official argues European policy is aimed at helping competitors instead of consumers

A U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) official has joined the debate surrounding Apple Computer's proprietary digital music technology by criticizing European antitrust activities, but groups attacking Apple are defending their actions.

Speaking in Washington, D.C., on Wednesday, Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general at the DOJ's antitrust division, warned that forcing companies to reveal their intellectual property stifles innovation. He used Apple as an example, in a nod to growing discontent in Europe regarding the way that music purchased from iTunes is tied to the iPod.

Architects of complaints against Apple in Europe say he's got it wrong. "We're not attacking intellectual property rights but saying they should be implemented in a way which doesn't dictate which player you use," said Torgeir Waterhouse, a senior advisor with the Norwegian Consumer Council.

His organization filed a complaint to Norway's consumer representative, or ombudsman, arguing that it's illegal for Apple to limit iTunes customers to playing music from the store exclusively on iPods. Along with similar representatives in Denmark and Sweden, the Norwegian ombudsman asked Apple to defend its policy. In a written reply, Apple said it won't budge on the issue but the company plans to meet representatives from the countries later this month to further discuss the issue. If Apple won't open up, the ombudsman will take the company to court.

Waterhouse suggests that Apple could solve the problem by licensing its digital rights management technology to other device makers so that iTunes customers could choose among devices or opt for an open standard that would be compatible with more devices.

Barnett's criticisms of European antitrust policy, including comments that the policy is aimed at helping competitors instead of consumers, are generally in line with comments from U.S. officials since the Bush administration came to power, said Scott Megregian, a partner and head of the European competition group in the law firm McDermott Will & Emery UK.

He disagrees with the argument that requiring companies to open up some of their technology stifles innovation. "That's an argument without support," he said. "Microsoft hasn't stopped innovating that I can tell despite regulations and attack by the E.U."

DOJ_NMG_0063534

So far, the European Commission has likely communicated with the countries that are pursuing Apple and has probably expressed an opinion on the matter, he said. While no official complaints have been filed with the Commission, if one is, the result will have the makings of a historical battle. "This has the potential to be the next big high-profile dispute," Megregian said.

Rent-A-Center Deal Gets Antitrust OK (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

PLANO, Texas --Rent-A-Center Inc., the largest U.S. furniture rental chain, and Rent-Way Inc., a rent-to-own chain operator, said Thursday that Rent-A-Center's planned acquisition of Rent-Way has gotten government antitrust clearance.

The waiting period for the deal, required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust improvement Act of 1976, expired Sept. 13.

The acquisition is expected to be completed in the fourth quarter.

Plano, Texas-based Rent-A-Center will pay about $576 million to buy Rent-Way of Erie, Pa., in a deal announced in August.

The acquisition marks an end to Rent-Way's six-year turnaround after a scandal.

Rent-Way, founded in 1981, was rocked by an accounting scandal six years ago when founder and CEO William Morgenstern announced that some executives had cooked the company's books to meet Wall Street earnings expectations in the late 1990s.

A federal investigation confirmed that three company officers acted on their own, improperly writing down $98 million in operating expenses. Rent-Way closed a $25 million settlement with shareholders in 2004.

Wright Strategy Plotted (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

Dallas Morning News, September 15, 2006

Antitrust provision is 'just a bump in the road,' Granger says

WASHINGTON – Facing a delicate negotiation over their Wright bill, Texas lawmakers said Thursday that they were moving ahead to get the North Texas compromise through the full House as early as next week.

Some indicated they were unwilling to accept a revision to the House bill removing antitrust immunity as the final word for the legislation to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field.

"It's just a bump in the road," said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth.

Getting the Wright bill passed in time depends largely on how successful members are in quickly reconciling competing versions of the legislation that have passed two House committees.

House members have only nine more voting days before they're scheduled to return home to campaign for the November elections.

Lawmakers also must find a way to steer the legislation through obstacles in the Senate.

"We're trying every creative way to get to the goal of preserving the balance of the agreement, protecting the interests of all the parties and getting it through the Congress," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who is leading the effort in the upper chamber.

The House Judiciary Committee on Wednesday removed an antitrust exemption sought by Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport in the legislation to lift the 1979 Wright law.

The five parties fear a long court battle, if the deal isn't given protections by Congress.

"What we're trying to do is stop the lawsuits that have gone on for 20-plus years and work this out so we move ahead," Ms. Granger said.

The bill would implement a June agreement by the five North Texas parties to lift limits on long-haul flights at Love in 2014. It would allow immediate one-stop flights across the U.S., as long as passengers first stopped in one of the nine states in the Wright perimeter.

The legislation would cut the number of available gates at Love Field to 20 from 32, a move that has sparked complaints that competition would be diminished. Nineteen gates at the airport are now operational.

The bill passed the House Transportation & Infrastructure Committee in July and appeared to be on a fast track to passage before the antitrust concerns surfaced.

Getting the Transportation Committee's version as the final vehicle on the House floor will require careful maneuvering with the chamber's leadership to overcome the changes implemented by the Judiciary Committee chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis.

DOJ_NMG_0063535

Rep. Joe Barton, R-Ennis, a senior House member who chairs another committee, said that "it's not unique" to sidestep another committee's changes in legislation moving through the chamber.

The original legislation was sponsored by Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, another powerful member and chairman of the Transportation Committee.

"You have one bill that's totally supported – the transportation bill – and another bill which the stakeholders totally oppose," Mr. Barton said. "So which bill would you try to get through the rules committee?

"If we need to reach an accommodation with Chairman Sensenbrenner, we're certainly open to that," he said.

Several members said they were deferring to Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Dallas, the only Texan on the 13-member House Rules Committee. The small but powerful panel negotiates changes in legislation from House committees and decides how bills will be handled on the House floor.

"I'm confident that we are going to find a way to move the language that was contained in the transportation bill," Mr. Sessions said.

Even if House members get their version through next week, the legislation would face a significant obstacle in the Senate.

The leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee have objected to the same antitrust exemption that slowed the bill in the House.

The House Judiciary Committee's version of the legislation – without the antitrust exemption – would satisfy the Senate detractors as well. But the parties to the North Texas agreement don't appear willing to give up the protection yet.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who met with Ms. Hutchison this week to discuss the issue, said he thought the Texas interests could be accommodated but declined to detail how that would happen.

"I think we're getting closer," Mr. Leahy said. "My biggest concern and only concern is that we not interfere with or rewrite the antitrust laws."

Ms. Hutchison said she's constantly trying to find new language to get the legislation through Congress.

"We're trying to work different words and different approaches that satisfy the balance of the agreement and will take the antitrust issue out of it," she said.

Lawyer Says FCC Ordered Study Destroyed (AP-Y)

By John Dunbar

AP, September 14, 2006

The Federal Communications Commission ordered its staff to destroy all copies of a draft study that suggested greater concentration of media ownership would hurt local TV news coverage, a former lawyer at the agency says.

The report, written in 2004, came to light during the Senate confirmation hearing for FCC Chairman Kevin Martin.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif. received a copy of the report "indirectly from someone within the FCC who believed the information should be made public," according to Boxer spokeswoman Natalie Ravitz.

Adam Candeub, now a law professor at Michigan State University, said senior managers at the agency ordered that "every last piece" of the report be destroyed. "The whole project was just stopped — end of discussion," he said. Candeub was a lawyer in the FCC's Media Bureau at the time the report was written and communicated frequently with its authors, he said.

In a letter sent to Martin Wednesday, Boxer said she was "dismayed that this report, which was done at taxpayer expense more than two years ago, and which concluded that localism is beneficial to the public, was shoved in a drawer."

Martin said he was not aware of the existence of the report, nor was his staff. His office indicated it had not received Boxer's letter as of midafternoon Thursday.

In the letter, Boxer asked whether any other commissioners "past or present" knew of the report's existence and why it was never made public. She also asked whether it was "shelved because the outcome was not to the liking of some of the commissioners and/or any outside powerful interests?"

The report, written by two economists in the FCC's Media Bureau, analyzed a database of 4,078 individual news stories broadcast in 1998. The broadcasts were obtained from Danilo Yanich, a professor and researcher at the University of Delaware, and were originally gathered by the Pew Foundation's Project for Excellence in Journalism.

The analysis showed local ownership of television stations adds almost five and one-half minutes of total news to broadcasts and more than three minutes of "on-location" news. The conclusion is at odds with FCC arguments made when it voted in 2003 to increase the number of television stations a company could own in a single market. It was part of a broader decision liberalizing ownership rules.

At that time, the agency pointed to evidence that "commonly owned television stations are more likely to carry local news than other stations."

DOJ_NMG_0063536

When considering whether to loosen rules on media ownership, the agency is required to examine the impact on localism, competition and diversity. The FCC generally defines localism as the level of responsiveness of a station to the needs of its community.

The 2003 action sparked a backlash among the public and within Congress. In June 2004, a federal appeals court rejected the agency's reasoning on most of the rules and ordered it to try again. The debate has since been reopened, and the FCC has scheduled a public hearing on the matter in Los Angeles on Oct. 3.

The report was begun after then-Chairman Michael Powell ordered the creation of a task force to study localism in broadcasting in August of 2003. Powell stepped down from the commission and was replaced by Martin in March 2005. Powell did not return a call seeking comment.

The authors of the report, Keith Brown and Peter Alexander, both declined to comment. Brown has left public service while Alexander is still at the FCC. Yanich confirmed the two men were the authors. Both have written extensively on media and telecommunications policy.

Yanich said the report was "extremely well done. It should have helped to inform policy."

Boxer's office said if she does not receive adequate answers to her questions, she will push for an investigation by the FCC inspector general.

EU Antitrust Chief Says Her Commission Is Investigating Microsoft Office (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- The European Union's antitrust commission plans to investigate complaints regarding Microsoft Office, said EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes Thursday.

Kroes, speaking at the Fordham Annual Conference on International Antitrust Law & Policy, did not elaborate on the investigation.

Microsoft Corp. has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format. Microsoft claimed it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the ability to save Office documents in either the popular Portable Document Format or Microsoft's new, competing XPS format.

The EU has a long-running antitrust action against Microsoft, which dates to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling that came with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July.

Kroes said the Commission's actions on Microsoft "will result in benefits in terms of industrial competitiveness and will result in more innovation and lower prices for consumers."

European Union officials warned Microsoft on Tuesday not to shut out rivals in the security software market as the company plans to launch its Windows Vista operating system with built-in protection from hackers and malicious programs.

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said that the European Commission is "ready to give guidance to Microsoft" concerning Vista but added that it was up to the U.S. software maker "to accept and implement its responsibilities as a near monopolist to ensure full compliance" with EU competition rules.

EU Antitrust Chief Eyes US-Style Private Damage Lawsuits (DOW)

Dow Jones, September 15, 2006

BRUSSELS -(Dow Jones)- European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Thursday that she plans to devise a way to encourage private damage suits by early next year.

Speaking at the Council of Foreign Relations in New York, Kroes said the U.S. "has traveled much further down this road than we have in Europe" and that the E.U. needed to catch up. "Watch this space because we'll try to draw some conclusions from the debate early next year," she said.

Kroes has long said private action, including lawsuits, can increase competition without adding to regulators' workload.

The European antitrust chief said regulators were now considering how to draft regulations that would "make sure that private cases are actually brought to court, in other words, that the benefits of bringing proceedings outweigh the costs." She also said any new regulation must ensure "that our public and private enforcement systems are complementary."

Kroes said regulators on both sides of the Atlantic were working well together to crack down on cartels.

She said she had created a dedicated cartel-busting office with 60 officials, with powers to levy increased fines, and had implemented a U.S.-style "carrot and stick approach" by letting informers escape fines.

On Wednesday, her office fined 14 companies, including Royal Shell PLC (RSDA), a total of EUR266.7 million for fixing prices in the Netherlands of a material used in road construction.

One large difference in U.S. and E.U. antitrust enforcement that remains is how to reign in dominant companies. U.S. practice says only monopolies should be constrained, while E.U. law insists on "dominance."

DOJ_NMG_0063537

"It's true, of course, that dominance requires a lower market share than a monopoly and some people like to make much of this difference," she said. "But let's not overstate things. Our respective enforcement approaches are rather convergent."

-By William Echikson, Dow Jones Newswires; 32-2-285-0134; william.echikson@ dowjones.com

Apollo Buys GE Unit For $3.8bn (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

General Electric has sold its low-margin materials unit to the private equity firm Apollo Management for $3.8bn in cash and shares. It marks the latest attempt by the conglomerate to focus on high-growth businesses and revive its share price.

The deal – announced on Thursday – is part of GE's strategy of exiting low-growth markets and underlines the appetite of buy-out groups for industrial businesses that require substantial investment and restructuring.

People familiar with the deal said the boom in leveraged buyouts by cash-rich private equity groups was key to GE's decision to sell a business that was being squeezed by tough markets and increased competition.

"We negotiated an attractive price for the deal, and we will use the proceeds to fund growth and restructuring in our industrial businesses," said Lloyd Trotter, recently appointed chief executive of GE's industrial unit.

The deal gives Apollo, the New York-based fund run by the former investment banker Leon Black, a unit with more than 5,000 employees and $2.5bn in sales, and adds to Apollo's collection of industrial businesses.

The disposal of the unit, which makes silicones and quartzes for adhesives and sealants, was praised by Wall Street analysts as further evidence that GE was moving away from the slower-growing parts of its portfolio.

"We believe this is an attractive transaction," commented Jeffrey Sprague at Citigroup. "GE is selling a non-core business with low margins . . . at an attractive valuation."

Since taking over from Jack Welch in 2001, Jeffrey Immelt has tried to reshape GE to achieve double-digit earnings growth and high margins. But in spite of several disposals and acquisitions and a string of positive financial results, the share price has underperformed, partly because of concerns over GE's structure.

To complete the deal, GE had to buy out two joint venture partners; Germany's Bayer and Japan's Toshiba. Those purchases means GE will receive net proceeds of $2bn, which will largely go to pay for the shake-up of its other industrial businesses.

However, GE will retain a 10 per cent stake in the advanced materials business as well as $400m in notes – an arrangement that will give it a share of profits if Apollo sells or lists the business over the next few years.

JPMorgan and UBS advised GE and JPMorgan will lead the financing of the acquisition, which is likely to be made up of high-yield debt and loans.

Reshaping GE, Immelt Sells Unit (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

General Electric Co. continued its transformation under Chairman Jeffrey Immelt, agreeing to sell its silicone and quartz business for $3.4 billion to private-equity firm Apollo Management LP.

GE also has been weighing the future of its plastics business, where former Chairman Jack Welch cut his teeth and where Mr. Immelt once worked, according to people familiar with the matter. It isn't clear whether GE is considering selling the unit, which generates annual sales of $6.6 billion.

The unit it agreed to sell yesterday makes silicone used in adhesives and sealants and quartz used in semiconductor manufacturing and in tubing for fiber-optics and lamps. The unit, with annual sales of roughly $2.5 billion and 5,000 employees, has its headquarters in Wilton, Conn. GE doesn't disclose its earnings.

GE, Fairfield, Conn., said it would retain a 10% stake in the operation, which it called its advanced-materials group. It will also hold $400 million in debt obligations that yield interest payments.

GE said it would buy out minority partners in two joint ventures, GE Toshiba Silicones and GE Bayer Silicones, as part of the sale to Apollo. GE said it would receive about $2 billion in net proceeds from the deals.

The sale highlights the continuing changes to GE's portfolio since Mr. Immelt took over in September 2001. Since then, GE has completed transactions valued at more than $100 billion to buy and sell various units. Among other moves, GE sold most of its insurance businesses and several other industrial units.

Apollo, a large private-equity firm founded by financier Leon Black, has invested more than $16 billion in companies around the world. Over the past year, Apollo has been investing in the special-materials industry, including BPC Holding Corp., the parent of Berry Plastics Corp., and the plastics and adhesive business of Tyco International Ltd.

DOJ_NMG_0063538

The sale is expected to close by the end of the year. Wayne Hewett will remain as president and chief executive, GE said.

With respect to the plastics unit, people familiar with the matter say Mr. Immelt has stated in company meetings that the business is ripe for review. The unit has been struggling with raw-material inflation while combating stiff competition for many of its offerings. In the quarter ended June 30, sales at the plastics unit increased 3% to $1.68 billion, while operating profit dropped 12% to $183 million.

Analysts and investors have also speculated about the unit's future. In a note yesterday, Credit Suisse analyst Nicole Parent wrote that GE "could be exploring strategic alternatives for its plastics unit."

GE spokesman Russell Wilkerson declined to comment.

Also yesterday, another analyst, David Bleustein of UBS Investment Research, downgraded GE to neutral from buy in a move unrelated to the divestiture. Mr. Bleustein said in a report that GE's earnings next year "may be challenged" by a number of factors, including higher tax rates, continued problems at its NBC television network and slowing services business at its aircraft-engine unit. Mr. Bleustein also wrote that GE may need to increase reserves at GE Capital, the funding arm for its financial-services businesses, after "bottoming out of reserves" there over the past few years. UBS has done investment banking with GE.

Mr. Wilkerson declined to comment on the downgrade, saying, "we expect to have a strong second half of the year and into 2007."

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, GE shares were down six cents at $34.78 apiece.

Iamgold To Buy Cambior For $1.2 Billion In Stock (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Iamgold Corp. has agreed to acquire Cambior Inc. for US$1.2 billion in stock, a premium of nearly a third to Cambior's market capitalization.

The companies said the new Iamgold will be the 10th largest publicly traded primary gold producer in the world, with 1.1 million ounces of gold production annually, reserves totaling 9.7 million ounces and a market capitalization of US$3 billion.

Under the transaction, shareholders of Cambior will receive 0.42 of an Iamgold share for each share held, worth about C$4.83, a 31% premium to Cambior's shares at Wednesday's close in Toronto. Cambior's U.S.-listed shares jumped 24% in premarket trading Thursday on Inet. Iamgold's shares were unchanged.

Current Iamgold shareholders will own about 57% of the merged company, while current Cambior shareholders will own about 43%. Shareholders are expected to vote on the arrangement, which has been approved by the boards of both companies, no later than early November.

Cambior has agreed to pay a break-up fee of C$45 million to Iamgold under certain circumstances if the transaction isn't completed.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

In Gamble, Calif. Tries To Curb Greenhouse Gases (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

SACRAMENTO — In the Rocky Mountain States and the fast-growing desert Southwest, more than 20 power plants, designed to burn coal that is plentiful and cheap, are on the drawing boards. Much of the power, their owners expected, would be destined for the people of California.

But such plants would also be among the country's most potent producers of carbon dioxide, the king of gases linked to global warming. So California has just delivered a new message to these energy suppliers: If you cannot produce power with the lowest possible emissions of these greenhouse gases, we are not interested.

"When your biggest customer says, 'I ain't buying,' you rethink," said Hal Harvey, the environment program director at the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation, in Menlo Park, Calif. "When you have 38 million customers you don't have access to, you rethink. Selling to Phoenix is nice. Las Vegas is nice. But they aren't California."

California's decision to impose stringent demands on suppliers even outside its borders, broadened by the Legislature on Aug. 31 and awaiting the governor's signature, is but one example of the state's wide-ranging effort to remake its energy future.

The Democratic-controlled legislature and the Republican governor also agreed at that time on legislation to reduce industrial carbon dioxide emissions by 25 percent by 2020, a measure that affects not only power plants but also other large producers of carbon dioxide, including oil refineries and cement plants.

DOJ_NMG_0063539

The state's aim is to reduce emissions of climate-changing gases produced by burning coal, oil and gas. Other states, particularly New York, are moving in some of the same directions, but no state is moving as aggressively on as many fronts. No state has been at it longer. No state is putting more at risk.

Whether all this is visionary or deluded depends on one's perspective. This is the state that in the early 1970's jump-started the worldwide adoption of catalytic converters, the devices that neutralize most smog-forming chemicals emitted by tailpipes. This is the state whose per capita energy consumption has been almost flat for 30 years, even as per capita consumption has risen 50 percent nationally.

Taking on global warming is a tougher challenge. Though California was second in the nation only to Texas in emissions of carbon dioxide in 2001, and 12th in the world, it produced just 2.5 percent of the world's total. At best, business leaders asked in a legislative hearing, what difference could California's cuts make? And at what cost?

California, in fact, is making a huge bet: that it can reduce emissions without wrecking its economy, and therefore inspire other states — and countries — to follow its example on slowing climate change.

Initiatives addressing climate change are everywhere in California, pushed by legislators, by regulators, by cities, by foundations, by businesses and by investors.

Four years ago, California became the first state to seek to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide from automobile tailpipes. Car dealers and carmakers are challenging the law in federal court.

In late August, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed a measure requiring builders to offer home buyers roofs with tiles that convert sunlight into electricity. Homeowners in some communities are already choosing them to reduce their electric bills.

California, which has for decades required that refrigerators, air conditioners, water heaters and other appliances become more energy efficient, just added to the list: first, chargers for cellphones or computers; second, set-top boxes and other remote-controlled devices. Those categories consume up to 10 percent of a home's power.

Last fall, California regulators barred major investor-owned electrical utilities from signing long-term contracts to buy energy unless the seller's greenhouse-gas emissions meet a stringent standard.

"We are dealing with it across the board," said Michael R. Peevey, the president of the Public Utilities Commission. By contrast, the Bush administration has been averse to any legislative assault on climate change.

Opponents say California may hurt its own residents with its clean-energy mandate. Scott Segal, a lawyer for Bracewell & Giuliani who represents electric utilities, summarized California's policy as: "All electrons are not created equal. We're going to discriminate against some of them, and create artificial barriers in the marketplace for electricity." California consumers could end up paying more for their energy and struggling to find enough, Mr. Segal said.

Is California dreaming? Can its multifaceted approach become a toolkit for other states? Will investors make the state the incubator for clean-energy technologies that will reduce its energy bills and buoy its economy? Or will all this turn California into a stagnating economic island of ever-rising electricity prices and ever-rolling blackouts?

One thing is certain: The issue will not go away. This summer, a brutal California heat wave killed roughly 140 people. A 2004 National Academy of Sciences report predicted that, at the current growth rate of emissions, there would be at least five times as many heat waves in Los Angeles by 2100 compared with the current historical average, and twice as many heat-related deaths.

The study predicted that at least half the state's alpine forests would disappear by century's end, and that the Sierra snowpack — crucial to California's water supply — would decline by at least 29 percent and as much as 70 percent.

There seems to be political support, in California and nationally, for action on climate change. Statewide, a July 26 poll from the Public Policy Institute of California showed that 79 percent of 2,051 people surveyed said that global warming was a "very serious" or a "somewhat serious" threat to the state's economy and quality of life. The findings mirrored those of a national poll of 1,206 people conducted in mid-August by The New York Times and CBS News.

But polling organizations have asked little about the potentially painful sacrifices that may be required.

The Car Culture

Back in the 1950's, when the movie director George Lucas was growing up, cars rocked around the clock in Modesto, and they were so enshrined in his 1973 hit, "American Graffiti." The movie reaffirmed what much of the nation knew — there was no car culture like California's. Sleek convertibles? Muscle cars? Sport utility vehicles? Many were hatched in the design studios of Detroit, but popularized by Hollywood movies and celebrities, and by plain old California consumers.

Fast forward to August. In the middle of the sales lot at Modesto Toyota sat a long row of sport utility vehicles the dealership had acquired as trade-ins in previous weeks. Leaning on a 2006 Ford Expedition, George S. Ismail, a sales manager, said, "We're getting a lot of people trading in their sport utility vehicles for smaller cars." Even heavily discounted, the used S.U.V.'s sit for weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0063540

Yet Modesto Toyota is breaking records, Mr. Ismail said, selling about 400 vehicles a month, up from 260 a year ago. Most are small cars — Camrys and Corollas. Some are hybrid vehicles that use even less fuel, like the Prius. One-quarter of 200,000 new hybrid vehicles registered nationwide in 2005 belonged to Californians, according to the automotive analyst R. L. Polk.

With smaller cars increasingly popular, California now burns less gasoline per capita than all but six states. Burning less gasoline cuts carbon dioxide. Tailpipes account for more than half the state's carbon dioxide emissions, federal figures show.

Much of this change in driver taste is attributable to the higher price of gasoline. But what if gasoline prices fall again and bigger, less efficient vehicles become more popular? California has an answer.

It came from Assemblywoman Fran Pavley, a Democrat and former schoolteacher who drives a Prius and whose South Coast district has a bird's-eye view of the smoggy Los Angeles basin. Four years ago Ms. Pavley wrote the first state law regulating carbon dioxide emissions from cars and trucks. It requires vehicle makers to eventually reduce the average emissions of carbon dioxide of the mix of cars it sells in California by 30 percent, beginning with the 2009 model year. Light trucks, including sport utility vehicles, must meet the same standard by the 2016 model year.

Ten states, including New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, have followed suit. Canada instituted voluntary emissions reductions at similar levels, which major automobile manufacturers have agreed they can meet. "We think that, coupled with Canada, we're now over one-third of the market," Ms. Pavley said in an interview.

But automobile manufacturers and some dealerships have vowed to wipe her law from the books. Their lawsuit's central assertion is that, by regulating carbon dioxide emissions, California is using a backdoor means to control fuel efficiency, which, under the federal Energy Policy and Conservation Act, is the exclusive preserve of the federal Transportation Department. To produce less carbon dioxide, cars would have to be more fuel efficient.

On Sept. 15, Judge Anthony W. Ishii of Federal District Court in Fresno will hear arguments on California's request to dismiss the case. If the lawsuit survives, the first hearing is set for January. This schedule overlaps with that of another case with direct bearing on this issue. The Supreme Court, petitioned by a dozen states, led by Massachusetts, and three cities, including New York, will decide whether the law requires the Environmental Protection Agency to declare carbon dioxide a pollutant and to regulate it. The Bush administration contends it has no authority to do either.

If the Supreme Court accepts the administration's arguments, it will not help California in its legal fight against Detroit, because a key to the state's case is the contention that carbon dioxide is in fact a pollutant under the Clean Air Act.

Hungry Electronics

Imagine all the small electronic devices in a modern home — iPods and handheld organizers, cellphones and laptops — charging at a power strip.

Arthur H. Rosenfeld, a member of the California Energy Commission, knows how much electricity is wasted when people unplug the devices but leave the charger plugged in. Dr. Rosenfeld estimates that such chargers — along with appliances like televisions that draw power even when they are off because they are designed to respond to remote controls — use up to 10 percent of an average home's power.

He calls them "vampires" — things with teeth that suck power at night.

Recently, Dr. Rosenfeld proudly held up a small green cellular phone charger that consumes less than half a watt of electricity — a fifth as much as its predecessors — when left plugged into an outlet. It meets state standards that take effect in 2007. The same standards will require sharp power cutbacks from audio and video equipment, both when the devices are in use and when they are standing by for a remote signal.

Since the 1970's, California's energy-efficiency standards have reduced electricity consumption by the equivalent of the output of more than 20 average power plants, Dr. Rosenfeld said. And the standards have become templates for other states and Washington. Nationally, Dr. Rosenfeld added, energy-efficiency policies have saved the economy $700 billion since the 1970's.

But why would utilities, which sell electricity, have any interest in seeing sales diminish? In 1982, the Public Utilities Commission decoupled utilities' sales and their profits by allowing rate increases for utilities that helped customers cut energy use.

The logic was that for every dollar the consumer did not spend on energy, the utility would get real income — say 15 cents, which would exceed the profit the utility could have made on that dollar. For consumers, efficiency savings more than offset the rate increases. "Even though rates go up, bills go down," said Mr. Harvey of the Hewlett Foundation.

Ralph Cavanagh, the co-director of the energy program at the Natural Resources Defense Counsel, said: "Every other state in the country rewards utilities for selling more energy. It's a perfectly perverse incentive."

Mr. Peevey, of the utilities commission, said he expected new efficiencies to absorb half the increase in demand as the state grows to 40 million people, from 38 million.

DOJ_NMG_0063541

Mr. Peevey's commission has also been a prime mover in increasing state support for residential solar power. Solar energy remains four times as expensive as electricity produced by conventional fuels. But, he said, "the idea is to make the solar industry a self-sustaining, economically viable industry," and to make the cost come down.

California businesses and investors, public and private, are getting into the act. The state's huge pension fund, Calpers, is committing just under $1 billion to renewable-energy investments. Among the early incentive-driven ventures in solar power are the homes in the Carsten Crossings subdivision in Rocklin, a Sacramento suburb. In August, Mr. Schwarzenegger signed legislation making solar panels a standard option for new-home buyers by 2012 and ensuring that utilities reduce homeowners' bills based on the electricity returned to the grid.

Some of those incentives were available when construction started. Now four families have moved in. They see themselves as pragmatists, not crusaders. "This is the next logical step" in construction, said one of the homeowners, Lt. Col. Thomas Sebens, a specialist in drone aircraft at Beale Air Force Base.

Their roofs show how public and private decisions, markets and government, have meshed. T. J. Rodgers, a fiercely anti-regulatory entrepreneur, underwrote the solar cells' production. The PowerLight Corporation, based near San Francisco, bought the cells from Mr. Rodgers's company, the SunPower Corporation, and turned them into roof tiles. The tiles ended up on houses built by Grupe Homes, based in Stockton, because state utility regulators established a $5,500 state-financed rebate for builders who install similar systems, which cost $20,000. Federal law gives home buyers a $2,000 tax credit; state law guarantees lower electric bills as utilities buy back power homeowners do not need.

The July utility bills, the new homeowners' first, were the talk of the neighborhood.

Larry Brittain, an office products salesman with a four-bedroom, 2,400-square-foot home, was the winner at $73.27 for electricity in the month ending July 25 — the hottest July on record. For the last 10 June days in a similar house nearby, his bill was $103.

"This is a bet with a winning hand," Mr. Brittain said. "You can't lose."

Pressure on Suppliers

In Gerlach, Nev., 100 miles north of Reno, a high desert butte was made ready two years ago for its wedding to the Granite Fox Power Project, a plant designed to burn pulverized Western coal. Electrical transmission lines were close by.

But, like Miss Havisham in Dickens's "Great Expectations," Gerlach waits for a groom that may never arrive. The plant was a certain source of significant new carbon dioxide emissions. Mr. Cavanagh predicted that it "would wipe out all the carbon dioxide savings from California's spectacularly successful efforts to save electricity during 2001 and 2002."

Southern Californians would likely be the eventual customers. But last fall, the California Public Utilities Commission barred the investor-owned utilities it regulates from signing long-term contracts for electricity if the emissions exceeded those of the cleanest gas-driven plants. The only technology that could accomplish that with coal is expensive and has not been perfected.

Said Mr. Peevey of the commission, "All we're saying is, Fine, you send it here, but it has to be, in terms of air quality and greenhouse gas emissions, it has to be comparable to the newest combined-cycle gas turbine." One fifth of California's electricity comes from coal, the vast majority of it from outside the state.

This past winter, Sempra Energy, the parent of San Diego Gas & Electric and Sempra Generation and the developer of Granite Fox, put the project up for sale. Neal E. Schmale, Sempra's president, said the ruling had had a negligible impact on the decision. High natural gas prices prompted the company to invest in gas storage and terminals instead, Mr. Schmale said.

Among California environmentalists, however, the "for sale" sign on Granite Fox was taken as a victory for a pioneering policy that reaches beyond the state's borders. V. John White, an environmental lobbyist in Sacramento, compares building a Southwestern power plant to building a mall: California is a desirable anchor tenant.

But California is also the state where electricity deregulation foundered in 2000; bills soared and an economic crisis ensued. Even without a crisis, Californians' electricity rates are about 40 percent above the national average.

Robert McIlvaine, a coal industry consultant from Northfield, Ill., said, "If you are going to generate electricity from gas, the cost of doing so is going to be considerably greater than coal — 50 percent more or 100 percent more."

But, Mr. Harvey said: "People don't pay rates. They pay bills. You can have twice the rate and half the consumption and be just as happy."

On Aug. 31, legislators enacted the bill sponsored by the State Senate president, Don Perata, Democrat of Oakland, and extended the commission's rule to all power providers.

Business people ask if this could provoke another crisis. Power-plant siting experts, like Thomas A. Johns, the vice president of development at Sithe Global Power, a New York company, say that, in the short term, the loss of California business may not matter much to the merchants of power in the Southwest. Fast-growing cities like Phoenix and Las Vegas are ready markets.

DOJ_NMG_0063542

In the long run, however, "California is a big piece" of the total consumption in the West — 40 percent, Mr. Johns said. "If 40 percent of the Western load will not buy coal, you will have less coal."

The risk, both Mr. Johns and Mr. Schmale said, is in increasing the state's reliance on natural gas, whose price has been extremely volatile in recent years. (California law bars construction of nuclear plants until the questions of waste disposal are resolved.)

"When you exclude coal and nuclear from your base load," Mr. Johns said, "you've only got one option, and that's natural gas." Another measure awaiting the governor's signature toughens standards by requiring that by 2010, 20 percent of the energy sold in California comes from a portfolio of renewable sources, like geothermal and wind. Last year, 10.7 percent of California's power came from renewable sources.

New renewable energy sources could make prices less volatile, but Mr. Schmale of Sempra said California's policy makers need to muster "the political will" to build transmission lines and "all those other things that would be necessary to make the environmental things work."

Caps, Costs and Credits

Perhaps the most ambitious measure California has undertaken is the newly mandated 25 percent reduction in carbon dioxide emissions. "If we do it right," Mr. Schwarzenegger said at a news conference, "it can be an example for the rest of the world and the rest of the country to see." If not, the concept could be discredited.

The law, sponsored by Ms. Pavley and the Assembly speaker, Fabian Núñez, Democrat of Los Angeles, gives the California Air Resources Board authority to set industry-specific targets for emissions reductions, effective in 2012, and to establish mechanisms — including the creation of emissions allowances that companies might trade or bank — to facilitate compliance. These targets would be adjusted from 2012 to 2020 to meet the 25 percent goal.

Those who have studied the question agree that the new system will cost consumers more. "A cap-and-trade system will raise the cost of electricity to consumers to some degree," said Lawrence H. Goulder, a professor of environmental and resource economics at Stanford University.

As the European Union found after the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, figuring out how to assign emissions credits is not easy.

Whatever the decisions, chances are that they will be met by a lawsuit. Margo Thorning, the chief economist at the American Council for Capital Formation, a group supporting business interests, argues in a study that "sharp cutbacks in California's energy use would be necessary to close the 41 percent gap in 2020 between projected emissions" and the cuts the law requires. Dr. Thorning added in an interview, "The technologies that will enable us to move quickly in a cost-effective way away from fossil fuel just aren't there yet."

Allan Zaremberg, president of the state Chamber of Commerce, predicted that businesses would flee to unregulated areas and continue to emit climate-changing gases.

Dr. Thorning's study was countered in mid-August with a study by David Roland-Holst, an adjunct professor of agricultural and resource economics at the University of California, Berkeley. Professor Roland-Holst argued that the new law would add $60 billion and 17,000 jobs — in fields like alternative energy — to the California economy by 2020 by attracting new investment.

James D. Marston, the head of state global warming programs for Environmental Defense, the New York group that helped lead the fight for California's new carbon cap, said, "We'll look back in 10 years and say this was the final breakthrough and the final political consensus that we have to do something meaningful on global warming."

US To Cut Funds For Two Renewable Energy Sources (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2006

Out at the Wanapum Dam on the Columbia River, a new turbine is being tested that generates more electricity, but won't kill so many fish - thanks to research dollars from Uncle Sam.

Down in California's Long Valley, on the Sierra Nevada range, federal researchers are working to boost efficiency of geothermal energy, which uses the earth's natural heat to generate power.

But renewable energy advocates may have to kiss goodbye those and other research projects. The US Department of Energy (DOE) is quitting the hydropower and geothermal power research business - if Congress will let it.

Declaring them "mature technologies" that need no further funding, the Bush administration in its FY 2007 budget request eliminates hydropower and geothermal research, venerable programs with roots in the energy crises of the 1970s.

"What we do well is research and funding of new, novel technologies," says Craig Stevens, chief spokesman for the DOE. "From a policy perspective, geothermal and hydro are mature technologies. We believe the market can take the lead on this at this point."

DOJ_NMG_0063543

Still, "zeroing out" such research could end up being a penny-wise, pound-foolish move, some energy advocates say. Any savings from the cuts would be nil since all of the nearly $24 million ($1 million from hydropower and $23 million from geothermal) research funding would go to other programs such as biofuels.

"I'm just astonished the department would zero out these very small existing budgets for geothermal and hydro - it makes no sense at all," says V. John White, executive director of the Center for Energy Efficiency and Renewable Technologies, an environmental group based in Sacramento, Calif. "These are very important resources for our energy future that could replace the need for a lot of coal-fired power plants."

Indeed, the costs of lost opportunities from dropping such research could be enormous in the long run, recent federal studies suggest.

Geothermal is a case in point. Its power plants need water, heat, and permeable rocks no deeper than about three miles beneath the surface to generate affordable electricity, says Karl Gawell, executive director of the Geothermal Energy Association, a Washington trade group.

Today more than 60 geothermal plants with the capacity of about three big coal-fired power plants produce less than 1 percent of the nation's electricity.

Yet geothermal holds vast potential - at least 30,000 megawatts of identified resources developable by 2050 and more unidentified resources, much of it in Western states, the National Renewable Energy Laboratory reported in May.

Research aims at new technologies that can use underground zones with good heat but little water and those with lower temperature rocks deeper in the earth.

"The idea that geothermal is a mature technology that doesn't need further research doesn't even pass the laugh test," says Mr. Gawell. "What they're saying is that if your program doesn't have to do with biofuels, wind, or solar, you won't have a program."

Meanwhile, the more than 5,400 potential "small hydro" power projects could produce about 20,000 megawatts of power, a DOE study in January found. And most would require no new dams at all, shunting a portion of a small river's flow to one side to make electricity. Others would add turbines to dams that don't have them yet.

Together, high-tech hydropower and geothermal resources could contribute at least enough power to replace more than 100 medium-size coal-fired power plants with emissions-free electricity - about the number now on the drawing board.

There have been moves in the Senate to restore DOE funding for geothermal, but far less support in the House, leaving uncertainty about the outcome, Gawell says. For hydropower, matters are worse. Though $4 million in funding has been proposed in the Senate, nothing has emerged from the House, observers say.

"There's this view that hydropower is a technology that's been around a long time, and there's not much more we can do to improve it - but we've got the next generation of hydropower - ocean, tidal, wave and conduit energy coming on," says Linda Church Ciocci, executive director of the National Hydropower Association, a Washington trade group.

Even those focused on environmental damage from dams worry about lost funding. "We'd like to see federal funding continue for new research on hydrokinetic systems and damless hydro," says Robbin Marks, director of the hydropower reform campaign at American Rivers, a Washington environmental group. "We're interested in understanding more about the environmental impact of those systems."

Power from tidal flows, waves, and irrigation canals are expanding the definition of hydropower - none of which are likely to get DOE research funding if the hydropower budget gets whacked, some observers say.

Others remain skeptical. "I find myself agreeing with the DOE argument that hydropower is a mature technology," says Jerry Taylor, the Cato Institute's director of Natural Resource Studies. "If there's economic merit to this area, then venture capitalists will put their money into it."

But that kind of waiting game would be a shame, says Trey Taylor, cofounder and president of Verdant Power in Arlington, Va. Two weeks ago his company received venture capital funding for its program. Next month, Verdant will deploy its first two underwater turbines in New York City's East River, the first step in an experimental technology that attempts to harness the tidal currents to create power.

But more firms would be competing to get into tidal power today - if the government shouldered more of the environmental research costs, Mr. Taylor says.

The current high cost of researching areas such as a technology's environmental impact makes it likely that a company will fail. He and his partners remortgaged their homes and begged friends for funds.

"I can understand the tight situation DOE is in," he says. "But what they're not seeing is that a whole new breed of technology has come on right now. The push for sustainable power is sweeping the globe."

Interior Near 2 New Pacts In Oil Leases (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The Interior Department, struggling to prevent the government from losing billions of dollars in royalties for oil and gas produced in publicly owned waters, said Thursday that it was close to agreement with 2 of the 56 companies that hold lucrative drilling leases in the Gulf of Mexico.

The two companies, Royal Dutch Shell and BP-Amoco, are among the biggest producers along the outer continental shelf.

But even as Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed outrage that the government could lose more than $10 billion over the next decade, the Bush administration said it flatly opposed House bills that would pressure oil companies into renegotiating flawed leases that the government signed in the late 1990's.

The 56 companies hold leases that allow them to extract billions of dollars in oil and gas from the Gulf of Mexico without paying any royalties, regardless of how high energy prices or the industry's profits might climb.

Of those 56 companies, Interior officials told lawmakers on Thursday, 20 have responded in some way to pleas from the administration to voluntarily give up the incentives in times of high prices. But only 10 companies, including Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have actually begun negotiating and only 2 are near a pact.

At a rancorous House hearing, administration officials insisted they had to respect the "sanctity of contracts'' and should not do anything to force companies into a renegotiation.

"The administration believes that the federal government must be a reliable business partner and must honor its contractual obligations, even when, in retrospect, the terms of those contracts appear unfavorable,'' said Lynn Scarlett, deputy secretary of the Interior, at a hearing of the House Committee on Government Reform.

Ms. Scarlett opposed a bill that the House passed last May. That legislation would give the Interior Department more bargaining power by prohibiting the government from giving additional leases to companies that refuse to trim back benefits.

She also opposed an alternative bill, sponsored by House Republicans, that would impose a stiff "conservation fee'' on companies that refuse to give up some of the incentives.

That prompted a furious attack from Democratic lawmakers, who argued that the House bill would do nothing to breach valid contracts and simply gave the government more bargaining power with the oil companies.

"From the taxpayers' point of view, I think it is irresponsible to refuse to support additional leverage that would encourage these companies to come to table,'' said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts and a co-author of the House bill.

"What you're telling us is that, right now, you've got only 20 percent of the oil companies renegotiating their leases,'' Mr. Markey continued. "One out of five isn't bad in some areas, but when you're talking about potentially billions of dollars in taxpayer dollars, one in five isn't very high."

In what has now become a major scandal, the Interior Department inadvertently signed 1,100 drilling leases in the late 1990's that offered lucrative incentives to deepwater drillers, regardless of how high energy prices might climb.

Officials then covered up the mistake for nearly six years. In that time, the prices for oil and gas soared and the magnitude of the potential loss to taxpayers escalated to more than $10 billion.

But Interior officials are under fire for more than just the botched leases and the cover-up that followed. On Wednesday, the Interior Department's independent investigator for examining possible misconduct scathingly accused senior officials of repeatedly tolerating cronyism, ethical violations and cover-ups of incompetence.

"Simply stated, short of crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, charged at a subcommittee hearing of the House Government Reform Committee.

Mr. Devaney said the problems had preceded the Bush administration, but he bluntly criticized Mr. Bush's first Secretary of the Interior, Gale A. Norton, of perpetuating a culture of "denial, defense of the indefensible and delay."

On Thursday, Ms. Scarlett told lawmakers that "the department disagrees" with Mr. Devaney's critique and said he had made "broad and serious, yet vague allegations."

Ms. Scarlett said that the Bush administration had corrected scores of "material weaknesses" that it had inherited from the Clinton era; that its ethics office had "grown in stature" and that Dirk Kempthorne, who took over as Secretary of the Interior in May, had imposed a new emphasis on ethics as soon as he arrived.

But few lawmakers seemed convinced. Representative Darrell Issa, a California Republican who has held four hearings on the leasing disaster, complained that Interior Department had done little or nothing to improve the solicitor's office, which gave final approval to the leases but provided almost no documentation to explain why crucial restrictions were missing.

"There are no e-mails, nothing in writing, no paper trail," Mr. Issa said.

Democrats were far harsher. "This looks like an agency that has been captured by the industry it is supposed to oversee, with American taxpayers picking up the bill," said Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California.

Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York, noted that the Interior Department was recovering less than $50 million a year on average as a result of auditing and enforcement of oil and gas leases. By contrast, she said, the government recovered about $176 million a year from 1989 through 1998.

"We're missing billions and billions of dollars owed to American taxpayers," Ms. Maloney said. "It is inexcusable."

As Border Crackdown Intensifies, A Tribe Is Caught In The Crossfire (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

ALIR JEGK, Ariz. -- Elsie Salsido was breast-feeding her baby when Border Patrol agents walked into her house unannounced this summer. "Are you Mexicans?" they demanded.

Salsido's four other children cowered on the bed of her eldest, a girl in second grade. Night had fallen on this village on Arizona's border with Mexico, nestled in a scrubland valley of stickman cactuses hemmed in by mountains that look like busted teeth. The agents explained their warrantless entry into Salsido's house as "hot pursuit." They said they were chasing footprints, she recalled, of illegal immigrants sneaking in from Mexico, just 1,000 feet away. But the footprints belonged to Salsido's children -- all Americans.

As the United States ramps up its law enforcement presence on the border with Mexico, places like Alir Jegk, a village of 50 families in south-central Arizona, are enduring heightened danger, as they are squeezed between increasingly aggressive bands of immigrant and drug smugglers and increasingly numerous federal agents who, critics say, often ignore regulations as they seek to enforce the law.

Alir Jegk's experience is complicated by the fact that it is on the second-biggest Indian reservation in the United States, belonging to the Tohono O'odham, or Desert People, who hunted deer and boar and harvested wild spinach and prickly pear in this region before an international border was etched through their land in 1853. Now, the Tohono O'odham Nation occupies the front line of the fight against drug and immigrant smuggling -- costing the poverty-stricken tribe millions of dollars a year and threatening what remains of its traditions.

"We have the undocumented and drug smugglers heading north and law enforcement heading south. We're smack in the middle," Vivian Juan-Saunders, chairwoman of the tribe, said in an interview at the tribal headquarters in Sells, Ariz. "We are being squeezed."

In testimony to the U.S. Senate, the tribe's vice chairman, Ned Norris Jr., described a "border security crisis that has caused shocking devastation of our land and resources."

About 11,000 Tohono O'odham live on a 2.8 million-acre reservation, the size of Connecticut, with a 75-mile-long border with Mexico. A rickety four-foot-tall, three-strand barbed-wire fence delineates the border, which is punctuated by 160 trails and four cattle crossings. For decades the nation saw little or no illegal traffic from Mexico. The main movement was members of the Tohono O'odham who live in the Mexican part of the reservation trickling into the United States for health services in Sells.

In the mid-1990s, however, the Clinton administration cracked down on illegal crossings in San Diego and El Paso. Instead of stopping illegal immigration and drug running, however, the operations simply rerouted traffic through the deserts of the Southwest. And in Arizona, Tohono O'odham land, bisected by State Highway 86 -- an easy link to Phoenix to the north and California to the west -- became ground zero.

The flow of drugs and undocumented immigrants through the reservation has caused a host of problems. Juan-Saunders estimated that about 1,500 illegal immigrants cross reservation land each day, depositing on average six tons of trash. Some well-traveled knolls have been renamed "Million Backpack Hill" because of the refuse.

The tribe routinely devotes more than 10 percent of its budget to coping with the crisis. Annually, Juan-Saunders said, the 71-member Tohono O'odham Police Department spends $3 million on problems related to illegal immigrants and drug traffickers. The reservation pays an additional $2 million each year to provide emergency health services for undocumented travelers. Since 2002, 315 crossers have died on the reservation's land, including, this year, a 3-year-old boy and an 11-year-old girl.

The Tohono O'odham are a poor nation, with an average per capita income of $8,000 a year, well below the U.S. average of $23,000 and the Indian average of $13,000. Forty percent of the families on the reservation live below the federal poverty line, and unemployment is at 42 percent. Juan-Saunders said an increasing number of nation members are sucked into the drug- and immigrant-smuggling business.

Two of Juan-Saunders's relatives have been arrested on drug-related charges, tribal officials said. And in Alir Jegk, drug smugglers have plied Elsie Salsido's sister with so many narcotics over the years in their attempts to turn her into a mule that the woman has never been the same, residents say.

"The pressures have dramatically increased on the tribe over the last five years," said Robert A. Williams, a law professor at the University of Arizona who works as a judge in the tribe's courts. "The community is fairly well isolated, so they are very vulnerable to coyotes [immigrant smugglers] and drug runners. We've seen signs of gang activity coming from L.A. and Mexican gangs coming up."

DOJ_NMG_0063546

Fifteen years ago, the nation, invoking its limited sovereignty, barred the Border Patrol from the reservation because its agents harassed the population, said Eileen M. Luna-Firebaugh, an expert on American Indian policy at the University of Arizona. But that policy changed after drug and immigrant smuggling skyrocketed, although the tribe was always more focused on narcotics, she said.

The tribe is home to the Shadow Wolves, a storied, largely Indian unit of U.S. Customs and Border Protection that uses ancient tracking techniques to chase down drug smugglers. But after the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, the Border Patrol has run the Shadow Wolves and has shifted their focus away from drugs and toward immigrant smuggling, prompting several senior officers to quit.

Nonetheless, under Juan-Saunders's leadership, which began in 2003, the tribal council has welcomed more federal law enforcement. It has allowed the Border Patrol to establish two permanent facilities on its land. It recently agreed to the construction of a 75-mile vehicle barrier, costing more than $1 million a mile, to replace the wobbly fence.

The tribe has complied with Border Patrol wishes to close one traditional gate connecting the American side of its land to the Mexican side. It has also recently consented to allow the National Guard to operate on the border, on the condition that the Guard repairs roads and "respects the people and the laws of this land," Juan-Saunders said.

Winning that respect, however, has not been easy. Tribal members are routinely harassed by federal agents, Juan-Saunders said. "They cross property without asking. They enter homes without knocking," she said.

In March, Juan-Saunders was driving her 8-year-old son in her Jeep, going 45 mph in a 55 zone, when she was ordered to pull over by a Border Patrol officer. She stopped by the side of the road, and the officer leapt out of his vehicle and pointed his gun at her. "Now I know what my constituents are experiencing," she said.

Juan-Saunders acknowledged having mixed feelings about ceding more of her nation's sovereignty to federal agencies. "But we are in dire straits here," she said.

Chuy Rodriguez, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in Tucson, said relations between the Border Patrol and the tribe are "getting better and better over time."

"There's a lot more dialogue with folks in positions of power," he said. He said that Border Patrol community relations officers make regular visits to the reservation and that his agency has established a process for complaints. Tribal representatives instruct Border Patrol agents about the tribe and its traditions.

"We can't go into anyone's property," he said. "We have to get someone from the Tohono O'odham police to come. However, if it's hot pursuit, it's a different story."

Back in Alir Jegk, Margaret Garcia, 68, and an older neighbor, Francisco Garcia, sum up the pressures facing the tribe.

Margaret Garcia, who lives in a two-room shack with, at last count, 19 cats and six dogs, said she awoke late one night to discover that Border Patrol agents, with shotguns and night-vision goggles, had established an observation post in her yard.

Francisco Garcia, on the other hand, used to live in Mexico. He was kicked out of his village by drug dealers, so he moved to the American side of the line. "I didn't want to die," he said.

"A long time ago there was no one but us," Margaret said. "It was peaceful. When the cactus was ripe, my daughters would go out with a stick to harvest the fruit. Now if we go out, the Border Patrol follows us. Everyone is a suspect."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Bring Charges Against Four (AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

BINGHAMTON, N.Y. (AP) — A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted one man on a murder charge and three others for racketeering and narcotics conspiracy.

The men were part of a drug-trafficking ring that operated in the Ithaca area, New York City, Pennsylvania and North Carolina, said U.S. Attorney Glenn Suddaby.

Guillermo Payano, 30, of Ithaca, was charged with the murder of Alexander Miller, 24.

Miller was discovered in May 2000 on a partially overgrown service road leading into Buttermilk Falls State Park. He had been shot in the head.

Benoni Bryant, 29, Darnell Shepherd, 29, and Pablo Lopez, 25, all of Ithaca, were charged with conspiracy and racketeering.

Payano, Bryant and Shepherd are in custody. Lopez is still at large.

DOJ_NMG_0063547

If convicted of the charges in the indictment, each defendant faces a possible sentence of life imprisonment and a $4 million fine.

The U.S. Justice Department has not yet determined whether it will seek the death penalty for Payano, Suddaby said.

5 Of 12 Suspects In Massive Drug Ring Appear In Court (AP)

By WILLIAM McCALL

AP, September 15, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — Five of the dozen suspects in what federal prosecutors say is a $20 million international drug ring started by high school friends made their initial appearance in court Thursday in the first step toward an expected trial in Idaho.

U.S. Magistrate Janice Stewart delayed reading of the charges in the 196-page indictment until attorneys could be appointed or retained for the five men.

They were among the 11 men arrested Wednesday by federal agents in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Colorado. One man, from California, remained a fugitive.

The five who appeared Thursday in federal court were: Mark Daniel Kitzman, 49, Lake Oswego; Damon John Marsh, 37, Portland; Mark M. Alders, 54, Lakeside; and Mark William Pursley, 32, and Kent Allen Jones, 51, Vancouver, Wash.

All wore blue prison clothing as they appeared separately to request lawyers through Ruben Iniguez, an attorney for the Federal Public Defender's office in Portland. Marsh was represented at the appearance by Mark Cross, an attorney who said he had known Marsh for years.

Stewart told each man they would face trial in U.S. District Court in Idaho and warned them they would have to reimburse the government if it was determined they could afford their own attorneys, rather than having a defender appointed by the court.

Prosecutors say the drug operation involved smuggling cocaine, marijuana and chemicals to make methamphetamine from Mexico and South America. They estimated that hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of tons of drugs were brought into the country over 30 years.

The indictment was issued by a federal grand jury in Boise last June and sealed until the arrests began on Wednesday.

The case began with the arrest of a suspected drug dealer, Lee Lang, and led to the indictment during what U.S. Attorney Tom Moss in Boise called "a classic case of 'follow the money.' "

The indictment seeks $24 million in cash and real estate forfeitures, including property in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Colorado, Hawaii and California.

23 Charged In Drug Raid (CHIT)

By Tony C. Yang

Chicago Tribune, September 15, 2006

Police today announced charges against 23 people after raiding a suspected drug house on Chicago's South Side Wednesday morning.

During the raid, a police SWAT team used a power saw to cut through wrought iron and chain link fences barricading the home in the 5100 block of Honore Street in Chicago's Englewood neighborhood. The suspects threw bags of crack cocaine out the windows as officers closed in, police said today at a news conference.

Investigators said they targeted the house because it is located within 1,000 feet of several churches and schools.

Authorities said the suspects are all members of the Gangster Disciples street gang and they pedaled small packages of crack cocaine worth $5 each, earning $10,000 to $15,000 a day in drug sales. Also known as "nicks," the knotted plastic bags were often hidden inside and distributed from drug dealers' mouths, police said in a news release.

Several houses in the neighborhood were used as stash houses, where larger amounts of drugs were stored, according to the release.

Investigators said the gang had a counter-surveillance system to keep police at bay. Members with binoculars were posted to watch for police, and they would block the street by playing a card game so that only their customers could get by, police said.

Undercover officers from the Chicago Police Department and members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration worked on their investigation, dubbed "Operation Sith," for 2 ½ months before raiding the home, police said. During that time, investigators made 38 undercover purchases and five covert seizures of both narcotics and cash, according to the release.

Seven individuals have been arrested on federal drug conspiracy charges, and arrest warrants were issued for three others who also face federal charges.

In addition, nine suspects are charged with delivery of a controlled substance and four are charged with possession of a controlled substance, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0063548

The DEA is currently analyzing the drugs confiscated during the raid, and has not yet estimated their total worth, police said.

Edgerton Case Gets Attention Of Feds (QCT)

By Deirdre Cox Baker

Quad-City (IA) Times, September 15, 2006

Federal officials decided late Wednesday to take up the case against David Robert McMenemy, the Michigan man who is accused of crashing his car into a Davenport medical center Monday because he thought it was an abortion clinic.

The case will be pursued through the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of Iowa, Davenport, and the Rock Island office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, or ATF.

Police say McMenemy, 45, came to Davenport from the suburbs of Detroit, and drove his compact car into the Edgerton Women's Health Center, 1510 E. Rusholme St., early Monday morning.

The facility was founded in 1972 to provide prenatal care and medical services to low-income and underprivileged women. It does not perform abortions, nor does it make abortion referrals, Center President Tom Fedje said.

After the car came to rest in the lobby area, Davenport police said McMenemy exited the vehicle and scattered gasoline over the car's interior before lighting it. He left the building and surrendered to Davenport firefighters, Fire Marshal Mike Hayman said.

Federal charges are appropriate in the case because McMenemy traveled across three states to commit the act of violence, Scott County Attorney Bill Davis said.

Local authorities have leveled a charge of second-degree arson against McMenemy. It's a Class C felony punishable by a maximum prison term of 10 years and a fine not exceeding $10,000. He is scheduled to be arraigned on that charge Oct. 5 in Scott County District Court, Davenport.

Deirdre Cox Baker can be contacted at (563) 383-2492 or dbaker@qctimes.com

'Dog The Bounty Hunter' Arrested (AP)

By Mark Niesse

AP, September 15, 2006

HONOLULU - TV reality star Duane "Dog" Chapman and two co-stars on his show were arrested Thursday in Hawaii on charges of illegal detention and conspiracy in the bounty hunters' capture three years ago of a cosmetics company heir.

Chapman, son Leland Chapman and associate Timothy Chapman -- who is not related to the other Chapmans -- were taken into custody and did not resist arrest, said Mark Hanohano, U.S. Marshal for the district of Hawaii. "It went down without incident," Hanohano said.

Mona K. Wood, a publicist for the star of the popular cable series Dog The Bounty Hunter, said Chapman would be vindicated. "He arrests the bad guys -- and he is definitely not one of them," she said.

The charges stem from Chapman's capture of Max Factor heir Andrew Luster on June 18, 2003, in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, said Marshals spokeswoman Nikki Credic in Washington.

Chapman's capture of Luster, who had fled the country while on trial on charges he raped three women, catapulted the 53-year-old bounty hunter to fame and led to the reality series on A&E.

Chapman, shackled at his ankles and wearing a blue muscle T-shirt at his first court appearance Thursday, said the government was jealous of his success in hunting down criminals.

"You see what the American government is doing to us? They throw us in jail," Chapman said in a federal courtroom. ``I'm so upset about this."

The three are being held in Honolulu. Bail has not been set. They will face an extradition hearing to Mexico under terms of treaties between the U.S. and Mexico, Credic said.

Chapman's son Leland, 29, and Timothy Chapman, 41, assist Chapman in exploits chronicled for the TV show around the Hawaiian Islands. The show focuses on Chapman's family as much as the bounty hunting, which generally involves tracking down bail jumpers, often creating emotional scenes with repentant captives.

Charges have been pending against the three since local police in Mexico arrested them shortly after they roped in Luster. They posted bail but never returned to Puerto Vallarta for their court hearing on July 15, 2003, Credic said.

Mexican authorities demanded that the Chapmans transfer Luster to Mexican police. Their refusal to do so led to their initial arrest.

A U.S. warrant for their arrest was signed by a federal judge in Honolulu on Wednesday.

Chapman's wife, Beth, said he didn't do anything wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0063549

"If Duane has to return to Mexico to take care of any misunderstanding, then that's what he will do," she said outside the courthouse.

Bounty Hunter Arrested In '03 Case (NYT)

By David Carr

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Duane Chapman, a bounty hunter and the star of a reality television series, was arrested by federal marshals yesterday morning on charges stemming from a capture three years ago in Mexico.

Mr. Chapman captured Andrew Luster, the Max Factor heir who was convicted of raping three women.

Mr. Chapman, 53, was arrested at his house in Hawaii along with his son Leland Chapman, 29, and Timothy Chapman, 41, no relation.

The charges have been pending since they were arrested in Mexico after the capture.

In a twist that will not be lost on fans of Mr. Chapman's program, "Dog the Bounty Hunter," on the A&E cable network, Mexico is seeking to extradite him for posting bail and then failing to appear to answer criminal charges in July 2003.

He was held at the federal detention center in Honolulu.

His wife, Beth Chapman, also a star in the series, said Mr. Chapman left Mexico on the advice of his lawyers, who feared for his safety in the Mexican prison system.

Mexico is requesting extradition under treaties with the United States that allow one country to remand prisoners to the other.

Bounty hunting is illegal in Mexico, and the authorities there had demanded that Mr. Chapman transfer Mr. Luster to the local authorities, which he refused to do.

IMMIGRATION:

Nervous Employers Re-Examine Practices In Wake Of Immigration Raids (LAW)

By Rebecca Riddick, Daily Business Review

Miami Daily Business Review, September 15, 2006

Federal immigration officials recently arrested 55 undocumented workers in a raid in Tallahassee. The workers from Mexico, Honduras and Guatemala, were employed by General Building Maintenance, which had a contract to clean state government buildings. They face deportation.

Federal officials declined to say how U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) found out about the illegal immigrants, or whether any company executives would face criminal charges.

Some South Florida labor and employment lawyers warn that such federal raids signal that companies here must take serious steps to ensure that they are not employing undocumented workers -- either directly or through subcontractors. That could have a major impact on Florida's economy, which quietly has depended on illegal workers.

Many employers in the state's large agricultural, tourism and construction industries are nervous. And so are immigrant workers.

Congress has hit an impasse in its debate over whether and how to crack down on illegal immigration. But ICE and its parent agency, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, have decided not to wait for new legislation. Relying on existing law, ICE has engaged in high-profile raids of worksites employing undocumented workers.

ICE also has proposed a plan to take action against employers based on their failure to respond to letters notifying them that their employees' Social Security numbers don't match information in government data bases.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has asked Congress for greater leeway in accessing and using evidence against employers. Under current law, ICE does not have access to information possessed by the Social Security Administration. Chertoff wants to allow data sharing so immigration agents can use nonmatching Social Security information as a lead to find illegals -- not just as evidence once illegals are found.

Unlike in the past, ICE isn't just seeking to assess civil monetary fines against companies found to have employed illegal aliens. It's also seeking criminal sanctions against executives for failing to follow a 1986 federal law making it illegal to hire undocumented workers.

These moves have caused many South Florida employers to change business practices, experts say. Employment lawyers say they're working closely with employers to set up more rigorous vetting of employees to ensure that there are no illegals on the payroll.

DOJ_NMG_0063550

Attorney Sarah Tobocman, the Miami-based immigration practice chair for Gunster Yoakley & Stewart, said that in the past, the worst penalty an employer could expect for hiring an illegal immigrant was a civil monetary fine. Many companies built such fines into the cost of doing business. But the prospect of criminal charges against executives will cause companies to take serious precautions, she said.

Some Florida employer groups, particularly agricultural growers and builders, are looking to expand their reliance on immigrant workers brought into the United States on guest worker visas. They would like Congress to increase the number of such visas and ease the federal requirements on wages and benefits.

With the tougher enforcement by ICE, employers increasingly find themselves facing a Catch-22 situation. That's because while ICE is enforcing immigration laws, the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is enforcing anti-discrimination laws. Employers cannot discriminate in hiring based on the possibility that an applicant is an illegal alien.

Legal experts say the situation is dicey. In Florida, tourism, agriculture and construction -- three of the biggest industries -- all use lots of immigrant labor. Some employers in these industries long have employed workers without looking too carefully at their legal status. It's estimated that hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants are working in this state, including for large companies.

TEPID PUBLIC SUPPORT

On the other hand, there's tepid public support in this state, particularly in South Florida, for a federal crackdown. Even many Florida Republican leaders favor a moderate approach, including a path toward legal residency for illegal immigrants currently living in the United States.

A recent Zogby International poll for the Miami Herald found that 65 percent of South Florida Republicans surveyed favor establishing a path to legalization for immigrants currently living illegally in the United States. The survey found that 77 percent of South Florida Democrats supported that approach.

Despite Floridians' relatively lenient views on immigration, some lawyers warn that South Florida employers soon may have to give up using undocumented workers.

Keil Hackley, the former deputy chief counsel of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and now a Weston-based immigration attorney with Hackley Serrone, said it's just a matter of time before Florida employers are targeted for stricter enforcement. ICE and DHS "are putting their warnings out there," Hackley said. "They are absolutely going after employers who are profiting from illegal aliens."

Others, however, dispute that the Bush administration's current efforts are sincere or will last for long. Gregory Schell, a Lake Worth employment attorney with the farmworker rights group Florida Legal Services, argued that the recent raids and enforcement actions are driven by the White House's election-year efforts to appease conservative, anti-immigration Republican voters. He said all will be forgotten after Nov. 8 -- election day.

Indeed, federal officials so far have gone easy in South Florida, considering the large population of illegal immigrants here. The state's citrus groves and tomato fields would be a rich harvest for ICE agents if the agency chose to conduct raids there.

Schell estimated that more than 95 percent of workers on citrus groves in Florida are undocumented. Ray Gilmer, of the Florida Fruit and Vegetable Association, a growers' trade group, said the industry did not have any estimates on the number of illegal workers employed by the industry.

So far there have been no reported raids on the growers. "It would be an easy target," said Anis Nouhad Saleh of Saleh & Associates in Miami, who serves as president of the South Florida chapter of the American Immigration Lawyers Association.

Barbara Gonzalez, a Miami-based ICE spokeswoman, said she could not discuss how companies are chosen for raids because that's "law enforcement-sensitive information."

LEGISLATION STALLED

Based on the most recent U.S. Census numbers, the Washington, D.C.-based Pew Hispanic Center estimates that there are more than 11 million illegal immigrants living in the United States. With between 800,000 and 950,000 illegal immigrants estimated to live in Florida, the state ranks third behind California and Texas in the number of illegals.

These immigrants fill jobs in citrus groves and tomato fields, on construction and roofing sites, in the hospitality and restaurant industries, and in janitorial and landscaping services.

Since Congress passed the Immigration Reform and Control Act in 1986, it has been illegal for employers to hire undocumented workers. The act prescribes civil and criminal penalties for employers convicted of knowingly hiring unauthorized workers. Those with a pattern and practice of violating the law are subject to criminal sanctions.

The 1986 law made the I-9 form a key enforcement document. Employers must fill out the I-9 and verify an employee's employment status within three days of the person starting work.

DOJ_NMG_0063551

For most of the past 20 years, however, these rules have not been rigorously enforced. The Immigration and Naturalization Service -- the predecessor of ICE -- sometimes would slap civil fines on noncompliant employers. But for the most part, the rules were dead letters.

"Years ago, things could slide," Saleh said.

Then, over the past year, President Bush and conservative Republican leaders spearheaded a national debate over how to address illegal immigration.

Last December, the Republican-controlled House of Representatives passed a hard-line immigration bill that would make it a felony to be in the country illegally, substantially increase border patrols, order the construction of a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, and boost civil and criminal penalties against employers for violations.

The House bill would require employers to shoulder more of the enforcement burden. The bill would set up a telephone- or electronic media-based employment verification system. That system would allow employers to verify the immigration status of new hires within three days.

In contrast, in May, the GOP-controlled Senate passed its own immigration bill. That bill, which has President Bush's support, would set up an amnesty program for undocumented immigrants already living in the United States and establish a path to legal residency. Like the House bill, the Senate measure also would require employers to take greater steps to ensure their workers are legal.

Even though there's broad agreement that something needs to be done about illegal immigration, the House and Senate have been unable to reach a compromise.

NO-MATCH LETTERS

In the absence of legislation, the Department of Homeland Security and ICE have charged ahead with their own enforcement policies.

Over the past six months, ICE has conducted raids on industrial pallet producer IFCO Systems North America and Midwest Airport Services, among others.

The raid on IFCO followed a yearlong probe that found more than half of the company's employees in 2005 had Social Security numbers that did not match identifying information in the Social Security Administration data base. The raid apprehended 1,187 illegal alien employees at 40 worksites around the country.

Seven current and former IFCO managers have been charged in Albany, N.Y., with harboring illegal aliens for financial gain. In addition, two managers at Midwest Airport have been sentenced to nine and 15 months in federal prison and fined a total of $750,000.

Under current agency rules, ICE cannot use no-match letters from the Social Security Administration to go after employers for hiring undocumented workers.

A no-match letter informs an employer that an employee's recorded Social Security number, which the employee submitted on an I-9 form, does not match the name listed for that number in the Social Security Administration database.

But in June, ICE proposed a new rule that would put employers on constructive notice from the time they received a no-match letter.

Homeland Security estimates that as many as 10 percent of the 250 million W-2s the Social Security Administration receives each year belong to workers whose names do not match their Social Security numbers.

Experts caution that there are many causes for no-matches, including typographical errors and name changes. But no-matches also result from illegal immigrants falsely using other people's Social Security numbers or providing bogus federal work permits to employers.

The proposed rules would allow ICE officials to use no-match letters as proof that employers "knowingly" employed illegal immigrants. It would require the employer to take certain actions within a set period of time.

The proposal also would close the subcontractor loophole. Currently, employers can hide behind subcontractors who hire undocumented workers for their projects. Employers could claim that they did not know that their subcontractors were employing illegal labor. Without proof of actual knowledge on the part of the employer, the government couldn't charge the employer with a crime.

Under the proposed rule, once an employer receives a no-match letter for employees -- even if they are hired through a subcontractor -- ICE would consider the employer on notice that it employed an illegal immigrant.

Lani Kahn Drody, president of the Builders Association of South Florida and Lowell Homes, said her organization considers it unreasonable to expect employers to check the legal status of all their subcontractors' employees.

Ray Gilmer, of the Florida Fruit & Vegetable Association, said it's not unusual for Florida growers to receive no-match letters. Farmers cannot turn away potential employees who submit legitimate looking documents. Gilmer said his industry's initial reaction to the new no-match safe-harbor proposal was not all positive.

DOJ_NMG_0063552

It will "require a lot of the [employer's] time to hold the hand of the employees in question," he said. "But if they have to do it, they have to do it."

WORKER INSECURITY

Bruce Nissen, director of research at the Center for Labor Research and Statistics at Florida International University, said the national immigration debate has created a strong feeling of insecurity among immigrant workers.

Gilmer said even the rumor of an immigration raid will cause immigrant workers, both legal and illegal, to scatter and not go to work. This leads to major worker shortages for growers.

Homeland Security officials said they did not know when the agency would issue a final regulation.

"One thing [ICE and the DHS] could do is sit on it until after the Nov. 7 election and then rule," he said. "Then [they can] water it down or come down hard. But people's ballots have already been cast."

In the past, employers often were advised by their attorneys not to worry about receiving a no-match letter, because there are many reasons a no-match can occur.

But now, South Florida employment attorneys say local employers are taking no-match letters more seriously.

Hackley said she advises employers that receive no-match letters to determine the true immigration status of the employee while at the same time not jumping to any conclusion.

When the no-match letters first started going out in 2002, she said, thousands of workers resigned or were fired because employers were unsure of their employees' immigration status. If ICE steps up enforcement based on no-match letters, she cautioned, that problem could be major in South Florida because of its large population of immigrant workers.

"This use of the no-match letter is premature and a potentially dangerous enforcement tool," Hackley said. The Social Security Administration database is "notoriously error-prone and will undoubtedly result in wrongful terminations."

In addition, some employment lawyers complain that the 63-day time frame proposed in the new ICE regulation for resolving discrepancies in Social Security information is unreasonable. Tobocman said that would leave employers little choice but to fire the worker.

Tobocman said she is working with clients to set up internal training programs for the proper completion of employment verification forms and for detecting fraudulent green cards, work permits and Social Security cards.

"Now more than ever, it's essential that employers have written policies in place" for when they receive a no-match letter, she said. She advises her clients that they also should have policies in place for employee compliance and what to do in case of a government audit or document request.

LOOKING FOR ALTERNATIVES

Drody, of the Builders Association of South Florida, contended that most builders and developers don't know how many illegal workers they employ. She said builders and developers need to make sure they work with reputable subcontractors to reduce the number of illegal workers.

Edie Ousley, a spokeswoman for the Florida Home Builders Association in Tallahassee, said many employers don't know how to detect fraudulent documents.

Both of their groups favor an expanded guest worker program that would allow skilled workers who already are in the United States illegally to continue working in the construction industry. Undocumented workers "want to pay their taxes and be a part of the system instead of hiding in the crevices," Drody said.

In the agricultural industry, Fritz Roka, a University of Florida agricultural economist, said stepped-up enforcement against illegal workers and employers that hire them may push growers to further explore mechanized farming techniques.

Roka said there also is increasing interest among growers in guest worker programs.

Through the federal H-2A guest worker visa program, Los Angeles-based agricultural staffing company Global Horizons provides farm workers for growers. Gregory Schell said he has heard that growers in the South Florida area have used the company to bring in workers under the H-2A program.

Merle Dautrey, a spokesman for Global Horizons, estimated that between 2 percent and 4 percent of farmworkers nationwide are in the United States on H-2A visas. As immigration enforcement tightens, that percentage is likely to increase, he said.

The United Farm Workers union has supported the guest worker visa program, said union spokesman Marc Grossman. The UFW has signed a contract with Global Horizons requiring that all guest workers brought in by the company will become members of the union.

But workers don't come cheap under guest workers' visa program. Under the H-2A visa, temporary guest workers can come into the country for a specified maximum period of time, and employers are obligated to provide housing and pay at least the Adverse Effect Wage Rate for the state. For 2006, the AEWR in Florida was $8.56 an hour. There is no cap on the number of workers who come in under the H-2A program.

DOJ_NMG_0063553

Gilmer said the agricultural industry is working to modify the H-2A program to make it a more attractive choice for farmers and growers by allowing growers to provide housing vouchers instead of actual housing for workers. Growers also seek to speed up the approval process for bringing in guest workers.

Grossman said that if farmers cannot find legal workers at affordable wages, farming will move overseas.

'MASSIVE IMPACT'

Employment and immigration experts are split on whether the Bush administration's recent moves signal that employers need to seriously change how they do business.

That uncertainty arises because the country is split on how to handle the immigration issue.

Miami pollster Sergio Bendixen of Bendixen & Associates wrote in March that "an overwhelming majority of legal immigrants think that the undocumented 'take jobs that legal residents and citizens do not want to do.' These legal immigrants also feel that the undocumented have a positive impact on the quality of life of Americans and 'help the economy by providing low-cost labor.' "

FIU's Nissen said that if federal officials were serious about cracking down on South Florida employers and their illegal workers, "it would have a massive and very serious impact." But he predicted that the administration will engage in "a selective, showy, sporadic set of arrests to create fear, but not to the point of harming farming or industry."

Sarah Tobocman disagrees. It's no secret that South Florida businesses have a high percentage of undocumented workers, she said. Businesses should expect to see greater federal enforcement of immigration laws. "Employers need to be prepared for a change," she warned.

2 Polish Nationals Plead Guilty In US To 'Leasing' Illegal Workers (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 15, 2006

(AP) - FORT LAUDERDALE, Florida-Two Polish nationals have pleaded guilty to leasing out illegal immigrants from eastern Europe to work on U.S. farms, dairies and factories, prosecutors said. A third was sentenced to prison a year after pleading guilty to similar federal charges.

Jaroslaw Sawczuk, 39, and Jozef Bronislaw Bogacki, 43, pleaded guilty Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra to federal charges of fraud and conspiracy to transport, house and otherwise encourage illegal immigrants to remain in the United States.

Pavel Preus, 39, pleaded guilty to similar charges in September 2005. Marra sentenced him to 37 months in prison, followed by three years of supervised release. Preus was also ordered to pay $950,000 for unpaid payroll taxes.

Sentencing for Bogacki and Sawczuk was scheduled Dec. 15. Both face a maximum of 20 years in prison and fines up to $500,000. The U.S. government is also seeking the forfeiture of Bogacki's assets.

E-mails sent to the individual attorneys representing Sawczuk and Preus were not immediately returned. The after-hours recording for Bogacki's federal public defender in Tampa would not accept an incoming message, the phone at the office of Sawczuk's attorney rang unanswered late Wednesday and Preus' attorney did not immediately return a message left at his office.

Sawczuk is a Polish citizen and lived in Coral Springs. Bogacki was born in Poland but became a naturalized U.S. citizen and lived in Clearwater. Preus is a Polish citizen and lived in Pompano Beach.

The three men were arrested in April 2005. Three citizens of the Slovak Republic also named in the original 26-count indictment are believed to be overseas, prosecutors said.

The indictment alleged that the employee-leasing ring, beginning in 1995 provided American companies in the Midwest and Southeast with more than 550 unauthorized workers from Hungary, Czech Republic and Poland, among other countries. The workers entered the U.S. on tourist visas.

The six defendants named in the indictment failed to pay $6 million in payroll taxes and laundered more than $20 million, prosecutors said.

Congress Passes Major Security Measures (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — Congress is scrambling to pass long-delayed domestic and border security bills, as Republicans and the Democrats try to control the issues ahead of the midterm elections — and to blame each other for blocking progress.

DOJ_NMG_0063554

The most far-reaching action on Thursday was in the Senate, which voted, 98 to 0, to approve a six-year port security package costing more than $5 billion that includes deadlines to install radiation detectors at the largest ports and encourages shippers and ports worldwide to improve guarding containers against stowaway weapons.

Earlier, the House approved, 283 to 138, a bill that calls for a two-layer fence along 700 miles of the border with Mexico, a measure advertised as an immigration enforcement and antiterror initiative.

Negotiations were under way on measures to tighten security at chemical plants and revamp the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The Senate port bill included language for mass transit and rail security programs, including random passenger and baggage screening at certain stations and fire-safety improvements for Amtrak tunnels in the Northeast corridor.

With just two weeks before Congress plans to begin its election recess, the debate has been intensely partisan. Democrats have tried to force Republicans to consider expansions that could add billions of dollars in costs in the port security bill by adopting, for example, all the outstanding recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission.

"Let's see if they vote against this," Senator Henry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the minority leader, said this week.

Republicans have generally succeeded in blocking such last-minute amendments, after condemning them as not-so-subtle efforts to kill or delay the bills.

"This is politics at its very worst," Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, said on the floor Thursday. "If Democrats spend half as much time fighting terrorists as they do this administration, America would win this war a lot faster."

Democrats say it is the Republicans who are to blame for the delay.

"It is not about us,'' Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House minority leader, said. "It is about the president of the United States and this Republican Congress, and is our country as safe as it could be. Republicans are in charge of everything."

The Senate port bill, which the Bush administration supports and which is similar to a measure that the House has passed, would require installing radiation detection equipment by the end of 2007 at 22 ports that receive 98 percent of the incoming cargo, a goal that the Homeland Security Department has set.

It also writes into law two programs to give accelerated clearance to cargo from ports that pre-screen containers for weapons or containers shipped on behalf of companies that have agreed to assure their security from the factory until they being loaded onto ships.

The bill would authorize $5.5 billion for port security over six years, including adding 1,000 customs and border officers and $400 million in port security grants. It would also authorize $1.2 billion for rail security and $2.4 billion in grants for security on mass transit.

The bill would extend some port user fees to pay some of the costs, but it remains unclear whether Congress will appropriate enough money to finance the rest or whether the fees will be set aside for security.

The fence proposal represents a last-minute push by Republicans for at least part of their border security agenda. A similar requirement was included in December in broader immigration measures in the House. That bill stalled after a dispute with the Senate over a temporary-worker program to let some illegal immigrants remain here.

House Republicans also promised on Thursday to increase the number of Border Patrol agents, increase prosecutions of smugglers of immigrants and criminalize the building of tunnels under the border.

More than 60 Democrats joined with Republican House members to vote for the fence bill. Other Democrats in the House and Senate ridiculed it, saying that the fence alone would not solve the border problem and that the bill did not provide the more that $2 billion that it would cost to build.

Republican leaders are hoping to insert language into the larger budget bill for domestic security that is in a conference committee to address chemical plant security, FEMA restructuring and, perhaps, additional provisions.

The rules on chemical plants have support of the administration as well as Democrats and Republicans in Congress. The negotiations are trying to compromise on how demanding they should be.

A proposal backed by Republicans and opposed by environmentalists would let the owners of chemical plants decide what safety measures to adopt. It would prohibit the federal government from mandating that they consider using inherently safer chemicals.

House Passes Border Fence (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

The House yesterday easily approved building 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border in an effort to get major border-security legislation on President Bush's desk before November's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0063555

"The time to address the border-security emergency is now, before Congress leaves for the November election," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, applauding the Republican-backed measure and introducing a slate of new border-security measures that he hopes to pass this month.

Yesterday's border-fence bill was approved on a 283-138 vote. The vast majority of House Republicans were joined by 64 Democrats to support the measure. Six Republicans voted against it.

In addition to building double-layered fences along 700 miles of the southern border, the Secure Fence Act also changes Border Patrol policy to allow agents to forcibly disable fleeing vehicles along the border. The measure would also deploy cameras, ground sensors and unmanned aerial vehicles to monitor the border.

Democrats dismissed the vote as "another political gimmick" by House Republicans who passed a tough border-security bill last year but have since been unable to persuade the Republican Senate to take it up. The Senate remains intent on its own bill that tightens border security but at the same time grants citizenship rights to some 10 million illegal aliens and creates a guest-worker program that will usher hundreds of thousands more foreign laborers into the U.S.

Yesterday, House Democrats called the 700-mile fence a new "Berlin wall" and expressed concern that it would drive illegal crossers deep into the dangerous desert in search of an unimpeded crossing. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, California Democrat, added, "It does nothing to secure our northern border."

Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican, strongly supported the measure. "It's about a thousand miles short of where it ought to be," he said, "but I'll take 700 miles."

When the House last year approved its border-security legislation, it included almost exactly the same fencing. The fence came to symbolize what many Democrats said was an unforgiving bill. They said the fence proved that Republicans harbored a hostility toward immigrants.

But by yesterday, more than 20 Democrats had switched their position to support the border fence -- including several who face tough elections this fall.

Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Tennessee Democrat who is running for the Senate, said, "For the country to be secure, we have to have control over who gets in and who's allowed to stay."

Asked why he opposed the fence last year, he said the current proposal was "more comprehensive." Mr. Ford bristled at the question of whether his change of heart had anything to do with his upcoming statewide election in a state that polls show supports tough immigration policies.

After the vote yesterday, Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat who also switched his vote, was waiting in an out-of-the-way hallway beside a bank of elevators.

When asked by a reporter why he switched his vote, Mr. Mollohan first responded, "How did you find me?"

After gathering his thoughts for a moment, he said he supported yesterday's fence bill because it "makes a statement for consideration" of increased funding and even tougher illegal-immigration enforcement measures. Mr. Mollohan, who faces a challenge from the right this fall, not only voted against the fence last year but also voted against the entire House border-security bill.

Asked if his election in two months had anything to do with his position switch, Mr. Mollohan replied: "The election two months away has something to do with everything we do up here."

Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, also supported yesterday's bill after opposing the fence and the border-security bill last year.

During the August recess, he said he attended four town-hall meetings where the issue of illegal immigration dominated voter concerns. "The people who spoke up were almost unanimously opposed to illegal immigration."

Still, he said, the upcoming elections had nothing to do with his change of heart on the issue.

"Voting against the fences would have helped me more politically," Mr. Moran said.

After yesterday's House vote, Senate Republicans remain uncommitted to bringing the measure to the floor for a final vote, where many think it would be approved. Republican leaders said they are considering attaching the bill to other must-pass legislation to get it through the Senate.

House Approves U.S.-Mexican Border Fence (AP-Y)

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP, September 15, 2006

The House voted for the second time in a year to erect a fence along a third of the U.S.-Mexican border, part of a Republican effort to keep illegal immigration an issue before voters.

DOJ_NMG_0063556

A new 700 miles of double-layered fencing won approval on a 283-138 vote, a bigger margin than last December when the House passed it as part of a broader bill that also would have made being an illegal immigrant a felony. The nearly 2,000-mile border now has about 75 miles of fencing.

Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said the separate fence bill was needed to show Americans "we can take meaningful action to secure the border."

The House's bill last December and one passed by the Senate last May are so far apart on issues that Republican leaders haven't even tried to negotiate a compromise.

The main difference is that the Senate bill would provide legal status to millions of illegal immigrants already in the U.S., a concept supported by President Bush but opposed by most House Republicans. The Senate bill calls for 370 miles of fencing along the Mexican border.

Supporters of the new House bill said the new fencing would let Border Patrol agents focus more on apprehending illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico rather than having to man the entire border.

"We have to come to grips with the fact that our Border Patrol agents need a border fence on our southern border ... where we're now facing infiltration by members of terrorist organizations like Hezbollah," said Rep. Ed Royce, R-Calif.

The bill passed Thursday doesn't pay for the fence. Republicans, estimating the cost at more than $2 billion, said that will be covered in a later spending bill. Democrats estimated the fence would cost $7 billion, based on information from the Department of Homeland Security on costs per mile of a double-layer fence.

"This is nothing more than political gamesmanship in the run-up to the midterm elections. Sounds good. Does nothing," said Rep. Alcee Hastings, D-Fla.

Democrats accused Republicans of playing upon voters' fears to score political points. Rep. Lloyd Doggett, D-Texas, said Republicans were trying to confuse Americans into thinking "Osama bin Laden is heading north in a sombrero."

The bill also directs the Homeland Security Department to take control of the border in 18 months and gives border agents new authority to stop fleeing vehicles. It also calls for a study of the need for a fence on the U.S.-Canadian border.

Meanwhile, the House Administration Committee approved a bill to require states to ask for photo identification from voters by November 2008 and proof of citizenship by 2010. The full House could vote on it as early as next week.

House leaders unveiled other border security bills addressing immigrant gangs, speedier deportations and other issues they plan to consider.

Senate Republicans said its unlikely the fence proposal would pass in that chamber as a single bill, but might win approval if attached to spending bills.

___

The House fence bill is HR 6061; the voter ID bill is HR 4844.

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov

House Votes To Boost Border Security; Broader Immigration Issues Remain (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House on Thursday easily passed a bill calling for construction of lengthy sections of double-layered fencing along the U.S. border with Mexico, sending the legislation to a Senate that appeared inclined to approve that and other security measures.

The 283-138 vote demonstrated that even as Capitol Hill remained deadlocked over what to do about the millions of illegal immigrants already in this country, bipartisan support existed for significantly toughening border security, especially as the November election neared.

And though House Republicans emphasized that enforcement should come first, they gave no indication of when — or even whether — they'd support broader immigration measures, such as a guest worker program, that are supported by the Senate, President Bush and farmers and other businesspeople.

House Republicans promoted the fence bill as the first phase of a larger border-security package they unveiled Thursday. It includes a measure that would make it a crime to dig border tunnels and another that would end a provision in immigration law that protects Salvadorans from deportation.

In the Los Angeles area, and increasingly in other parts of the nation, gangs with roots in El Salvador are a significant crime problem.

The fence bill mandates the construction of 700 miles of fencing along several sections of the 2,000-mile border: around Tecate and Calexico, Calif., along most of the Arizona stretch, and in heavily populated areas of Texas and New Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0063557

The bill requires the Department of Homeland Security to prevent "all unlawful entries into the United States" within 18 months after the bill is enacted; urges the department to allow Border Patrol agents to use greater force against smuggler vehicles; and orders a study on security at the northern border with Canada.

The California delegation split mostly along party lines; only two Democrats, Dennis Cardoza of Atwater and Jim Costa of Fresno, joined all 20 Republicans in supporting the bill.

House leaders said they were working with the Senate to determine how to get the measures to Bush as quickly as possible. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Congress should finish considering all of them by the end of September.

"Republicans believe we can have a no-penetration border," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Of the fence proposal, he said: "If we build it, they will no longer come illegally."

Asked when the House might back a guest-worker program or other nonenforcement measures, Hastert said: "If we get a virtual no-penetration program on the border, then we can look at a lot of things."

Debate on overhauling immigration laws has been deadlocked for months.

Enforcement is a priority for the Senate, but many senators believe it cannot work effectively unless it is accompanied by a guest worker program to help meet the labor needs of the agricultural and hospitality industries, and a program to draw the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S. into the legal system — a position favored by Bush. Those provisions were in a bill approved by the Senate in May.

Many senators in both parties argue that if this year's Congress ignores these issues and focuses only on border security, it will have shirked its responsibilities and ultimately failed to adequately address the complexity of the immigration problem.

Even so, some senators expressed cautious support for the House border security package, even as they pointed to elements they thought it lacked.

"I'm not going to take a position against it," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who helped write the Senate-passed bill. But, he added, the House bill is "not comprehensive immigration reform … it's just security."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who wrote a bill criminalizing the construction of tunnels under the border, said she was delighted to see a similar measure in the House border security package. But she expressed disappointment that there was no provision to help California farmers get access to workers.

With California in the middle of its peak harvest season and Florida's orange harvest set to begin next month, agriculture is a concern for lawmakers of all political stripes. Rep. Adam H. Putnam (R-Fla.), who chaired the all-Republican meeting that led to the border security package, appeared Wednesday at a rally organized by farmers, restaurant owners and other businesses dependent on immigrant labor.

With the administration increasing crackdowns on employers who hire illegal workers and an emphasis in Congress on enforcement, growers are getting nervous, lawmakers said.

"The status quo is killing farmers," said Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.). "They are desperate. I've never seen anything like it."

On Thursday, Putnam said the House wanted to restore confidence in the government's ability to secure the border before addressing labor needs. But with oranges left unpicked because of labor shortages last year and the new harvest season approaching, he said he didn't "see any way to get this resolved before the fall harvest."

Democrats in both chambers dismissed the border measures as a political ploy, particularly considering that the House had already passed many of their provisions, including the fencing requirement.

"I think it's sad when House leadership has sought to take an important issue and turn it into a political platform," said Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee (D-Texas), who noted that thorny issues such as Medicare, Iraq and the Gulf Coast hurricane recovery were getting little attention from the GOP.

Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Texas) accused House Republicans of using immigration as a scare tactic, conflating terrorists with immigrants looking for work so that Americans would think that "Osama bin Laden is heading north in a sombrero."

House Passes Border-Fence Bill, Changes To Rules On Earmarks (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Wrapping big bows on small packages, House Republicans advanced two modest pre-election initiatives hoping to blunt public anger at Congress's failure to address illegal immigration and lobbying abuses.

Back-to-back bills yesterday would add hundreds of miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border and establish new House procedures to try to fence in lawmakers' appetites for adding pork-barrel projects to annual appropriations bills.

DOJ_NMG_0063558

In both cases, the leadership's primary concern was to try to help its vulnerable members shore up support among conservatives ahead of the Nov. 7 elections. But the gap between the two bills' provisions and what had been promised months ago is so great that the exercise could bolster Democrats' call for more change in Washington.

"We've been awash in talk of reform," said Rep. David Obey (D., Wis.) "But now seven weeks before the election, we see the majority has labored long and produced a mouse."

The so-called "Secure Fence Act" sailed through on a 283-138 vote, even though it was introduced only 24 hours earlier and provides no money to actually build the 700 miles of double-layered reinforced fencing along five stretches in California, Texas, Arizona and New Mexico. At a cost of $9 million to $10 million a mile, the total federal investment would run $6 billion to $7 billion altogether, but Republicans are betting the political dividends will be immediate in November.

"It is essential to do this today to tell the American people we have got the message," said Rep. Peter King (R., N.Y.), chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. "A fence is not the only answer, but an essential part of the answer."

Democrats denounced the measure as more "pontification" than legislation, yet the sharpest criticism came from departing Rep. James Kolbe (R., Ariz.), who has tried unsuccessfully to convince the House to take a more comprehensive approach -- akin to the Senate's -- to overhauling immigration policy.

"What we need to do is...walk 100 yards across the Capitol to the other side and negotiate" with the Senate, Mr. Kolbe said.

President Bush, at a meeting with House Republicans, also restated his support for a broader bill that will address the millions of undocumented workers in the U.S. But the House leadership believes the safer political course is to focus before the elections only on border-security measures such as the proposed fence, which is popular with conservative voters.

The second measure adopted yesterday -- by a 245-171 vote -- is also tailored to appease conservatives, who have complained about the growth of government spending under Republican rule and the explosion in the number of special-interest spending "earmarks" added by both parties to annual appropriations bills.

In many instances this reflects traditional pork-barrel politics to win votes at home. But amid the lobbying scandals of the past year, earmarks also have been exposed as almost a new political currency in which members steer money to projects and are rewarded with favors and campaign contributions financed by the lobbyists involved.

The rules changes do more to promote transparency rather than guarantee an end to the practice. As a practical matter, the real impact won't be felt until after the election. "The politics of earmark reform is a lot bigger than the substance of earmark reform," said Rep, Jack Kingston (R., Ga.).

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R., Calif.) urged support even as he admitted that his party hadn't reached "the goal line" of what is needed to address abuses.

Fred Wertheimer, a longtime activist for tighter ethics rules in Congress, offered a scathing critique. "The earmark rules changes are an illusionary trick being offered up in the hopes that the public will ignore the miserable failure by the House to address the worst congressional corruption scandals in decades," he said.

House Votes To Build 700 Miles Of Fence Along The U.S.-Mexico Border (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The House voted 283-138 on Thursday to construct more than 700 miles of two-layered fencing along the porous Southwest border, but most Democrats denounced the plan as blatant political posturing in advance of the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Afterward, House GOP leaders unveiled a package of other relatively non-controversial border-security initiatives, expressing confidence that they could win passage in the Senate and advance to the president's desk before lawmakers quit work at the end of the month to campaign for re-election.

But the Senate outlook remained quite uncertain, as senators of both parties and President Bush have insisted that tough border security measures should be passed only if part of more-comprehensive legislation.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., hinted that House leaders might be willing to consider more-contentious elements of immigration legislation - including Bush's proposed guest-worker program - if they are satisfied that Congress first has moved aggressively to secure U.S. borders.

"If we get a virtual no-penetration program on the border, then we can look at a lot of different things," Hastert said.

But other lawmakers said that, with time running out, it appears virtually impossible for the House and Senate to find common ground on divisive immigration issues that have kept them deadlocked for months.

DOJ_NMG_0063559

House leaders have refused to consider a comprehensive Senate-passed bill that would put millions of illegal immigrants on a path toward permanent legal status and U.S. citizenship. The measure also includes a version of the president's guest-worker plan, as well as stiffer border-enforcement measures.

Bush, who met Thursday morning on Capitol Hill with Republican House members, this week renewed his call for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. His administration has embraced limited fencing as a partial solution to strengthening the border, but not to the extent proposed by the House.

The fence proposal is identical to one that was included in an immigration enforcement bill that the House passed last December. With that measure sidelined in the stalemate with the Senate, House leaders resurrected the proposed $2.2 billion barrier as the first element of their latest border security package.

The "Border Security Now" agenda recycles several provisions from the stalled House and Senate bills, including $2.3 billion for 1,200 new Border Patrol agents next year, a crackdown on smugglers and criminal aliens and stiff penalties for the construction of border tunnels.

Sixty-four Democrats joined 219 Republicans in voting for the fence; 131 Democrats and six Republicans voted against it.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who sponsored a similar tunnel provision in the Senate, said she welcomed the House version of her proposal but withheld judgment on other provisions until she takes a closer look. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a leading architect of the Senate bill, said he would support proposals to strengthen the border but also said he wants to study the House initiatives before taking a position.

The largest section of fencing in the House bill would reach 361 miles from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz. A 22-mile section would be built near a port entry in Tecate, Calif., in east San Diego County. Three sections would be in Texas - a 51-mile stretch from Del Rio to Eagle Pass; 176 miles from Laredo to Brownsville and 88 miles stretching from El Paso westward to Columbus, N.M.

The bill also urges the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to study the feasibility of erecting similar barriers along the country's northern border with Canada.

It also requires the DHS to achieve operational control over both borders through a "virtual fence" that includes cameras, ground sensors, unmanned aerial vehicles and integrated surveillance technology. Five industry teams are competing for a multibillion-dollar contract to assemble the virtual fence, and the DHS expects to announce a winner by Sept. 30.

Republican leaders said the proposed barriers would have support in the Senate, which already has endorsed 370 miles of fencing and authorized $1.8 billion to fund it.

But Democrats said Republicans are trying to show conservative constituents that they are getting tough on immigration to bolster support in the elections.

"This is the same bill they passed before - the same monstrous bill," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "We're not going to play their silly little games."

Republicans argued that the fence, when coupled with their other initiatives, would answer public demands for urgently need safeguards to shore up the borders against illegal immigration and potential terrorism. Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, called it "the first long step" in a comprehensive border security plan.

"The American people expect us to secure the border," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Overstating Border Reform's Price (WP)

By Robert Greenstein And James Horney

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Would offering undocumented immigrants a path to legalization bust the federal budget? Critics of the Senate immigration bill, which seeks to crack down on illegal immigration while giving many currently undocumented workers a chance to work legally in this country, tout a Congressional Budget Office study that they say shows the bill would cost a whopping $126 billion over 10 years. A fair reading of that study, however, suggests that the bill's actual impact on the deficit would be close to zero and that it could even be beneficial.

Critics add up the bill's increased tax-credit and entitlement costs while ignoring the increased tax revenue it would produce. They also substantially inflate the increased discretionary government spending that would result and overlook the bill's expected positive effects on the economy.

Let's start with revenue. The CBO found that the Senate bill would boost tax revenue by $44 billion over 10 years by increasing the size of the workforce and the number of immigrants working "above ground" and paying taxes. This would roughly offset the $48 billion in increased entitlement costs that the CBO projects under the bill. Indeed, it estimated that after the first few years, new tax collections actually would exceed new entitlement spending.

DOJ_NMG_0063560

The CBO also predicts that this increase in the size of the workforce would produce benefits for the economy. Both the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget expect a slowdown in economic growth in coming decades as the population ages and growth in the supply of workers grinds nearly to a halt. The CBO estimates the Senate bill -- because it would expand the workforce -- would boost the economy, possibly by enough to produce an additional $100 billion or more in revenue over 10 years.

This means that the Senate bill would probably reduce long-term deficits, not enlarge them. Similarly, the Social Security actuaries have found that the Senate bill would reduce the Social Security trust fund's long-term deficit and extend the program's solvency by two years.

So how did critics of the Senate bill arrive at the sensational $126 billion figure, which appears nowhere in the CBO report? First, they counted all of the bill's spending increases while ignoring all of its increases in revenue. For example, they counted the increased costs of Social Security and Medicare benefits for those additional immigrants who would qualify for them, while ignoring the increased Social Security and Medicare payroll taxes the immigrants would pay to qualify for those benefits.

They also incorrectly assumed that the Senate bill requires $78 billion in added discretionary spending. To be sure, the bill would authorize future appropriations of roughly that amount over 10 years. But none of these funds would actually be spent unless Congress provided them in future appropriations bills. The federal budget contains hundreds of programs that Congress funds below -- often far below -- the authorized amounts.

In addition, each year Congress must fit appropriations within an overall appropriations limit, as set in the congressional budget resolution. Funding increases for one set of programs often must be offset by reductions in other programs. Consequently, any increase in discretionary spending arising from the Senate bill is likely to be offset, at least in part, by cuts in other areas. For each of the past four years Congress has made across-the-board cuts in discretionary programs to accommodate new priorities while remaining within the prescribed limits. The CBO itself did not include the $78 billion figure in its estimate of how much new spending the Senate bill actually provides.

Finally, whatever portion of the $78 billion ultimately shows up in future appropriations will probably be provided whether Congress passes the Senate bill or not. That is because more than 90 percent of the authorized discretionary spending would go toward the kind of enforcement measures the bill's critics strongly support, such as expanded border security and stronger measures to identify immigrants illegally seeking employment. Republican congressional leaders have made clear their intention to increase funding for enforcement activities by billions of dollars in appropriation bills that they will consider this month. Indeed, Rep. Harold Rogers, a key Appropriations subcommittee chairman, declared this week that the leadership will provide "tons of money" for this.

Because it is a subject that stirs strong emotions, debates over immigration policy demand fact and solid analysis. As Congress searches for agreement on immigration legislation, mistaken claims that the Senate bill would bust the budget only make this already difficult job harder.

Robert Greenstein is executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. James Horney is a senior fellow at the center and former chief of the budget projections unit at the Congressional Budget Office.

Immigrants Turn Utah Into Mini-melting Pot (USAT)

By Haya El Nasser

USA Today, September 15, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY — In the shadow of the Mormon faith's majestic headquarters, the fountain at the center of the Gateway Plaza outdoor mall is a popular backdrop for weddings. On a scorching day, Hispanic and Anglo children run side by side through the pulsating sprays of water.

Marriage and kids: They're the pillars of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS), which dominates many facets of life in Utah. But diversity?

Immigration is changing the complexion of communities across the USA. As it sweeps through Utah, traditionally one of the least diverse and most conservative states in the nation, its impact is particularly dramatic. About 98% white until 1970, Utah is becoming a mini-melting pot.

While conservative Republicans in the U.S. House of Representatives are pushing to tighten borders and make illegal immigrants felons, factors unique to Utah are attracting Hispanics to this reddest of red states. Among them: the Mormon Church's philosophy of outreach and its embrace of large families.

These influences have helped give the state a reputation of being warm and welcoming to immigrants. Utah allows the undocumented to drive legally with a “driving privilege card.” They can attend public colleges and universities and pay in-state tuition. Minorities — mostly Hispanics — make up 16.5% of the population, up from 8.8% in 1990. They could reach 20% by 2010. Hispanics are driving the growth among minorities here. The state's black and Asian populations also are growing but more slowly.

DOJ_NMG_0063561

The changes are visible — and audible. Sounds of up to 70 languages reverberate in school hallways, cantinas are sprouting in the suburbs, and Spanish-speaking religious congregations are multiplying — scenes that are more Los Angeles and Miami than Salt Lake City.

"Word has gotten out that it's a place where immigrants are welcome," five-term Utah Republican Rep. Chris Cannon says.

Utahans in 2004 gave President Bush his biggest margin over Democrat John Kerry in any state — 72% to 26%. How can one of America's most conservative places be so receptive to immigrants?

"The LDS faith believes you can be conservative and yet be compassionate," says Marco Diaz, past chairman of the Utah Republican Hispanic Assembly, which tries to attract more Hispanics to the party. "Help thy neighbor and love thy neighbor and still try to be fiscal conservatives."

How long Utah will embrace this philosophy remains to be seen. Frustrations are mounting over rising dropout rates and classrooms crammed with non-English speakers. Pressure to cut benefits to undocumented residents and crack down on employers who hire them is growing. About 100,000 of Utah's foreign-born residents — about half — are here illegally, says Pamela Perlich, senior research economist at the University of Utah.

Diaz says time may be running out on the state's welcome mat.

"Never have we seen so much uproar on immigration," Diaz says. "A lot of Utahans want some change. … There's a feeling from constituents that something needs to be done."

Utah has been overwhelmingly Mormon since Brigham Young and thousands of followers settled in the Great Salt Lake Valley in the mid-1800s after fleeing persecution 1,300 miles away in Illinois. Utah remains mostly Mormon — about 62% — but that share of the population is declining.

The state ranks 34th in population at 2.5 million. It's insular, yet cosmopolitan.

Utah boasts one of the highest rates of adult residents who have passports and speak more than one language. Brigham Young University teaches more advanced foreign-language courses than any other U.S. university. About 85% of its seniors speak a second language.

That's the Mormon influence.

"This is a missionizing church," says Jan Shipps, a scholar of Mormonism at Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis. At age 18 or 19, Mormons "receive a call to go on a mission and spend two years at their own expense making converts." They learn a foreign language and go abroad. "They experience another culture," she says. "That tends to make Utah … a very cosmopolitan place."

Two forces at play are causing some tension in Utah and within the church, says Kathryn Daynes, a BYU assistant professor of history. "Latter-day Saints … want to reach out on an individual level, but politically, they're very conservative."

Family values and the church's worldwide proselytizing and mission work in Latin America have attracted immigrants and potential converts to Utah. The church offers English classes throughout the state. It has held dinners for Hispanic leaders and has 114 Spanish-speaking congregations in Utah.

Church leaders generally have avoided commenting on the immigration debate and declined to be interviewed for this story.

They reacted in May, however, to comments by CNN commentator Lou Dobbs, an outspoken advocate of strict enforcement of immigration laws, on the eve of Mexico President Vicente Fox's visit to Utah and other states.

Dobbs said the Mormon church "has a vigorous enthusiasm for as many of Mexico's citizens as they possibly could attract to the state of Utah, irrespective of the cost to taxpayers."

The church's website called Dobbs' statement unfounded. It said the church has more than 1 million members in Mexico and owns nearly 1,000 buildings there but "does not encourage them to move to Utah or anywhere else."

Immigration has struck a nerve this year in Utah. When up to 25,000 people marched in a pro-immigration rally here in April, "I think it frightened people," says Maria Garciaz, executive director of Salt Lake Neighborhood Housing Services, a non-profit group that finances and builds affordable housing on the increasingly diverse west side of Salt Lake City.

Incumbent congressman Cannon, who narrowly won the Republican primary in June, says, "The whole race was about immigration." His opponent was political newcomer and millionaire real estate developer John Jacob, who favored sending illegal immigrants home before giving them a chance at citizenship and punishing employers who hire them.

Cannon is far from liberal on the issue. He voted for a bill that would make helping illegal immigrants a crime and illegal residency a felony. But he supports President Bush's proposed guest-worker program. Cannon and Jacob are Mormon.

"It's better for America to be proud of America and not take harsh views of the world," Cannon says. "I hope Utah is one of these places where we dampen the harshness."

DOJ_NMG_0063562

Frustration is rising, however. The Utah Minuteman Project, whose mission is "to secure our homeland" from immigrants here illegally, is pushing to repeal driving privilege cards and in-state tuition for undocumented immigrants.

"Schools are an issue, highway crowding is an issue and the crime rate has gone way up," says Alexander Segura, Utah Minuteman board chairman. "It's issues like that that people are just fed up with."

Immigrants didn't flock here until the late 1990s as the state began preparing to host the 2002 Winter Olympics. Through much of the 1990s, non-agricultural jobs in Utah grew twice as fast as in the nation as a whole. A housing boom feeds the surge. Construction jobs grew 12.4% in 2005 and are expected to jump 15.3% this year.

About two-thirds of Utah's new immigrants came from abroad and the rest from other states, mainly California. The state's Hispanic population soared to about 270,000 in 2005, up 33.1% since 2000. Hispanics contributed about a quarter of the state's growth in the 1990s.

Utah has long had unusual demographics. It has the highest share of married households of any state, the youngest marrying age, the highest birth rate, the largest average household size and the youngest median age. The state is on its third post-World War II baby boom and is bracing for another one because of immigrants.

Hispanic fertility rates in Utah not only exceed those of non-Hispanic whites here but also those of Hispanics nationally and even of women in Mexico, says Perlich, the University of Utah demographer.

Many Utah immigrants are recent arrivals who come from rural Latin America where birth-control education is non-existent. They're now in a state where large families are the norm and birth control is not part of the public discussion.

Immigrants come first for jobs. Many are lured by the lifestyle.

Rosalia Gutierrez, 32, came from Mexico 15 years ago. She is not a Mormon but enjoys the serenity the family-friendly church instills across the state. "It's a nice place," says Gutierrez, a mother of three who works for a container manufacturer. "It's calm and peaceful."

Immigration has created new challenges for the state, from multilingual classrooms to more unwed teenage mothers.

Public school enrollment increased by 30,000 in the 1990s and another 30,000 in the past two years, says state demographer Robert Spendlove. "We're projecting increases of 150,000 in school-age population in the next 10 years."

Minorities account for about 75% of the school enrollment growth since 2000 and Hispanics for 58%.

The Utah State Office of Education has formed an English-language learning task force. The first "newcomer school" will open in Ogden this year to help children adapt while they learn English.

"It gives the child a fighting chance to do well," says Patti Harrington, state superintendent of public instruction. She says there's no political support to fund programs to help immigrants, such as teaching non-English speakers.

Centro de la Familia, a 30-year-old agency here, changed its focus from mental health and runaway youths to education to help counter high Hispanic dropout rates.

Immigration also is reshaping Midvale, a working-class Salt Lake City suburb with downtown signs in Spanish from the Tortas and Tacos stand to Comunidades Unidas, a community center.

Inside, men, women and children mill about brightly decorated rooms. They're here for prenatal care, diabetes education and other health and social services. The volunteers are friends and neighbors. Peer education works best when up to 80% of the people the center serves are undocumented, says Sabrina Morales, executive director and a native of Guatemala.

Claudia Gonzalez, mother of two, came to Utah in 1999 from San Diego. She cleaned houses, got referrals from the center and eventually volunteered. Now, she's the program director.

Midvale Mayor JoAnn Seghini created the Community Building Community program that brings volunteers and local agencies together to help immigrants. "Immigration is always going to be part of America," Seghini says. "Once they're here, they're us. And once they're us, we're in it together."

TAX:

Anti-Abortion Group Loses Tax Exemption (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

The Internal Revenue Service this week revoked the tax exemption of an anti-abortion group, Operation Rescue West, after receiving a complaint that it had violated prohibitions on electioneering by nonprofits in 2004.

The group had promised tax deductions for contributions to help defeat the Democratic presidential candidate, Senator John Kerry.

The organization said the agency's ruling would have little impact on its operations.

DOJ_NMG_0063563

"We have reorganized as simply Operation Rescue," said Cheryl Sullenger, the group's outreach coordinator. "Losing our tax exemption doesn't have much of an effect on us, one way or the other. We have learned some lessons through this whole thing, and I think we're in a better place now than we were before the I.R.S. investigation."

The role of churches, religious organizations and charities in elections drew attention in the 2004 presidential campaign and has already become an issue as the midterm elections approach. Charities and churches are generally prohibited from campaigning for candidates but may take stands on issues and hand out voter guides, among other things.

Politicians across the political spectrum are courting churches this year as never before. The latest example is Attorney General Phill Kline of Kansas, a Republican who recently sent a memorandum to his campaign staff directing them to get him in front of as many congregations as possible at receptions and church services and to get ministers to introduce him to their wealthy congregants.

In a four-page memorandum dated Aug. 8, which was first reported by The Lawrence Journal-World, in Lawrence, Kan., Mr. Kline lists several churches that have agreed to distribute campaign literature. He also mentions the need to create lay campaign committees in each church and to collect church members' e-mail addresses.

"Please try to get literature into everyone's hands," he wrote. "Check and work with pastor to see what is comfortable. In most instances, we should be able to place materials under the windshields of cars."

Mr. Kline's memorandum ends with a directive to give churches "I.R.S. rules guidance regarding what they can and cannot do (this should not take long — no use of church assets — can show in church as long as they do not deny opposition of showing their own video — no need to invite the other, just cannot deny — etc.) sign up sheets, show to give money contributions, etc."

Marcus S. Owens, a lawyer who formerly headed the I.R.S. division that oversees charities, said some of the suggestions in the memorandum would cause churches to violate the law.

"Assume you're a pastor who doesn't know a lot about the law, and here's the attorney general of the state coming to you and telling you it's O.K.," said Mr. Owens, who represents several nonprofits that the I.R.S. is investigating for possible political infractions. "Who's going to be in a position to refute the attorney general?"

Sherriene Jones, Mr. Kline's communications director, said the attorney general was well aware of laws proscribing the political activity of churches. Ms. Jones said that although the memorandum listed churches participating in political activities that might be seen as prohibited, Mr. Kline was referring only to the churches' pastors, and to recruiting volunteers for his receptions, not for his campaign.

"The attorney general would never ask a church to do anything illegal," she said.

In February, the I.R.S. said it had noticed a sharp increase in prohibited activities by charities and warned that it planned to reverse the trend. At the time, it said it was seeking to revoke the exemption of three organizations but did not name them, pending an appeals process.

Whether Operation Rescue West, which was also known as Youth Ministries Inc., was one of those charities is unclear. The I.R.S. does not comment on its reasons for revoking tax exemption, a step that Commissioner Mark Everson has characterized as "the nuclear option" to be used only as a last resort.

Catholics for a Free Choice, a nonprofit group that advocates on behalf of a woman's right to choose abortion, filed a complaint against Operation Rescue West in 2004, citing its activities during the Democratic National Convention in Boston.

It noted an advertisement Operation Rescue West placed in the July 15, 2004, edition of The Wanderer, a Roman Catholic weekly, seeking tax deductible contributions to help "defeat'' Mr. Kerry, thus enabling President Bush to appoint Supreme Court justices who would overturn the Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion.

At the Democratic convention, members of Operation Rescue West drove around a truck featuring a large photo of a late-stage aborted fetus and the words "Kerry's Choice."

"It could not have been a more clear or blatant violation of the I.R.S. rules," said Frances Kissling, president of Catholics for a Free Choice.

Ms. Kissling said she had no way of knowing whether her group's complaint had prompted the I.R.S. investigation of Operation Rescue West. Catholics for a Free Choice has also filed complaints alleging prohibited political activity against Priests for Life, a religious order on Staten Island, and Catholic Answers, a lay Catholic evangelical group.

Jerry Horn, media director of Priests for Life, declined to comment "because this a common tactic of Catholics for a Free Choice to try to intimidate people into not exercising their rights under the federal laws."

Catholic Answers responded to the complaint against it by forming a separate organization, Catholic Answers Action, under a different section of the tax code. Catholic Answers Action is tax exempt but cannot offer its donors tax deductions for their gifts.

DOJ_NMG_0063564

Troy Newman, Operation Rescue's president, said he did not know what structure the new organization, which was created a year ago, had been organized under.

"Whatever structure we have," Mr. Newman said, "we are going to speak out, we're not going to be intimidated, we're not going to be muzzled and we're not going to be gagged."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

High Court To Provide Same-Day Argument Transcripts Online (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 15, 2006

Starting in October you won't have to be inside the marble chamber of the Supreme Court to gain a same-day understanding of the thrust and parry of a particular oral argument.

The Court announced Thursday that it will be posting on its Web site the transcripts of oral arguments on the same day they occur -- far faster than the previous practice of releasing them up to two weeks afterward.

The announcement may seem like a small step that falls well short of opening the Court to television or radio broadcasting. But at an institution that still hands out quill pens to lawyers who argue before it, the change is significant. And access advocates hope it signals a new climate of openness under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr.

"I am pleased to see that the Supreme Court has moved into the 1990s with its same-day release of oral-argument transcripts," says Northwestern University political science professor Jerry Goldman, who posts the audio of oral arguments on his online Oyez Project. "But reading a transcript is like reading a libretto. It's a poor substitute for the real performance. Surely better than nothing, but still inadequate for a pillar of American government."

Roberts' predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, experimented with same-day release of the audio of oral arguments to accommodate the public interest in the Florida presidential election cases of 2000. Similar releases have occurred sporadically ever since, and all the justices who have spoken publicly about the practice have said they approve.

But oral-argument transcripts have posed different issues, including the Court's relationship with the Alderson Reporting Co., which has long provided transcripts to the Court for free -- but at a more leisurely pace, usually a week or more after the argument. For a fee, Alderson would also provide transcripts late in the same day or overnight to interested lawyers and other parties, including the press. Alderson officials on Thursday declined to comment on the new arrangement and how it may affect the company's sales of Court transcripts to private parties.

News media organizations have pressed the Court for years to accelerate the release of transcripts to aid in reporting on the often fast-paced arguments. They noted that at the White House, transcripts of remarks by the president and other top officials are made available almost immediately.

To aid the transcribing process, officials said, high-speed technology will be used, and a court reporter will be stationed in the court chamber for the first time. Previously, transcripts were made off site from audiotapes; the Court has audiotaped oral arguments since the 1950s.

High Court To Post Same-Day Transcripts (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The Supreme Court announced yesterday that it will make same-day transcripts of its oral arguments available free on its Web site, the quickest and most complete public access to its proceedings the court has ever offered.

There is no sign that the court is about to yield to calls for live television coverage, which the justices have steadfastly refused. But, in the quiet, tradition-bound world of the Supreme Court, yesterday's decision was almost revolutionary, court analysts said.

"It's a tremendous opening to the outside world," said Richard Lazarus, a professor of law at Georgetown University and co-director of the school's Supreme Court Institute.

It was the biggest step the court has taken in the direction of greater public access since John G. Roberts Jr., himself a former Supreme Court oral advocate, took over as chief justice almost a year ago.

Coupled with another recent innovation, the identification in the transcripts of which justice is asking a particular question, the court's new policy "creates the potential for more intelligent speculation by more people than just those who were in the courtroom about how a particular case is going to come out," Lazarus said.

DOJ_NMG_0063565

Previously, free transcripts were not posted on the court's site, http://www.supremecourtus.gov , until two weeks after oral argument. The only exceptions were certain recent high-profile cases, such as the 2000 presidential election cases, in which the court released same-day audiotapes of oral argument. There were just three such occasions in the 2005-2006 term.

Anyone who wanted a same-day transcript had to pay hundreds of dollars to the court's transcription service, Washington-based Alderson Reporting. That effectively limited access to a handful of law firms.

But recent progress in digital technology and a new arrangement with Alderson made it possible for the justices to adopt the new policy, which law professors, lawyers and reporters have been urging for years.

Formerly, Alderson provided services to the court free and recovered its costs by selling the transcripts. Now, the court will pay Alderson and give away the transcripts on its Web site, court spokeswoman Kathy L. Arberg said.

House Passes New Ethics Rule (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 15, 2006

The House changed its rules Thursday to require lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into legislation, a modest step toward restoring the reputation of Congress in a year of ethical lapses and scandals involving relations with lobbyists.

"We are making a commitment to changing the culture of this institution," said House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif.

The change, in effect only through year's end, is aimed at curtailing a practice whereby lawmakers anonymously insert "earmarks" — narrowly tailored spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district — into bills.

President Bush said in a statement the bill make sure "lawmakers and the public are better informed before Congress votes to spend the taxpayers' money."

Democrats disparaged the measure, citing the failure of the Republican-led Congress to pass more comprehensive legislation to clean up lawmaker relations with lobbyists.

The rules change "will do little more than to get Republicans through the November elections," said Rep. Louise Slaughter of New York, top Democrat on the House Rules Committee.

GOP Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona, a leading critic of special interest spending, said, "I'm under no illusion that this legislation, which deals only with the issue of transparency, will solve the problem of earmarking. But this bill does represent an important first step."

Citizens Against Government Waste, a taxpayer watchdog group, said there were 9,963 such projects in the spending bills for the 2006 budget year, costing $29 billion.

The 245-171 vote on the rule change came a day after Congress sent to President Bush a bill intended to make government spending more open to public scrutiny.

Under that bill, the government will set up by 2008 a Google-like search engine so people can track hundreds of billions of dollars in grants and contracts that the government awards every year.

But there is currently no prospect for progress on more comprehensive lobbying and ethics overhaul. That had been highlighted as an urgent task at the beginning of the year after several lawmakers were tied to illegal or unsavory actions, particularly with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The House and Senate last spring passed bills that would have required lobbyists to be more open about their activities; put limits on gifts and meals from lobbyists and travel involving lobbyists; slowed the movement of lawmakers leaving office for lobbying jobs; provided ethics training to staff and members; and ended anonymous earmarks.

The effort at a compromise stalled over a House provision to limit donations to independent political groups known as 527s for the section of tax law under which they are registered. Such groups tend to be more helpful to Democrats; Senate Democrats objected to a lobbying bill that also takes up campaign finance limits.

Democrats and clean government groups were quick to point out that earmark rules were no substitute for a larger ethics overhaul.

"It is tragic that Congress is failing to address in any meaningful way the corruption sweeping Capitol Hill in recent years," said Laura MacCleery, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch division.

Even getting the earmarks rule through the House was a struggle for GOP leaders. Republican members of the House Appropriations Committee complained their spending bills unfairly have been targeted, and that the disclosure rules should apply equally to bills from other committees.

DOJ_NMG_0063566

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, told Republican appropriators that they had listened to their concerns and "we believe we have fulfilled our commitment" to equal treatment. House Republicans, they said, made it clear they wanted such. "It is now time to put this reform into our rules."

To meet objections, the final rules change stipulates that earmarks must be listed not only for bills from committees but also when such projects are added to House-Senate conference reports or included in amendments in the full House.

The measure defines an earmark as "a provision that allocates funds outside of the normal formula-driven or competitive bidding process and targets those funds to a specific entity, state or congressional district."

Appropriators objected to language that would limit tax earmarks to a tax deduction, credit, exclusion or preference to only one beneficiary. Of the 24 Republicans who voted against the rules change, 22 were members of the Appropriations Committee.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., top Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, said that this rule would not cover a huge tax break for two multinational oil companies.

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense said the disclosure requirement leaves out thousands of earmarks directed toward a federal agency such as the Pentagon, the Army Corps of Engineers or national laboratories.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has directed the top Republican and Democrat on the Rules and Administration Committee to develop similar rules changes.

___

On the Net:

Information on the bill, H.Res. 1000, can be found at http://thomas.loc.gov/

House To Require Names On Pet Projects (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The House of Representatives took a modest step on Thursday to illuminate the practice of inserting special-interest provisions into major tax and spending bills by passing an internal rule that would require lawmakers to sign their names to some of the items they sponsor.

The resolution would address only a small fraction of such provisions and, as an internal rule, would expire at the end of the current session in just a few weeks.

Despite its limited reach, the passage of the resolution was in doubt until the last minute. Democrats called it meaningless. Members of the powerful House Appropriations Committee complained that it unfairly required more disclosure of their pet projects — known as earmarks — than it did of special-interest tax loopholes.

The resolution passed 245 to 171, with 24 Republicans and 147 Democrats voting against it.

House Republican leaders pushed ahead with the rule change because it was the last element of an all-but-abandoned package of lobbying and ethics reforms that they announced at the beginning of the year, pledging to cleanse the House of the scandals surrounding the lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Representative Randy Cunningham.

“Everybody complains about it, but when it ultimately gets to the floor, how can you vote against it?” said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois.

House Votes To Disclose Earmarks (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The House voted yesterday to shed more light on narrow-interest tax and spending legislation called earmarks, an incremental step toward openness that ended the prospect for a more sweeping overhaul of federal lobbying laws this year.

With a 245 to 171 vote, the House reacted to a year of congressional scandals by requiring its members to own up to the thousands of earmarks they sponsor each year.

Earmarks have been at the center of corruption investigations involving several lawmakers and lobbyists, and a public outcry against them helped spur a high-priority effort this year to devise ethics legislation that would have restricted contacts between lobbyists and members of Congress.

Instead, the House simply changed its internal rules to require that these targeted programs and their sponsors be disclosed in every type of bill, a procedure that does not currently exist. The measure, like any such rule change, could expire at the end of the year, but it is likely to be re-adopted along with the House's many other rules, Republican leaders said.

"We are blowing away the fog of anonymity," said Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Rules Committee. "The goal is to pull back the curtain on earmarks to the public."

DOJ_NMG_0063567

The rule change shelves a wider ethics bill, however, at least until next year. That bill became bogged down amid disagreements between the House and the Senate, and the reluctance of lawmakers from both parties to limit their interactions with lobbyists. The earmarks measure was brought up as a passable way to address voter unrest over the scandals, aides said.

"This bill represents the death of lobby reform," said Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), a former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

The Senate is working on its own change in earmarks rules, which its leaders also hope to approve in lieu of broad ethics legislation this year, top staffers said. The staffers added that subjecting earmarks to more sunshine will allow lawmakers to tell their constituents that they addressed their ethics concerns even though the broad overhaul bill failed.

The larger ethics effort began with fanfare in January, prompted by a series of congressional scandals that started with the guilty plea of former lobbyist Jack Abramoff on fraud and conspiracy charges.

The ethics bill faltered, however, after being gradually diluted, at least compared with the initial promises made by congressional leaders. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), for example, advanced a plan that would have prohibited lawmakers from accepting privately funded travel. But lawmakers rejected that provision along with many others that would have restricted lobbyists or would have done more than improve disclosure about lobbyists' encounters with Congress.

The House and the Senate did endorse separate lobbying-overhaul bills this spring, but efforts to reconcile them stalled over a disagreement about a House-passed provision that would restrict independent campaign organizations called 527s. Senate Democrats and a handful of Republicans refused to accept the provision, but the House insisted that it be included in the final bill.

Lawmakers from both parties and both chambers also lost their enthusiasm for the bill as lobbying groups pressured them to water down the legislation and voters remained silent about its diminishing prospects.

Democratic leaders complained about the earmarks change yesterday. Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.) called it "shameful" and "a sham." She said that the measure would not end the abuse of the earmarking process and was filled with loopholes that would still permit anonymous projects to be inserted into law without public scrutiny.

Obey called the measure a "trivial pursuit," saying it would do little to alter federal spending while blocking a serious updating of federal ethics laws. "The majority has labored long and produced a mouse," Obey added, "or a fig leaf at best."

Not all Republicans are fans of the proposal. The rule change was opposed by several Republican members of the House Appropriations Committee, who have said they resent that the change would affect them more than it would members of other committees. Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), the Appropriations Committee chairman, and some of his most senior Republican members voted no.

This defiance of GOP leaders came despite a letter written by Hastert and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) urging the appropriators to relent and to vote in favor of the earmarks change. The earmark bill, Boehner said on the House floor, will bring the process "out of the shadows."

House OKs Measure To Curb Pork Spending (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

Members of Congress wanting to secure taxpayer cash for pet projects back home would no longer be able to do it secretly under a measure passed by the House yesterday, a reform effort leaders hope will severely curtail a practice known as earmarking.

The election-year change to House rules passed 245-171, with many calling it a step in the right direction to ultimately curbing earmarking, also known as pork-barrel spending. Members also said it would shine more light on the process to prevent bribery scandals like those that rocked Washington in the past year.

"If you aren't willing to put your name on the project, you shouldn't expect the American people to pay for it," said Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican.

"We are blowing away the fog of anonymity so the public can have a clear picture of what the projects are, how much they cost and who is sponsoring them," agreed House Rules Chairman David Dreier, California Republican who authored the change.

Many yesterday evoked the $223 million "bridge to nowhere," nicknamed for a bridge in a sparsely populated area in Alaska. It was stripped from the highway-spending bill last year after its exposure prompted public outcry. That and other earmarks such as $90,000 for the Cowgirl Hall of Fame in Fort Worth, Texas, are examples of pork projects often tucked away in lengthy legislation. Before yesterday's change, the authors of such earmarks did not have to be disclosed.

Watchdog groups estimate the nearly 10,000 earmarks submitted this year cost taxpayers $29 billion.

Rep. Jeff Flake, one of the biggest critics of earmarking, called the bill a "little dose" of accountability and transparency, but said he doubts earmarking will cease.

DOJ_NMG_0063568

"You kind of have to have a third element, and that's shame, and we have too little of it here," the Arizona Republican said. "As long as you can stand up with a straight face and say, 'I just got an earmark for the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame,' then it's tough to say we're going to change anything with this bill."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, dismissed the earmarks bill as a "political gimmick to make it look as if something is happening."

The change to House rules would require all earmarks in a committee-passed bill to be clearly listed with the requesting member's name attached. The rule, which does not apply to the Senate, is subject to renewal when a new Congress is inaugurated in January.

Democrats said because the rule does not apply to "manager's amendments" that leaders usually push to the floor or to bills that bypass committee, the changes wouldn't prevent the "bridge to nowhere" or some of the more objectionable pork projects.

"This is a joke, it is a fraud ... it focuses on the minutiae instead of the big problems," said Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat.

Members of the House Appropriations Committee also opposed the change because they think it unfairly targets them.

Republican leaders boast a 37 percent decline in earmarks in the past year, but critics note earmarks have skyrocketed since the 2,000 approved in 1994 when Republicans took over.

"A smaller government is less susceptible to influence peddling and corruption, and as Republicans we should champion that cause," said Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, who ran for majority leader earlier this year on an earmark-reform platform.

Lawmakers yesterday also hailed the Wednesday passage of a bill creating a Web-accessible database of the billions awarded in government contracts and grants. President Bush has said he will sign the bill, and lawmakers said yesterday it is a good first step to let taxpayers see how their money is spent.

House Takes A Cautious Step On Ethics (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nine months after House Republican leaders pledged to enact sweeping ethics reform in the wake of a series of scandals, a divided House on Thursday approved what critics described as a modest change in the system that lets members slip special "earmarks" into spending bills.

Earmarking, the largely secret process by which powerful members of Congress insert spending provisions into legislation without going through the normal budget process, has been widely used to do favors for business and other interests in exchange for political support, especially campaign contributions. It has also been at the center of several scandals, including the case of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

On Thursday, the Republican-controlled chamber voted 245 to 171 to require that the authors of earmarks be identified in spending bills, a rule that proponents said would help curb the practice.

"We have seen a challenge here … and we've stepped up to the plate," said House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-San Dimas), who was tapped in January to help lead his party's push for what he said then would be "bold, strong reform initiatives."

Thursday's more limited measure was backed by 199 Republicans and 45 Democrats. Twenty-seven California representatives, including all but one Republican, supported the measure; 24 opposed it. Two did not vote.

After the vote, President Bush praised the bill, which he said would "shine a brighter light on earmarks."

But critics charged that the House bill left gaping holes. For one thing, it will not apply across the board to all legislation. Authors of some earmarks added to tax bills may still go unidentified. Indeed, Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the lone California Republican to vote against the bill, had said it unfairly singled out appropriations bills for the disclosure requirement.

Thursday's action also did not impose any new rules on the Senate, which still allows its members to insert spending provisions and tax breaks into legislation without identifying themselves.

And critics noted that the House vote did not advance broader ethics measures — such as limits on the free meals and travel that many members receive from lobbyists — that have been stalled in the House and Senate.

One reason adding greater transparency to the earmark process may not restrain the practice is that — though they have not been required to identify themselves in the past — many members have publicly boasted of the money they steered into their districts.

DOJ_NMG_0063569

In North Carolina, for example, where Republican Rep. Charles H. Taylor is locked in a tough reelection campaign, he is highlighting his position as a senior member of the Appropriations Committee and inviting voters to check a map on his campaign website to "see how many of your taxpayer dollars Congressman Taylor has returned to your county."

Because of the limited nature of the House action, reform advocates dismissed it as little more than window dressing.

"There are major problems with this earmark reform," said Stephen Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "It doesn't capture every earmark. It doesn't make it easier to strip wasteful earmarks. It won't reduce the number of earmarks."

"The earmark rules changes will not fool the American people into ignoring the irresponsible failure by the House to address the worst House corruption scandals in decades," said Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer, a longtime champion of ethics reform.

With less than two months before the November elections, House Republican leaders have been under increasing pressure to produce some kind of reform. They have also been under pressure from conservatives to rein in "pork barrel" spending.

Democrats have hammered Republicans all year over ethics, repeatedly accusing the majority of presiding over a "culture of corruption."

Republican promises of reform in January followed scandals involving Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the Rancho Santa Fe Republican who pleaded guilty last year to accepting bribes from defense contractors in return for steering their way federal projects worth millions of dollars.

Abramoff once referred to the Appropriations Committee as a "favor factory."

An investigation is also underway into ties between appropriations chairman Lewis and a lobbying firm whose clients have received millions of dollars in earmarks. Lewis has denied any wrongdoing, saying that earmarks he sought benefited his district.

Democrats have had to contend with their own scandals this year, with Reps. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.) both forced from committees amid allegations of wrongdoing.

In a sign of how closely action on Capitol Hill is tied to this year's battle for control of Congress, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who chairs the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, invoked his party's campaign call for a "new direction" in his floor speech opposing the bill.

2 Republicans In Senate Vow To Block F.D.A. Pick (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Two Republican senators have promised to block the nomination of Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, illustrating just how difficult filling the top job at the agency has become.

Senator David Vitter, Republican of Louisiana, said Thursday in an interview that the Bush administration must legalize imports of some prescription drugs before he would allow the nomination to proceed.

“It could be from Canada only, or for personal use only, or a pilot or limited program,” Mr. Vitter said. “But it has to be meaningful.”

Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, will block Dr. von Eschenbach’s nomination unless the F.D.A. takes steps to remove the abortion drug RU-486 from the market, said Wesley M. Denton, Mr. DeMint’s press secretary.

“Senator DeMint believes that a qualified F.D.A. nominee would publicly discourage RU-486’s use and take immediate steps to remove it from the market,” he said. “We’ve reached a breaking point here, and the senator’s not going to budge until they wake up over at F.D.A.”

The F.D.A. is unlikely to make any substantive moves in the coming weeks to fulfill either senator’s condition, imperiling the nomination of Dr. von Eschenbach, the acting commissioner. Mr. Vitter predicted that the nomination would not be acted upon this year.

“We’re running out of time,” Mr. Vitter said.

Susan Bro, a senior communications adviser at the F.D. A., said, “We’re certain both the Senate and F.D.A. are in mutual agreement that what’s critical to ensuring the best interest of all Americans is permanent leadership at the F.D.A.” She said the agency looked forward to seeing the nominee confirmed.

For the past year, a vote on Dr. von Eschenbach’s nomination has been stymied by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, and Patty Murray, Democrat of Washington State, who insisted that the F.D.A. must make a decision on a three-year-old application to allow over-the-counter sales of Plan B, an emergency contraceptive.

The Democratic senators’ objections were so firm that Senator Michael B. Enzi, Republican of Wyoming, the chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, refused even to schedule a committee vote on the nomination until it was resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0063570

After prodding from Dr. von Eschenbach, the F.D.A. approved the Plan B application last month.

Mr. Enzi then scheduled a vote on the nomination for next Wednesday. The committee was widely expected to vote to send the nomination to the full Senate. But after the committee votes, any senator can issue a "hold" that blocks the Senate from considering a nomination approved by committee.

So little time is left before Congress adjourns that any holds, even brief ones, could scuttle Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination until next year. President Bush could renominate Dr. von Eschenbach next year, or he could decide to give him a recess appointment.

Recess appointments tend to generate ill will in Congress and may undermine authority within the agency, said Paul Quinn, a Washington lawyer.

If President Bush were to make a recess appointment this year, he would have to reappoint Dr. von Eschenbach next year. Either way, Dr. von Eschenbach could continue to lead the agency in the interim.

Drug companies and others who have business before the F.D.A. generally prefer that the agency have a confirmed commissioner because they say that acting leaders do not have the power to make difficult but needed decisions and changes.

Uncertain leadership can also affect employee morale, Mr. Quinn said.

The job of F.D.A. commissioner has been subject to Senate confirmation since only the 1990's, and it has become increasingly difficult to get the Senate to agree on a candidate.

The Bush administration has had a confirmed F.D.A. commissioner for less than two of nearly six years in office.

"The job is important enough that it should be subject to Senate confirmation, but unfortunately it's become so politicized that it's become a hard job to fill," said Dan Troy, a former F.D.A. general counsel. "You can and are attacked by both sides of the political spectrum."

Government Recovers Stolen Computer (AP-Y)

AP, September 14, 2006

The government said Thursday it had recovered a Veterans Affairs Department subcontractor's lost desktop computer containing personal data for 16,000 veterans.

The FBI and Veterans Affairs Office of Inspector General said Khalil Abdullah-Raheem was charged Wednesday on theft charges after the Unisys Corp. computer went missing in July.

The computer, which was taken from Unisys' offices in Reston, Va., contained personal data for veterans who received care at VA medical centers in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh.

Abdullah-Raheem, 21, of Washington, was employed by a company that provides temporary labor to Unisys. Investigators believe he did not target the data, and forensics experts were determining if the VA data had been compromised.

VA Secretary Jim Nicholson on Thursday praised investigators' work in locating the missing computer.

___

On the Net:

Department of Veterans Affairs: http://www.va.gov/

Paulson Positions Treasury As Policy Quarterback (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Two months into his new job, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is moving to restore clout and stature to the department, tapping top-level experts to fill senior positions, seeking alliances with influential White House officials and insisting on holding key meetings at the Treasury Building.

Mr. Paulson is trying to put into practice assurances he received from the White House before agreeing to take the secretary job -- that he would be the president's main driver of economic policy. Since coming to Washington, Mr. Paulson has held daily phone calls with the influential Allan Hubbard, chairman of the White House National Economic Council and a longtime friend of President Bush, and invited Mr. Hubbard to accompany him to China next week. He also talks frequently with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, hosts cabinet-level economic meetings at Treasury and is trying to reach out regularly to brief both Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill on Treasury happenings.

Mr. Paulson has been keeping longer hours than many in the government are accustomed to and is expecting his staff to do the same. Each day at 8:15 a.m., he and Deputy Secretary Robert Kimmitt, hold senior staff meetings. Mr. Paulson often invites staff to his house for weekend meetings. His first speechwriter, Matt Rees, has announced he is leaving to spend more time with his family.

DOJ_NMG_0063571

Whether Mr. Paulson's efforts succeed -- and help him shape economic policy -- remains to be seen. No major policy initiatives are expected before the 2006 midterm elections. Future efforts could depend on who controls Congress after November.

But Mr. Paulson already commands high-level audiences, in good part because of his previous life as the chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. During his first official trip to China next week, he is expected to meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao and other senior Chinese officials.

While in Asia he will also hold private meetings to discuss Iran and terrorism financing, along with Stuart Levey, Treasury's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

So far, much of Mr. Paulson's efforts to bolster Treasury have been aimed at bringing in key staff from outside. Yesterday, the day after he gave a speech on the international economy, his choice for the top communications spot, Michele A. Davis, was endorsed by President Bush. Ms. Davis played a similar role during the tumultuous tenure of Mr. Bush's first Treasury Secretary, Paul O'Neill, and is expected to serve as a senior strategist under Mr. Paulson.

He also has tapped former Goldman Sachs vice chairman Robert Steel for the top domestic-finance post -- his Senate confirmation hearing could be as early as next week -- and is hiring China expert Deborah Lehr, of consulting firm Stonebridge International, as a senior adviser. Jim Wilkinson, a former senior adviser to Ms. Rice, is Mr. Paulson's chief of staff and another former State Department aide, Taiya Smith, is now deputy chief of staff.

Proposal Would Make Retirement Benefits A Factor In Bidding (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

The Bush administration continues to have a hard time selling its plan to turn more federal work over to the private sector.

In a move that has roiled federal contractors, the Senate has proposed making retirement benefits a factor when the Defense Department puts certain federal jobs up for bid.

The proposal would prevent contractors from obtaining an advantage if they provided less generous retirement benefits than the government does to its employees. Contractors said that would drive up the cost of bids by 24 percent.

This comes two years after Congress stipulated that private-sector bids include an amount for employee health benefits at least equal to the amount paid by agencies. Contractor associations said that drove up the cost of bids by 5.5 percent.

Federal unions, especially the American Federation of Government Employees, have lobbied Congress to curb job competitions with the private sector, contending that they lower morale in the workplace and often do not deliver the promised budget savings.

Contractor associations argue that the Senate's move, if agreed to by the House, would stop the Defense Department from trying to outsource work through a process set up by the Office of Management and Budget as part of President Bush's federal management agenda. That effort -- competitive sourcing -- is also known as A-76, after the name of the OMB directive that lays out the rules for the competitions.

Contractors find the health-care comparison and the proposed retirement benefit comparison especially onerous because the standard rules used in competitions require the contractor to save the government $10 million or 10 percent of agency personnel costs (whichever is less) or the work will be retained within the agency.

Although many agencies conduct studies to see whether federal work can be turned over to the private sector, the Defense Department has been the most active over the years in contracting out and has drawn the most attention from unions. The agency said in 2004 that job competitions that year were on track to produce about $740 million in savings.

Under the job competitions, agencies try to determine if the government's commercial work can be done more efficiently by a contractor. For decades, the government has followed a policy of buying goods and services in the marketplace rather than setting up operations that compete with business.

Where that line gets drawn, however, can be difficult. For example, Congress has debated whether airport passenger screening, collection of delinquent taxes and air traffic control operations should be performed by government employees or by contractors.

Projected cost savings are a key factor in job competitions, prompting congressional supporters of federal employees to back legislation, usually as a part of spending bills, aimed at creating what they call a level playing field.

Stan Soloway , president of the Professional Services Council, an industry group, called the Senate proposal "sound-bite legislation" aimed at discouraging the Pentagon from conducting job competitions. "The intent here is to put that nail in the coffin," Soloway said.

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) proposed the amendment to make retirement benefits a factor in contracting out decisions. Their provision was accepted on a voice vote shortly after Congress returned from the Labor

DOJ_NMG_0063572

Day recess. The fate of the provision will be decided by congressional negotiators later this year because the House did not include a similar provision in its Defense appropriations bill for fiscal 2007.

In introducing the amendment, Kennedy said more than 10,000 civil service employees at the Defense Department could be "at risk of unfair termination" through competitive sourcing. "This skewed privatization policy is fundamentally unfair to federal workers who lose contracts simply because they receive decent benefits," he said.Talk Shows

Michael Johnson , founder of Brightline Compliance and a former Justice Department lawyer, will be the guest on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Lisa Schlosser , chief information officer at the Housing and Urban Development Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Lawmakers Seek To Loosen Up Banking Proposal (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers and banking executives Thursday pushed federal regulators to relax proposed tougher standards for commercial real estate lending, saying they could hurt community banks and the overall economy.

“I understand there is an increase in lending, but by your own figures there is no increase in risky lending,” Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass, said at a House Financial Services subcommittee hearing.

Frank said the standards could force banks to pull back on lending to revitalize downtown areas or build affordable, multifamily housing. While Frank is a Democrat, there was bipartisan concern.

Regulators, including the Federal Reserve and Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., generally defended their proposals. But John Reich, director of the Office of Thrift Supervision, said the guidance may go too far in some areas.

Other regulators said midsize banks are now carrying a higher concentration of commercial real estate loans on their books than during the boom years of the 1980s, when a number went bust.

“Although circumstances are different today … we know from the painful experience of just 20 years ago that commercial real estate lending has a real potential to fail banks,” said John Dugan, comptroller of the currency.

Congress has not intervened on the legislative side, but lawmakers made it clear they want changes before a final version of the standards is issued. Regulators have gotten more than 1,000 letters since the proposal was unveiled in January.

The proposed standards generally call for bank examiners to perform a more strenuous appraisal of banks' commercial real estate loan portfolios when the concentration of such loans reaches certain thresholds. Banks could be required to make management changes and increase capital reserves. Commercial real estate is defined as housing as well as office buildings, malls and other commercial-type structures.

While regulators say the thresholds are merely guidelines, lenders and lawmakers feared they would turn into caps on lending. Community banks, which can't compete with big national banks in many areas, depend on real estate loans.

Banks said the proposal was overly broad, expensive to implement and that housing should not be lumped in with other real estate.

“The proposed guidance is seriously flawed and we have strongly urged the banking agencies not to go forward … in its current form,” said James McKillop, CEO of the Independent Bankers' Bank of Florida.

Fed Gov. Susan Schmidt Bies testified that banks may be doing a good job evaluating individual loans, but better portfolio management is needed. Carefully run banks can be hurt if other lenders are allowed to make bad loans, depressing real estate prices, she said.

Laura Bush Aiding Clinton Conference (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, September 15, 2006

Another member of the Bush family is getting cozy with former President Clinton. First lady Laura Bush joins the former president as a keynote speaker opening his three-day Clinton Global Initiative in New York next week.

Clinton has famously formed a close friendship with the current president's dad. Clinton has been a repeat guest at the Kennebunkport, Maine, home of George H.W. Bush and his wife, Barbara.

Clinton also sparked curiosity when he was spotted at the White House last month. It turns out that he and the current president were having lunch, something White House aides said they do occasionally.

Now, aware of Laura Bush's involvement in issues that his foundation addresses, Clinton called several months ago to solicit her participation in the conference, said Anita McBride, her chief of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0063573

Laura Bush agreed, hoping to tell people about the good that their tax dollars are doing and to persuade other nations of the United States' good intentions.

"We've got a good story to tell. We've got something to say," McBride said. "We've got something to show that we are not only as Americans a compassionate and generous country and she wants Americans to know that they're making a difference."

This year's Clinton Global Initiative is a follow-up to the 2005 event that brought $2.5 billion in pledges to help solve challenges such as the HIV infection in Africa.

The first lady's speech next Wednesday will cover topics such as literacy and education, AIDS and women's rights that she has highlighted in her travels. They include 11 solo trips to 27 countries in the nearly six years of her husband's presidency.

She also is bringing a pledge of her own: the announcement of a partnership between the Bush administration and an American foundation to help provide clean drinking water in Africa — a key component to improving health on the poverty-stricken continent.

McBride would say only that the project involves providing water-cleansing equipment for some of sub-Saharan Africa's most problem-ridden areas. She would not disclose details such as the dollar amount or the foundation partner.

While accompanying her husband to New York for the U.N. General Assembly next week, Laura Bush is hosting her own conference, on global literacy. She is the United Nations' honorary ambassador for the Decade of Literacy.

In addition, the first lady is doing her part to promote the administration's agenda on Myanmar.

She is holding a discussion with U.S., U.N. and nongovernmental organization representatives on the situation in the Southeast Asian nation that the administration has criticized for its repressive policies and detention of a pro-democracy leader, Aung San Suu Kyi.

The country, also known as Burma, is known for violence against the ethnic Karen minority and a growing refugee problem.

U.S. officials, pessimistic about the prospects for Security Council action against Myanmar's military junta, hope Laura Bush's involvement can help.

Democrats Meander In A New New Direction (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, the woman who will become speaker of the House if Democrats get lucky in November, began her weekly news conference yesterday holding up a red-white-and-blue brochure.

"I hope you all received 'A New Direction for America,' " she said, standing at a lectern that bore the same slogan. She called the manifesto "a compilation of many of the initiatives taken by our House Democratic Caucus that encompasses our new direction for all Americans."

It was a handsome booklet, full of homey photographs and popular proposals, but there was a problem. Democrats have had more "New Directions" recently than MapQuest.

Among the party's campaign slogans this year: "Culture of Corruption," "Culture of Cronyism," "Do-Nothing Congress," "Rubber-Stamp Congress," "Together, We Can Do Better," "Together, America Can Do Better" and, most recently, "Six for '06."

For those keeping score at home, Democrats arrived at "New Direction" yesterday by downgrading one of the "Six for '06" issues (health care) and upgrading three others (honesty, civility and fiscal discipline), for a total of eight items on the contents page.

By contrast, Republicans have settled on a single, unofficial slogan, which essentially says: Vote Democrat and Die. And in politics, scary and scurrilous usually trumps elaborate and earnest -- something Pelosi has experienced firsthand in recent days.

The California Democrat has been the focus of the GOP attack since her remark last week that capturing Osama bin Laden wouldn't make us safer. It was similar to sentiments uttered previously by President Bush ("He's not the issue") and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld ("If he were gone tomorrow, the same problem would exist"). But it set off a flurry of Benedict Arnold charges from Republicans directed at Pelosi and her colleagues.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) wondered whether Democrats are "more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people." Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) stood next to a poster of Pelosi and her words about bin Laden and demanded: "Where do your loyalties lie?" House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said Democrats "are confused about who the enemy actually is."

Pelosi, sitting on the sofa in her Capitol office yesterday, took the treason talk in stride. "I've been a traitor for five years," she quipped, pointing out that Republicans said much the same thing when she proposed a 9/11 commission. By now, she added, Democrats have neutralized the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0063574

That's mostly true. Polls show a shrunken GOP advantage on terrorism. But the Republican attacks have shifted the debate to the one issue that benefits them -- as Pelosi witnessed in her news conference yesterday morning.

Her opening statement covered a full range of Democratic issues: fiscal responsibility. The minimum wage. The trade deficit. Student loans. Health care. Energy independence. Social Security. Medicare.

Then came the questions. "This is now the third election in a row in which they've raised security issues just before the election," the first questioner said of the Republicans. "Why won't it work for them a third time?"

"We won't be Swift-boated on the national security issue," the minority leader maintained.

"As you know," came the follow-up, Republicans "are citing past votes by you and other Democrats."

Pelosi was defensive. "I have five children," she said. "Five grandchildren, going on six. And I consider myself the ultimate security mom." By way of clarification, she felt compelled to add: "Democrats are committed to hunting down Osama bin Laden."

A third questioner pointed out that Republicans have regained the lead on national security. "This is what, I guess, campaigns will be about," Pelosi conceded with some reluctance. "It shouldn't be about national security."

It's not clear what more Pelosi could do to shift the debate back to friendly terrain. Ninety minutes after her "New Direction" news conference, she was in a teleconference with reporters to talk about Social Security. "We have serious concerns about the safety and security of Social Security," she warned.

But the journalists weren't nibbling; of the 15 people on the call, only one asked a question.

At about the time Pelosi was unveiling the "New Direction" brochures, Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) was out on the Senate floor, accusing Democrats of aiding the terrorists. "Al-Qaeda," he said, sees "the lack of resolve in some of our leaders, and they seek to exploit it."

The charge enraged Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), who had come to the floor to talk about education.

"America is not tired of fighting terrorism," she retorted. "America is tired of the wrongheaded and boneheaded leadership of the Republican Party that has sent $6.5 billion a month to Iraq when the front line was Afghanistan and Saudi Arabia, that led this country to attack Saddam Hussein when we were attacked by Osama bin Laden."

She continued: "And Americans are most certainly tired of leadership that, despite documented mistake after mistake after mistake . . . never admit that they ever do anything wrong."

It was angry and raw. But it was a new direction.

Costs Will Outstrip Savings (USAT)

By Shannon Benton

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Next year, for the first time, Medicare Part B premiums will be “means tested,” or based on income. Some proponents claim this will save the government money and perhaps even the ailing Medicare system itself.

Though their arguments might seem credible, they lack foresight. According to the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office, means testing will cut barely three-tenths of 1% from Medicare's total budget over the next 10 years.

But it will cost much more than it saves.

As healthier and wealthier seniors see their monthly premiums rise — in some cases from $88.50 today to, by our estimate, as much as $395 by 2009 for the top bracket — many are expected to abandon Medicare for private insurance. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services estimates that as many as 30,000 seniors will drop Part B in the next three years. That number will likely grow exponentially in future years.

Left behind will be the poorest and sickest — and most expensive to treat — who will be forced to pay higher premiums and deductibles, something they cannot afford. Worse, they might find themselves without a viable health coverage system, exactly what Medicare was created to prevent.

No law prevents Congress from redefining “wealthy,” now starting at $80,000 a year for individuals. With looming deficits, there is already talk in Congress about lowering the threshold to $60,000. Next could be $40,000.

Finally, the argument that CEOs should pay more than blue-collar workers is a red herring. The wealthy have been paying more all along. Workers and their employers pay a tax of $2.90 on every $100 they earn into the Medicare trust fund. So, a senior earning $200,000 contributes $5,800 into the fund annually, five times the $1,160 a senior making $40,000 annually contributes.

The most vulnerable members of our society — the poorest and sickest seniors, whose numbers are in the millions — should be protected. Means testing might inadvertently lead to poorer health care and increased expenses for those least able to afford the consequences of this costly mistake.

Shannon Benton is executive director of the Senior Citizens League, an advocacy group based in Alexandria, Va.

DOJ_NMG_0063575

Sinking Secret Holds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Americans are rightly proud of their transparent government, one in which almost everything save vital national security information is open to scrutiny. So all credit to a group of Senators who have launched a campaign to get rid of one of the last bastions of government unaccountability, namely the Senate tradition of "secret" holds.

Republicans Chuck Grassley and Trent Lott and Democrats Ron Wyden and Chris Dodd this week announced their intention to force some of their more cloak-and-dagger colleagues to agree to legislation to eliminate secret holds. This practice -- which allows any Senator to block a nominee or legislation without revealing his or her identity -- has been around since at least the 1960s, though it has become a greater source of political harm with each passing year.

The most common Senate holds in recent years have been placed on presidential nominees, usually with the aim of winning some parochial policy battle. A few of the Bush appointees who have been held hostage (some with secret holds, some with open holds and some by members of the President's own party) include former U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman, former FDA Commissioner Lester Crawford, EPA head Stephen Johnson, and Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England. All were ultimately confirmed, though only after endless guessing games and delays.

Left hanging is the President, who is unable to have his appointees get on with the actual job of running the government. The holds don't help the credibility of the Senate, either, since many are used precisely so that Senators don't have to go public and acknowledge opposition to a piece of legislation. Ask Ted Stevens, who this summer put a secret hold on a bill to promote more transparency in public spending -- thus making it harder for Mr. Stevens to haul pork back home to Alaska. More often than not, secret holds are levied at the behest of outside special interest groups, the public never the wiser.

The four reformers are now pushing an amendment that would require any Senator who places a hold to make it public within three days. As Senator Grassley said yesterday, this is the right thing to do not only because a hold is "the public's business," but because "if you're a member of the Senate you ought to be man or woman enough to stand up and say what you're for and against, and why." Americans should expect nothing less.

OTHER NEWS:

US Retail Sales Post Unexpected Rise (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

US retail sales unexpectedly grew in August, as sales of automobiles were better than feared and lower petrol prices encouraged consumers to spend.

Economists had expected sales to fall by 0.1 per cent month-on-month, but in fact they rose by 0.2 per cent, after 1.4 per cent jump in July, a report from the Commerce Department said.

Observers were generally upbeat about the figures. “Consumers are sort of trucking along, although there is gradual slowdown under way,” said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics.

The sales data, combined with reports that jobless claims had fallen and business inventories are growing more slowly, suggest that the anticipated economic slowdown will be more modest than some fear, Action Economics said.

Automobiles and parts sales were largely responsible for the positive retail numbers, posting a small 0.4 per cent rise, rather than slipping sharply as had been expected.

Outside of automobile sales, however, the picture was murkier, as sales rose 0.2 per cent, slightly less than the 0.3 per cent analysts predicted, while July and June figures for non-auto sales were revised down. Clothing sales, furniture and electronic goods all fell.

Some were sceptical of the numbers after earlier reports showed that vehicle sales slowed in August.

“The headline is flattered by an inexplicable 0.4 per cent increase in auto sales, which cannot be squared with the 6.3 per cent drop in unit sales reported by the automakers,” said Ian Shepherdson, chief US economist with High Frequency Economics. “Expect a downward revision.”

But the figures do offer some comfort to the economy, which has been showing signs of strain particularly in the housing market.

“If the consumer keeps spending and the savings rate stays low, it’s going to be hard for the economy to slow much,” said Mr Englund.

Sales of petrol at gasoline outlets fell by 1 per cent from July, when oil prices reached a record high, keeping extra cash in consumers’ pockets.

DOJ_NMG_0063576

Falling gas prices may provide an explanation for the resilient levels of spending and a clue to the economy's outlook.

"Over the last month, gasoline prices have fallen ... significantly below September 2005 levels," said Peter Morici of the University of Maryland School of Business. "If sustained, lower gas prices will free up enough disposable income to ... give the economy a needed jolt."

Yields on benchmark 10 year treasurys rose before the data's release, before falling back.

Retail-Sales Growth Eases To 0.2% (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

American consumers tempered their shopping in August as the price of gasoline peaked at more than $3 a gallon, but a subsequent easing in fuel prices has led some economists to expect a rebound in coming months.

Sales at stores and food establishments in August rose 0.2% from July, after jumping 1.4% in July from June, the Commerce Department said. Excluding auto dealers -- whose sales in dollar terms rose slightly even though they sold fewer vehicles -- the August increase was also 0.2%, slightly below economists' expectations.

Further excluding gasoline stations, where a sharp price decline from the early August peak precipitated a drop in the dollar value of sales, retail sales rose 0.4%.

The August report contrasted with July's surprisingly strong data, which had cast doubt on the idea that slowing consumer spending would cool the economy and relieve inflationary pressures. "This shows that the July surge was not a true indication of what is happening," said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at consulting firm MFR Inc. "The consumer has ratcheted back."

The moderate pace of August sales could suggest that, aside from the effect of the summer spike in gasoline prices, a sagging housing market has begun to take a toll on consumers by reducing their ability to extract cash from their homes.

Spending at building-material and garden stores, which tends to track housing-market activity, rose a meager 0.1% in August. July's increase, initially reported at 1.8%, was revised down to 0.3%.

Sales at electronics and appliance stores rose 0.1% in August. Furniture and home-furnishings sales fell 0.3%. Clothing fell 0.3%.

Still, consumer spending overall remains on the rise, and some economists see grounds for a resurgence. Taken together, the retail-sales figures for July and August are consistent with inflation-adjusted consumer-spending growth of about 3.5% in the third quarter, up from 2.6% in the second quarter. Beyond that, gasoline prices have already fallen about 40 cents a gallon from their August peak.

Each one-cent decline in the price of gasoline, if sustained for a year, frees up about $1 billion in extra spending money -- a direct boost to disposable income that could provide a powerful offset to declines in housing wealth.

"I think sales could come ripping right back," said Brian Jones, senior economist at Citigroup Inc. "Any talk about us having a soft holiday season is way premature."

Much of the benefit of lower gasoline prices would go to lower-income consumers, for whom gasoline bills make up a larger share of total spending. That, said Ira Kalish, director of consumer business at Deloitte Research, could bring about a shift in consumer behavior: While falling house prices could make more-affluent consumers turn frugal, relief on the gasoline-price front could open up the wallets of the poorer majority.

"It's bad for the department-store industry, it's bad for the home-related retailers, but it could be good for discounters," said Mr. Kalish.

Separately, the Labor Department said jobless claims fell in the week ended Sept. 9, putting the four-week average at 314,250. The Labor Department also reported that import prices rose 0.8% in August from July. Excluding a jump in the price of imported fuels, import prices were up 0.2%.

Retail Sales Take Wind Out Of Stocks' Sails (USAT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

USA Today, September 15, 2006

Stocks snapped a four-day rally Thursday after the government said retail sales excluding autos rose less than economists forecast and an increase in import prices revived inflation concern.

ExxonMobil, the largest publicly traded oil producer, lost 65 cents to $64.71 and led energy shares lower as oil fell 75 cents to $63.22 a barrel. A 0.8% rise in import prices in August caused speculation that today's consumer prices report will show that inflation remains a threat.

DOJ_NMG_0063577

"The market is counting on a fairly precise path: growth that is not (so) strong (as) to be inflationary, but not so weak (as) to cause earnings misses," says Vadim Zlotnikov, chief equity strategist at Sanford C. Bernstein. "That could happen, but it's a low probability."

The Standard & Poor's 500 index dropped 1.79 points, or 0.1%, to 1316.28. The Dow Jones industrial average lost 15.93 points, or 0.1%, to 11,527.39. The Nasdaq composite index rose 1.06 points, or 0.1%, to 2228.73.

Stocks have risen this month: The S&P is up 1% and the Dow on Wednesday came within 180 points of a new high. Falling oil and signs that the Fed will keep interest rates unchanged drove the advance. The drop in commodity prices helped eclipse concern a housing slump will curb consumer spending.

Retail sales rose 0.2% in August, the Commerce Department said (story, 8B). Sales excluding automobiles were up 0.2%. Economists in a Bloomberg News survey forecast a 0.3% increase. The rise in import prices was led by increases in oil, natural gas and metals. Economists had forecast a 0.3% gain. Excluding oil, prices advanced 0.5%.

The data helped reignite concern that inflation may pick up, leading the Fed to resume raising borrowing costs after pausing at its last meeting on Aug. 8. Policymakers next meet on Wednesday. Futures contracts that allow investors to bet on the direction of interest rates signaled a 22% chance the Fed will boost its benchmark rate to 5.5% by year's end. The futures showed 19% Wednesday.

Today, the Labor Department will likely say consumer prices rose 0.2% in August excluding food and energy, a Bloomberg survey of economists shows. That would be half of July's pace.

"If (the) data show that inflation is not tamed and the economy isn't growing as investors hoped and we're in a stagflation environment, the markets will turn lower," says Peter Boockvar, equity strategist at Miller Tabak & Co.

Wall Street Dips On Fears Over Inflation (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

US stocks dipped slightly on Thursday after retail sales data rekindled inflationary fears and pulled the main indices away from four-month highs.

Commodities also resumed their slide, with oil, copper and gold all slipping after a minor rally on Wednesday.

The 10 worst performing stocks in the S&P 500 were all oil or mining groups.

Hess sank 2.6 per cent to $40.30 and oil services group BJ Services slid 4.2 per cent to $30.48. Gold miner Newmont Mining fell 3.5 per cent to $44.14, while copper producer Freeport McMoran slumped 4.3 per cent to $52.00.

Microsoft announced that its Zune digital music player – a rival to Apple's iPod – would be available for purchase at Christmas, which helped push its shares up 1.4 per cent to $26.33.

Sovereign Bancorp jumped 3.2 per cent to $21.21 after the company's chief executive said at a conference that he expected to sell the bank.

At the close, the S&P 500 was down 0.1 per cent, or 1.79 points, at 1,316.28, while the Nasdaq Composite was flat, up 1.06 points, at 2,228.73. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was 0.1 per cent, or 15.93 points, lower at 11,527.39.

Stocks turned lower after the latest economic data from the Commerce Department. Retail sales unexpectedly rose 0.2 per cent in August, compared with most analysts' expectation of a 0.1 per cent decline in sales.

Hugh Johnson, chairman and chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors, said the retail sales news was still not enough to change investors' mindsets.

"Today, I don't think we had news that was surprising enough to get the fence-sitters off the fence," he said. "That big question of whether we are heading towards a hard or soft landing is still very much unanswered. What is needed is news that is going to get investors committed to the bull case or the bear case."

Bear Stearns beat analyst expectations when it reported a 16 per cent rise in quarterly earnings.

Its shares rose 2.5 per cent to $139.68. Bear Stearns is the third investment bank this week – after Goldman Sachs and Lehman Brothers to report better-than-expected results.

Defence and aerospacegroup General Dynamics rose 2.4 per cent to $70.88, after it said it would increase aircraft production by 15 per cent next year due to rising international orders.

The lower fuel costs were a boon to industrial chemical makers, and DuPont gained 2.3 per cent to $41.43.

Genzyme gained 2.7 per cent to $68.35 after it said interim results from a drug trial showed that its multiple sclerosis drug performed better than Serono's Rebif.

XM Satellite Radio leapt 9.4 per cent to $13.69 after Credit Suisse raised its rating on the stock from "neutral" to "outperform".

Shares in chipmaker Xilinx fell 4 per cent to $22.41.

DOJ_NMG_0063578

Stocks Slip As Natural Gas Hits Two-Year Low (WSJ)

By Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

Stocks took a breather after a four-day winning streak, as oil prices fell again and investors digested data showing higher-than-expected growth in consumer spending and import prices.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average slipped 15.93 points, or 0.14%, to 11527.39. It is up 7.6% from the start of the year, and 196 points short of its record close of 11722.98 in January 2000.

Crude-oil futures rose early on, then fell in tandem with natural gas, which slid to a two-year low on reports of strong inventories. The October contract for natural gas plunged 10.2%, or 56 cents, to $4.89 per million British Thermal Units. That's down 68% from the closing high of $15.38 in December 2005.

Crude futures slipped 75 cents to $63.22 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.14%, or 1.79 points, to 1316.28, while the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index inched 1.06 points higher to 2228.73. Small stocks declined, with the Russell 2000 index falling 0.42% to 727.60.

The Commerce Department said retail sales grew 0.2% on a seasonally adjusted basis in August, mainly because of increased auto sales. Economists had forecast a decline of 0.2%. Import prices, meanwhile, rose 0.8% in August, exceeding expectations of a 0.2% rise.

Analysts said there were concerns that the stronger-than-expected data might affect the Federal Reserve's views on interest rates, which it has left unchanged since June.

"There's still a debate as to whether the Fed is done, especially if we are not seeing a real slowdown," says Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. "The important numbers are still suggesting some inflation."

Bond yields edged up, pushing prices down, as investors awaited today's reading on another key measure of inflation, the Consumer Price Index.

Brokerage stocks extended their gains after Bear Stearns followed Goldman Sachs Group and Lehman Brothers Holdings by beating estimates for its quarterly earnings. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Bear Stearns shares were up $3.46, or 2.5%, at $139.68.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. On the Big Board, where 2.343 billion shares traded, 1,325 stocks rose and 1,952 fell.

Bonds fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 7/32, or $2.19 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.795%. The 30-year bond fell 10/32 to yield 4.918%.

The dollar weakened. Late in New York, it traded at 117.52 yen, down from 117.58, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2730 from $1.2697.

Some Lawyers Ranked 'Super' Are Not The Least Bit Flattered (NYT)

By Karen Donovan

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Word of mouth is one crucial marketing tool for a lawyer. Getting your name on a list of top lawyers can be another, unless the list is distributed to consumers in New Jersey.

In an opinion that has set off a nationwide discussion, an ethics committee appointed by the New Jersey Supreme Court concluded this summer that a magazine advertising supplement listing the state's top lawyers violated rules of professional conduct.

The focus of the opinion by the Committee on Attorney Advertising was an insert to New Jersey Monthly magazine called New Jersey Super Lawyers, which listed the top 5 percent of the state's lawyers (1,658 of 35,441) and then offered an opportunity to advertise.

The panel questioned the process used to compile the list, but it was also clearly troubled that the supplement was "designed for mass consumption" by New Jersey residents who may have been misled by what they read.

"These self-aggrandizing titles have the potential to lead an unwary consumer to believe that the lawyers so described are, by virtue of the manufactured title, superior to their colleagues who practice in the same area of law," the committee wrote of New Jersey Super Lawyers.

With that, New Jersey became the latest battleground in the long debate over how far lawyers can go to promote themselves. The New Jersey situation offers a snapshot of an issue that has divided lawyers since a 1977 United States Supreme Court ruling that allowed advertising. In this case, the concern is not so much the list as who reads it.

DOJ_NMG_0063579

"It's a question of whether the kind of puffing and self-promotion that is everyday fare in mass advertising is absolutely forbidden for lawyers," said Rodney Smolla, dean of the University of Richmond School of Law. "The counterargument is that American consumers are very sophisticated and don't need this kind of protectionism from the government."

This spring, Mr. Smolla represented two personal-injury lawyers from Fort Lauderdale, Fla., who had appealed to the Supreme Court after being disciplined by the Florida bar for running a TV commercial urging accident victims to call 1-800-PIT-BULL; the ad featured the firm's logo — the head of a pit bull with a spiked collar. Justices rejected the petition.

Super Lawyers is not alone in offering lists said to include the top practitioners in an area of law. But unlike most of its rivals, which send their lists to law firms or corporations, Super Lawyers distributes its lists through supplements to mass media publications.

In its opinion, the ethics panel pointed out, for example, that ratings of lawyers in the Martindale-Hubbell legal directory are directed at other lawyers and are "likely to have minimal recognition to the public."

While consumers are bombarded by ads from lawyers seeking clients for an endless list of possibilities, most complaints about the practice come from lawyers; the New Jersey case was no exception. In a letter to the ethics committee, Lloyd Levenson, who was selected as a New Jersey Super Lawyer in 2005, wrote that he was offended when the company told him of his selection and then informed him he could buy a full-page ad for up to $15,000.

"What the general public takes from that," Mr. Levenson said in an interview, "is that the people who have paid grand sums of money to buy full pages are somehow better than those who are named in the back pages who refused to shell out the dough. And furthermore, if you don't make the small print, you are not worth hiring at all."

William White, publisher of Law & Politics, which prints Super Lawyers, disagreed. "It's pretty clear," he said, that the profiles in the supplement are advertising because the contact information and logos of the law firms are included.

Editions of Super Lawyers appear in 21 states. Law & Politics, based in Minneapolis, is a division of Key Professional Media.

New Jersey is the first state to raise questions about its distribution. Its opinion came out as Super Lawyers: Manhattan Edition arrived in a glossy advertising supplement distributed with The New York Times on July 18.

Such lists have become so numerous that American Lawyer Media, a large legal publisher, offers Web conferences to coach law firms and their marketing staffs on how to manage them.

Large corporate firms view "Chambers USA,'' published by Chambers & Partners of London and distributed to 30,000 companies, as the gold standard.

The doyenne is "The Best Lawyers in America,'' a book distributed to law firms since 1981 to assist them in finding lawyers in distant locales. "Best Lawyers'' chooses its lists mainly by the voting of lawyers chosen in previous editions.

The New Jersey ethics committee faulted "Best Lawyers" in a passing reference for "trending towards" the Super Lawyers business plan. The publisher of Best Lawyers, Steven Naifeh, said his company had distributed its lists free to local publications, including New Jersey Monthly magazine, for many years.

In a footnote, the New Jersey committee also faulted the selection method used by Super Lawyers, calling it unclear, arbitrary and "lacking in empirical" or legally sanctioned support for the results.

Mr. White said the ethics committee never asked about the selection methods.

In New Jersey, the company sent ballots to 30,000 lawyers. To participate, Mr. White said, a lawyer must have practiced for five years or more. The company received responses from 4.8 percent of the ballots in New Jersey and 2.1 percent in Manhattan. After the balloting, Mr. White said, the company's research and a review by a panel produces the final list.

Super Lawyers is challenging the ethics committee's decision at the New Jersey Supreme Court, which granted a stay of the ruling during the appeal.

Across the river in New York, proposed changes would make it illegal for a lawyer to use a "nickname, moniker, motto or trade name that implies an ability to obtain results." Comments on the changes are due today. If the changes go into effect, they would clip the capes of Manhattan's Super Lawyers.

For now, the list continues.

"It's not an exclusive list, I can tell you that," Peter Bicks, managing partner of Orrick, Herrington & Suttcliffe's New York office, said of his Super Lawyers ranking.

Pennsylvania Judges Decide They, Alone, Will Get Raises (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court partly reinstated a controversial raise yesterday that state legislators repealed last year after a popular outcry.

DOJ_NMG_0063580

But the ruling said that only judges should receive the raise, not the legislators or other government workers who originally qualified.

The raise, which was passed at 2 in the morning on July 7, 2005, just before the General Assembly adjourned for the summer, was viewed by critics as sneaky and self-serving. It produced a reaction across the state that led to a Supreme Court justice's being voted out of office in November and the defeat of 17 legislators the following May.

In response to the public outcry, legislators repealed the raise in November.

The Supreme Court ruled that the Pennsylvania Constitution prohibited reducing the salaries of judges unless "all salaried officers of the commonwealth" were also affected. The court said the legislation repealing the raise did not do that because it excluded many state employees.

As a result, the Supreme Court justices will receive the raise, which amounts to more than 10 percent of their current salary, while the rest of the state officials will not.

The court also said the raise for legislators was unconstitutional because legislators are not permitted to receive raises that they draft in the middle of a term before having to face voters again.

"This is a cynical judicial swindle," said Bruce Ledewitz, a professor of constitutional law at Dusquesne University in Pittsburgh and a frequent critic of the Supreme Court. "It's blatantly self-serving, and they don't have the authority to do it."

When legislators drafted the raise, Professor Ledewitz pointed out, they included a "nonseverability" clause, which meant that the raises for one branch of government could not be revoked without canceling the raises for all three branches. The justices rejected that clause, he said, allowing their own raise to be restored.

Russ Diamond, a founder of PACleanSweep, a defunct organization that emerged during the backlash against the raises, said he was not surprised by the ruling.

"To me, it looks like further indication that we do not have an independent judiciary," Mr. Diamond said.

Tim Potts, co-founder of Democracy Rising PA, a good-government advocacy group based in Carlisle, said: "Things were settling down during the summer hiatus, but this decision is definitely going to heat them up again for us. I think those politicians who took the raise before facing the voters have something to worry about."

While the State Supreme Court ruling cannot be appealed, Mr. Potts said he had a lawsuit pending in federal court arguing that the justices could not decide on the salary legislation because they had a financial conflict of interest. He lost the initial ruling, but is appealing.

Study Shows GOP Fundraising Edge Is Slipping (CQPOL)

By Greg Giroux

CQ Politics.com, September 14, 2006

If any prediction is safe in this turbulent and closely contested election, it is that Republican candidates and their affiliated national party committees will raise more money than their Democratic counterparts.

But the fundraising advantages enjoyed by the current GOP congressional majorities over the challenging Democrats are closer than in recent election cycles, according to data presented by campaign finance experts at The Brookings Institution in Washington.

Their findings, released at a Tuesday event, seem to indicate that Democrats — who are benefiting from President Bush's unpopularity and strong public disapproval of Congress — have enough campaign dollars to seriously compete for control of the House and the Senate.

"While, in general, it's true that the candidate who spends the most money wins, in a "national tide" election you always have a substantial number of candidates who spend less than their opponents and win, who are taking advantage of the broader national conditions," said Thomas E. Mann, a senior fellow in governance studies at Brookings. "And I guarantee you, there will be such candidates this time."

In the first 18 months of the 2005-06 campaign cycle, the six major national party campaign committees reported raising a combined $574 million, of which $334 million, or 58 percent, was collected by the GOP organizations: the Republican National Committee (RNC), the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC).

Their Democratic counterparts — the Democratic National Committee (DNC), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) — raised $240 million, or 42 percent, of the two-party total.

While the GOP advantage is substantial, it is actually smaller than the Republicans' edge at a similar point in the competitive 2004 campaign. At the 18-month mark of that campaign cycle, the party's three committees collected $385 million and the Democrats took in $230.6 million (63 percent to 37 percent). The GOP committees, through June in this cycle, raised about $51 million less than in 2004, while the Democrats raised about $9 million more.

DOJ_NMG_0063581

In the first 18 months of the 2002 cycle — the last midterm election campaign and the last campaign of any sort in which party committees were allowed to raise unlimited "soft money" dollars — the Republican advantage was even more lopsided: the three GOP committees raised $404.8 million (64 percent of the total) and the Democratic committees raised $228 million (36 percent).

"What these figures suggest is that both parties are continuing to demonstrate financial strength in the midterm cycle, and that both parties are continuing to benefit from this highly partisan and polarized environment, which is conducive to party fundraising — but that the Democrats are doing much better on a relative basis than has been the case in other recent midterm elections," said Anthony Corrado, a government professor and campaign finance expert at Maine's Colby College.

The narrowing of the GOP's financial advantage also is evident in the partisan breakdown of individual donations to House and Senate candidates running this year.

In the first 18 months of the 2005-06 campaign cycle, individual donors gave $154.8 million to House Republican candidates and $146.7 million to House Democratic candidates — a small advantage for the GOP, especially when compared to past elections. At a similar point two years ago, House GOP candidates raised $150.1 million from individual donors, compared to $116.5 million raised by House Democratic candidates from individuals.

The shift was even more pronounced in the Senate committees' fundraising, with the Democrats emerging with a substantial advantage. In the first 18 months of the 2005-06 election cycle, individuals donors gave $145.1 million to Democratic Senate candidates and $102.3 million to Republican Senate candidates — a bigger edge for the Democrats than in 2004, when the parties' Senate candidates were much closer to parity in such contributions.

"A big part of the story to date in 2006 is individuals are back and contributing more, and especially contributing more to Senate and House Democratic candidates," said David B. Magleby, a political scientist at Brigham Young University in Utah.

The data also show that the parties have been able to fill most of the void created by the elimination of soft money under provisions of a campaign finance law overhaul enacted in 2002 and implemented prior to the 2004 elections.

The $574 million in receipts by the six party committees is not substantially less than the $633 million the organizations raised during the first 18 months of the 2001-02 cycle, when the committees were permitted to complement their heavily regulated and limited "hard money" receipts with unlimited soft-money contributions.

Corrado attributed the parties' success in boosting their hard-money numbers to enhanced small-donor bases, improved technology and the widespread expectation of a highly competitive 2006 midterm election.

Flush with cash, the party committees are preparing to unload the millions they banked for independent expenditure campaigns to promote their preferred candidates and attack the opposition — though the law bars direct coordination with candidates concerning these efforts. In some cases, these party-sponsored independent expenditures will exceed the campaign expenses of the candidates themselves.

"We are going to see more party support for candidates than ever before," Corrado said.

Other major players in the financing of the 2006 elections are the "527" political committees that organize under Section 527 of the Internal Revenue Code and are allowed to accept unlimited contributions to influence elections. Wealthy donors who formerly gave soft money to the political parties have been shifting these large outlays to 527 committees, which already are spending money on television advertisements.

Magleby said "there will be even more substantial outside money" spent by 527 groups and 501(c) nonprofit organizations in congressional contests than in 2004, when such groups concentrated heavily on the close presidential election.

One Democratic-affliated 527 called Majority Action has recently reported spending $114,000 on television ads criticizing Republican Reps. James T. Walsh of New York and Deborah Pryce of Ohio. Majority Action is headed by Mark Longabaugh, a former campaign aide to the League of Conservation Voters and to the 2000 presidential campaign of former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley, and himself a Democratic House candidate in Ohio's 1st District in 1996.

The same filing revealed that Majority Action recently received contributions of $120,000 from George Soros, the liberal billionaire financier who also heavily backed liberal 527 groups in the 2004 presidential election, and $100,000 from Linda Pritzker, an heir to the Hyatt Hotel fortune who is also a generous Democratic Party donor.

One busy Republican-aligned 527 is the Economic Freedom Fund, which has aired television ads attacking Reps. Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia and Jim Marshall of Georgia in their home districts.

A recent filing by the Economic Freedom Fund said it received a $5 million contribution from Houston homebuilder Bob J. Perry, a prominent Republican donor who also helped fund the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a 527 organization that was influential in aiding President Bush's defeat of Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry in the 2004 presidential race.

DOJ_NMG_0063582

"This looks like it's going to be a very financially competitive midterm election . . . None of these races are going to lack for funding," Corrado said.

A rundown of campaign fundraising figures cited in the report can be found here.

Fundraising Totals By The Numbers (CQPOL)

By Greg Giroux

CQ Politics.com, September 14, 2006

The following is a summary of recent campaign fundraising activity by the six major national party committees, comparing their efforts in the current 2005-06 election cycle with those in other recent cycles. The data was prepared by the Center for the Study of Elections and Democracy at Brigham Young University, and were presented Tuesday by a panel of experts on campaign finance.

A story on that event, which was hosted by The Brookings Institution, can be found here.

The figures show that Republican committees continue to enjoy a decided advantage over their Democratic counterparts, but that the Democrats have narrowed the fundraising gap as they attempt to win control of one or both chambers of Congress this November.

All figures are as of the 18-month point in a two-year campaign cycle, or through June 30 of the election year. So receipts for the current cycle reflect how much a committee raised from Jan. 1, 2005 through June 30 of this year.

The parties have filed subsequent reports for July, and the reports for August are due next week. A month-by-month chart of receipts, expenditures and cash-on-hand can be found here.

Receipts for the 2001-02 cycle include "soft money" contributions that the national party committees were allowed to accept through that campaign year. These unlimited contributions were barred by a campaign finance law overhaul that was enacted in 2002 and took effect for the 2004 elections.

Receipts are higher for the DNC and the RNC in the 2004 cycle than for the current cycle, because they were active in that year's presidential race.

Democratic National Committee (DNC)
2005-06 receipts: $90.4 million
2003-04 receipts: $125.4 million
2001-02 receipts: $99 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $35 million (28 percent drop)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $8.6 million (9 percent drop)
Republican National Committee (RNC)
2005-06 receipts: $168.2 million
2003-04 receipts: $219.4 million
2001-2002 receipts: $200.9 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $51.2 million (23 percent drop)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $32.7 million (16 percent drop)
Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC)
2005-06 receipts: $73 million
2003-04 receipts: $49.3 million
2001-2002 receipts: $70.3 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $23.7 million (48 percent gain)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Up $2.7 million (4 percent gain)
National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC)
2005-06 receipts: $62.6 million
2003-04 receipts: $50.4 million
2001-2002 receipts: $86.2 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $12.2 million (24 percent gain)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $23.6 million (27 percent drop)
Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC - House campaigns)
2005-06 receipts: $76.6 million
2003-04 receipts: $56 million
2001-2002 receipts: $58.7 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $20.6 million (37 percent gain)

DOJ_NMG_0063583

2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Up $17.9 million (30 percent gain)
National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC - House campaigns)
2005-06 receipts: $102.9 million
2003-04 receipts: $115.2 million
2001-2002 receipts: $117.7 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $12.3 million (11 percent drop)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $14.8 million (13 percent drop)
Democratic Party committees (DNC, DSCC, DCCC) combined
2005-06 receipts: $240 million
2003-04 receipts: $230.7 million
2001-2002 receipts: $228 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Up $9.3 million (4 percent gain)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Up $12 million (5 percent gain)
Republican Party committees (RNC, NRSC, NRCC) combined
2005-06 receipts: $333.7 million
2003-04 receipts: $385 million
2001-2002 receipts: $404.8 million
2005-06 vs. 2003-04: Down $51.3 million (13 percent drop)
2005-06 vs. 2001-02: Down $71.1 million (18 percent drop)

Swift Boat Ads Backer Funds New Group (AP-Y)

By Ben Evans
AP, September 14, 2006

The Republican donor who helped bankroll the Swift Boat attacks on Democratic Sen. John Kerry's war record has given $5 million to a new group targeting Democratic candidates.

Bob J. Perry, a Texas homebuilder with close ties to White House advisor Karl Rove and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, recently made the hefty donations to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group.

The group is a so-called 527 that is not subject to conventional campaign finance restrictions and can spend unlimited amounts on election advocacy, similar to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth. In the 2004 presidential race, the group of Vietnam veterans made unsubstantiated allegations challenging Kerry's record of wartime heroism.

So far, the new group — which lists Perry as its sole donor — has spent slightly more than $500,000 on television ads and mailings criticizing Democratic Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Alan Mollohan of West Virginia, according to a disclosure form filed last week with the Federal Election Commission.

According to its Web site, the group also is distributing mailing supporting Republican Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue's re-election campaign and Jim Nussle of Iowa, a Republican congressman running for governor.

Anthony Holm, a spokesman for Perry, declined to comment. Charles H. Bell Jr., a Sacramento attorney listed as the fund's contact, did not return repeated phone calls. On its FEC filings, the group lists as its address the same Sacramento office as Bell's law firm, Bell, McAndrews & Hiltachk.

The West Virginia and Georgia races are considered among the GOP's best shots at picking up seats in an election year where some experts believe the party is in danger of losing its majority in Congress.

Perry's $5 million donation, made in two payments on Aug. 18 and Sept. 5, is among the largest individual donation to any 527 group this year, although contribution records are still being filed. It exceeds the nearly $4.5 million that Perry gave the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth in 2004.

By comparison, billionaire Democratic donor George Soros has given about $2.3 million this year to several outside groups.

According to its Sept. 8 disclosure, the Economic Freedom Fund has spent $337,753 on the West Virginia race, where Mollohan, a 12-term Democrat, faces Republican state delegate Chris Wakim. The group has spent $163,599 in Georgia, where two-term incumbent Marshall is being challenged by former Republican congressman Mac Collins.

The West Virginia ads address recent allegations regarding Mollohan's ethics, citing news reports that he is the subject of a federal investigation into whether he steered government money to nonprofit groups that donated to his campaigns.

The Georgia ads portray Marshall, a conservative Democrat, as a liberal linking him to Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Ted Kennedy and Rep. Cynthia McKinney, who lost her seat in a Democratic primary after a highly publicized scuffle with a Capitol Hill police officer.

DOJ_NMG_0063584

Marshall spokesman Doug Moore said voters in the district are familiar enough with Marshall's record to know the ads are off base.

"Getting out there and calling Jim Marshall a liberal in the Macon media market isn't going to be effective," Moore said. "Everybody here knows Jim, and they know he's conservative."

Unlike with Kerry and the Swift Boat group, the Economic Freedom Fund has not questioned Marshall's Vietnam War service. A former Army Ranger platoon sergeant and recent inductee into the Army Ranger Hall of Fame, Marshall was awarded two Bronze Stars and a Purple Heart for his service in Vietnam.

"Jim Marshall has a great military record, and I hope they bring that up because we would love to make that an issue in this campaign," Moore said.

The group also made automated phone calls supporting Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel and criticizing his Indiana rival, but the effort may have done more harm than good. A spokeswoman for the Indiana Attorney General's office said Thursday it will investigate a complaint that the calls violate the state's law against automated phone calls.

According to its filing, the Economic Freedom Fund was formed to "promote policies and issues favoring economic freedom, growth and prosperity of the economy."

____

On The Net

Economic Freedom Fund: http://www.economicfreedomfund.com

Fla. Gov Candidate Names Running Mate (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff

AP, September 15, 2006

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis named a former state senator to be his running mate Thursday, a choice that could lead to Florida's first black lieutenant governor.

Daryl Jones, 51, was the first black candidate to make a serious run for Florida governor, coming in third in the 2002 primary.

"We need a leader with a proven record of standing up for what he believes in and in bringing people together and Daryl Jones is that leader," Davis said. "People are hungry for change."

Jones, a former Air Force fighter pilot, served six of his 12 years in the Legislature with Davis before Davis was elected to Congress in 1996. Jones was considered an intelligent, independent lawmaker and won respect among colleagues in both parties.

Jones is also a lawyer, but said he stopped practicing several years ago.

In November, the pair will face Republican nominee Charlie Crist, who on Wednesday named state Rep. Jeff Kottkamp to be his running mate.

Jones was in the national spotlight in 1998, when President Clinton nominated him to be the first black Air Force secretary. He was rejected in a bitter Senate confirmation process. Witnesses testified that as a reserve pilot, he almost ran out of fuel once and flew the wrong way another time.

Additional testimony raised questions about his background and character. His former squadron commander said he had to be grounded and given a desk job, an account Jones denied.

Jones said Thursday the Senate decision was "partisan politics" and noted that "the Air Force promoted me since then so they think I'm all right."

In 2002, he said he had no interest in becoming lieutenant governor, calling the position largely ceremonial and quipping that if elected he "would wind up being so good at golf I'd become good enough for the senior tour."

Asked about his previous remark, Jones said Thursday that the difference now is "the timing."

"In this case, Jim Davis is somebody that I have known who has tremendous experience both state and federal," Jones said. "He knows exactly what he's doing."

Senate Candidate Speaks Of Life, Faith (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Robert P. Casey Jr., the Democratic candidate seeking to unseat Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) in one of the country's hottest election campaigns, told a largely Roman Catholic audience yesterday that in his view, "neither party has gotten it right when it comes to life issues."

DOJ_NMG_0063585

Casey, a lifelong Catholic who opposes abortion, is the second high-profile Democrat who has recently given a major address defending the place of religion in politics. In June, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) criticized "liberals who dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant."

Since the 2004 presidential election, in which voters who attend church weekly voted 2 to 1 for President Bush over Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), Democrats have sought to close what some call the "God gap" in U.S. politics.

Casey's candidacy is viewed by Democratic strategists not only as one of the party's best opportunities to pick up a Senate seat, but also as an illustration of its growing inclusion of politicians who oppose abortion and of its desire to reach out to religiously motivated voters.

In a 45-minute lecture at Catholic University's Columbus School of Law, his alma mater, Casey said that America "must be a country dedicated to the common good" and that "my understanding of our common good comes from my family and my faith."

He described a year that he spent teaching at the Gesu School, an inner-city parochial school in north Philadelphia, after graduating from Holy Cross and before going to law school. "My short year as a Jesuit volunteer had a profound impact on my life, and the struggles of those I met in the inner city continue to inspire me," he said.

Casey said the common good is built on a foundation of social justice. "Justice demands our understanding that the hungry, the impoverished and the uninsured in this country are not statistics; they are children of God," he said.

Turning to abortion, he called for Democrats and Republicans to "unite . . . behind the understanding that the common good requires us to value all life." As an example, he cited legislation proposed by House Democrats that would target "the underlying factors that often lead women to choose abortion."

Some of the sharpest language in Casey's speech was aimed at his party. In 1992, the Democratic National Committee did not let Casey's father, then-Gov. Robert P. Casey Sr., speak at its national convention because of his antiabortion views. Referring to that "dark night," the younger Casey said the party "insulted the most courageous pro-life Democrat in the land, who asked that those who believed in the right to life be accorded the right to speak."

But he also had some sharp words for conservatives who focus primarily on the rights of the unborn. "If we are going to be pro-life, we cannot say we are against abortion . . . and then let our children suffer in broken schools," he said. "We can't claim to be pro-life at the same time we are cutting support for Medicaid, Head Start or the Women, Infants and Children's Program."

Some conservative Catholic groups objected to the university's invitation to Casey because he supports the widespread availability of the emergency contraceptive known as Plan B and has backed civil unions for same-sex couples.

"It is ironic Casey's speech topic is 'Restoring America's Moral Compass' when his own compass on moral issues is misguided," said Joseph Cella, leader of the group Fidelis.

But Tom Perriello, an adviser to the liberal group Catholics United for the Common Good, said the speech was "exciting, because as Catholics we've so often had to choose between the pro-life and the pro-social-justice sides of Catholic teaching. Now we get to have a debate about what authentic Catholic teaching is all about."

Let Reagan Be Reagan (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

IT IS A TICKLISH thing for Sen. George Allen, a Republican running for reelection in Virginia, that his Democratic opponent, James Webb, once worked for President Ronald Reagan. And it is especially awkward for Mr. Allen that the Gipper seems to have admired Mr. Webb, a highly decorated Vietnam veteran, and said so. But the fact remains that Mr. Webb did serve Mr. Reagan, both as Navy secretary and as assistant secretary of defense, and that the late president once lauded him publicly before a large crowd at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis. So it is easily within the bounds of fairness that the Webb campaign is airing an advertisement that includes 10 seconds or so of Mr. Reagan paying tribute that day to Mr. Webb's "gallantry as a Marine officer in Vietnam."

The Allen camp has cried foul, and an official at the Reagan Presidential Library in California, acting on Nancy Reagan's behalf, has asked that the ad be pulled. Neither protest has merit. The late president's public utterances are not the private property of his library or family. As for Mr. Allen, his campaign complains that the clip misleadingly implies the former president's support for Mr. Webb's candidacy. By that tortuous line of reasoning, the photograph on the Allen campaign's Web site, showing a young Mr. Allen shaking Mr. Reagan's hand, is also an implied endorsement -- which it isn't.

The president is a public official, paid by the taxpayers. His speeches are in the public domain; they belong to all Americans, and to history. His words may fairly be the subject of bitter debate and divergent interpretation for decades or centuries to come, but they should not be censored posthumously. In this instance, Mr. Webb has neither distorted Mr. Reagan's words nor taken them out of context; nor did Mr. Reagan ever repudiate them. The clip in question is a testimonial to Mr. Webb's service to his country in government and the military, not to a senatorial campaign that Mr. Reagan obviously never observed. It's a good bet that Virginians are clued in to the fact that Mr. Reagan, being dead, has taken no position on the Allen-Webb race. As for the partisans, they should let Reagan be Reagan.

DOJ_NMG_0063586

Nationalizing Politics (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

BALTIMORE -- This year's elections may turn the Tip O'Neill adage "All politics is local" not so much upside down as sideways: In 2006 all local politics is national, and all national politics is individual.

The United States is witnessing a centralization and nationalization of politics unprecedented in our history. This trend is rooted in the rise of the political consulting industry, vast changes in the technology of campaigning, and the intense competition between the two major parties for control of Congress.

There is, as well, the concentration of political money at the national level as Washington-based interest groups, associations and lobbyists not only raise large amounts in political contributions within the capital but also mobilize campaign money from their allies around the country.

The blogosphere has created central repositories of political information -- including news of very local developments that would otherwise go unnoticed on the national level -- that can speed the flow of intelligence to activists across the nation. And the recruitment of candidates is ever more the job of national party committees, not local officials or organizations.

The result is that the conventional debate about whether congressional elections are primarily local or national in character is both irrelevant and misleading. Even apparently local developments are often orchestrated from afar, and even personal attacks on individual candidates are largely the work of a cadre of Washington-based researchers.

Developments over the past week, including those in Tuesday's primaries, show how important national party machines are to the fate of individual candidates.

The most ironic national intervention was in Rhode Island, where Sen. Lincoln Chafee, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, who has often voted against President Bush, was powered to renomination over conservative Stephen Laffey by the voter identification and message apparatus created by Bush; his top political aide, Karl Rove; and pollster Matthew Dowd.

Here was the president's own political operation trying to identify and bring anti-Bush voters to the polls to renominate an anti-Bush senator who is his party's only hope for holding a Senate seat in a very anti-Bush state. Ideology and loyalty are far less important than control over Washington's levers of power. Chafee, who prides himself on independence, was in fact hugely dependent on a national party he often opposes.

Days before Chafee won his primary, The Post's Jim VandeHei and Chris Cillizza reported that the National Republican Congressional Committee, using research by its own operatives, plans to run tough, negative ads against Democratic challengers this fall on "personal issues and local controversies."

These ads will be classic instances of seemingly individual and local factors invoked as part of a national, centrally directed effort. Such attack ads are likely to be used most in districts in the Northeast and Midwest where Republican candidates will be trying not to talk much about national Republican issues.

Even turning away from your party can be a national partisan strategy, and Republicans are hoping to hold Congress by electing a herd of "independent fighters." At least five Republican candidates describe themselves with that phrase. New Jersey Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. calls himself an "independent fighter," and so do Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio and Reps. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania, Heather Wilson of New Mexico and Vito Fossella of New York.

In Maryland, Republicans hope to use local conflicts in the Democratic Party along racial lines to help Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, whose compelling personal story led the national party to recruit him, against Rep. Ben Cardin, the winner of this week's Democratic U.S. Senate primary.

Cardin defeated former representative Kweisi Mfume, who, like Steele, is black. Mark Clack, Mfume's campaign manager, said here that Steele could "play off" African American resentment "against the Maryland Democratic establishment" over the lack of black representation at the top of the Democratic ticket.

Clack said that for Cardin to win, "the frustration level in the African American community will have to be doused." But he thinks Cardin will succeed, because African American voters have not forgotten the Republicans' use of racial "wedge issues" in past elections and because Steele's need to mobilize the GOP's conservative base will run counter to his effort to appeal to the black community. The Washington Republicans, on the other hand, hope Steele can be a success story in their well-coordinated national effort to blur national issues.

So in 2006 the local is not really local, everything is about controlling Washington, and "independence" is a product being franchised by a national party apparatus.

DOJ_NMG_0063587

Progress Or Regress? (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Is the typical American family better off than it was a generation ago? That's the subject of an intense debate these days, as commentators try to understand the sour mood of the American public.

But it's the wrong debate. For one thing, there probably isn't a right answer. Most Americans are better off in some ways, worse off in others, than they were in the early 1970's. It's a subjective judgment whether the good outweighs the bad. And as I'll explain, that ambiguity is actually the real message.

Here's what the numbers say. From the end of World War II until 1973, when the first oil crisis brought an end to the postwar boom, the U.S. economy delivered a huge, broad-based rise in living standards: family income adjusted for inflation roughly doubled for the poor, the middle class, and the elite alike. Nobody debated whether families were better off than they had been a generation ago; it was obvious that they were, by any measure.

Since 1973, however, the picture has been mixed. Real median household income — the income of the household in the middle of the income distribution, adjusted for inflation — rose a modest 16 percent between 1973 and 2005. But even this small rise didn't reflect clear gains across the board. The typical full-time male worker saw his wages, adjusted for inflation, actually fall; the typical household's real income was up only because women's wages rose (although by far less than everyone's wages rose during the postwar boom) and because more women were working.

The debate over the state of the middle class, for the most part, is about whether these numbers understate or overstate the true progress achieved by typical families. The optimists point to technological advances that, they argue, don't get reflected in official estimates of the standard of living. In 1973, you couldn't chat on a cellphone, watch a video or surf the Internet; many medical conditions that are now easily managed with drugs were untreatable; and so on.

The pessimists point to ways in which life has deteriorated, things that also aren't counted by the official statistics. Traffic has gotten far worse, and commutes have gotten longer. The economic riskiness of life has increased: year-to-year fluctuations in family income have grown much larger. The rat race has intensified, as families, no longer confident in the quality of public education, stretch to buy houses in good school districts — and often go bankrupt when misfortune strikes in the form of a layoff for either spouse or high medical bills.

Does the good outweigh the bad? Never mind. As I said, the ambiguity is the message.

Consider this: The United States economy is far richer and more productive than it was a generation ago. Statistics on economic growth aside, think of all the technological advances that have made workers more productive over the past generation. In 1973, there were no personal computers, let alone the Internet. Even fax machines were rare, expensive items, and there were no bar-code scanners at checkout counters. Freight containerization was still uncommon. The list goes on and on.

Yet in spite of all this technological progress, which has allowed the average American worker to produce much more, we're not sure whether there was any rise in the typical worker's pay. Only those at the upper end of the income distribution saw clear gains — gains that were enormous for the lucky few at the very top.

That's why the debate over whether the middle class is a bit better off or a bit worse off now than a generation ago misses the point. What we should be debating is why technological and economic progress has done so little for most Americans, and what changes in government policies would spread the benefits of progress more widely. An effort to shore up middle-class health insurance, paid for by a rollback of recent tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans — something like the plan proposed by John Kerry two years ago, but more ambitious — would be a good place to start.

Instead, the people running our government are fixated on cutting tax rates for the wealthy even further. And their solution to Americans' justified economic anxiety is a public relations campaign, an effort to convince middle-class families that their problems are a figment of their imagination.

Everyday Low Wages (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

Mayor Richard M. Daley of Chicago wielded the first veto of his 17-year tenure this week — and the City Council supported him — striking down Chicago's short-lived plan to force behemoth retailers like Wal-Mart to pay higher wages and benefits.

In this round, Mr. Daley, the retailers and local Wal-Mart suppliers argued that mandating higher compensation would do more harm than good by driving business and employment opportunities away from low-income neighborhoods.

But the choice — between no jobs or low-wage jobs — is probably a false one. Wal-Mart and other mega-retailers, like Target and Home Depot, need market share. With suburban areas saturated, cities are the logical places to grow. Wal-Mart especially needs more American consumers, having recently pulled the plug on unsuccessful attempts to expand in Germany and South Korea. It is currently planning to expand in Santa Fe, N.M., where local laws require higher wages than the company normally pays.

DOJ_NMG_0063588

Another argument propounded by Wal-Mart is that paying higher wages would compel the company to raise its prices, hurting low-income consumers. Wage gains do not automatically lead to higher prices. They could be absorbed by higher productivity or by a narrowing of profit margins. Given Wal-Mart's profits, the company could improve its wage structure and still beat the competition.

The Chicago ordinance raised legal and technical questions. If Mr. Daley had not wielded the veto, it would surely have faced a court challenge. But proponents of living wages have the moral high ground, and are increasingly finding a political voice. Chicago hasn't heard the last of them, and Washington hasn't either.

New Jersey Switcheroo (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

For pure entertainment value, not much can compete with the blood sport of New Jersey politics. Last week federal investigators launched a probe into whether U.S. Senator Robert Menendez illegally benefited to the tune of more than $300,000 from a rental-income deal he had with a nonprofit agency that received millions of dollars in federal contracts. Even liberal good government groups agree that the relationship may have violated congressional conflict-of-interest rules.

The allegations have sparked a mini-panic among state Democratic operatives, who not so long ago thought Mr. Menendez -- who was appointed by Jon Corzine to complete his Senate term after being elected Governor in 2005 -- had the November election in the bag. Now they see Republican Tom Kean Jr. surging into a lead. If Republicans were to pick up a seat in this deep blue state, Democrats' chances of winning control of the Senate would be all but slammed shut.

That's why, as reported by the Newark Star-Ledger, there's now widespread speculation that the party brass may decide to throw Mr. Menendez overboard and replace him with an alternative -- nine-term Rep. Rob Andrews, perhaps -- who is regarded as more electable. This has become a familiar practice in the Garden State and has become known derisively as the New Jersey Switcheroo.

The details of the case are as follows. In 1998, while Mr. Menendez was a member of the House, he helped a nonprofit housing and health-care agency known as the North Hudson Community Action Group win designation as a federally qualified health-care center. This designation allowed the nonprofit group to obtain $9.6 million in federal grants. The nonprofit's employees have contributed some $30,000 to Menendez campaigns over the years, including $9,000 from the agency's director. The alleged conflict of interest arises from the fact that the Hudson County nonprofit paid Mr. Menendez a total of $329,353 starting in 1994 to rent a building he owned.

The Senator responds that his efforts on behalf of the Hudson County Action Group are no different than interventions he has made on behalf of dozens of similar nonprofit groups seeking federal funds. He also says that he received verbal authorization from a House Ethics Committee staffer on this deal. But strangely enough, as reported by Roll Call, the staffer didn't work for the committee at the time Mr. Menendez says he received the approval, and that person has subsequently died. It is also considered standard practice to get written approval from the committee when an ethical issue like this arises.

If this story seems like déjà vu all over again, it should. This isn't the first time New Jersey Democrats have nominated ethically challenged candidates for high office. Last year Jim McGreevey resigned the governorship after he hired his gay lover as the state's national security director. In 2002, Senator Robert Torricelli was implicated in a bribery and campaign finance scandal, prompting the party oligarchs to throw him off the ballot and handpick Frank Lautenberg as his replacement on the ticket. Never mind that the deadline for ballot changes had passed. Senator Lautenberg kept the Senate seat from falling into Republican hands.

Republicans haven't won a statewide race in New Jersey since the election of Governor Christie Whitman back in the mid-1990s, in part because the Democratic machine reserves the imperial right to replace elected candidates on the general election ballot. Nowhere in the country do party leaders so cavalierly disenfranchise their primary voters when they fear their nominee is going to lose. For the New Jersey GOP, it's like trying to win at poker when your opponent can call for a redeal every time he doesn't like his cards.

Senator Menendez has vowed to stay in the race to the bitter end. Democrat leaders publicly insist they will stick with the Senator, but they sound about as sincere as a sports franchise owner who gives the head coach a public vote of confidence after a third straight last-place finish. At the next press conference, the coach invariably is gone.

The more serious issue here is whether Garden State voters are growing weary of the culture of big boss cronyism that has contaminated their government from city hall to the U.S. Senate. This is a state with a steeply rising cost of living and a property-tax burden that is both the highest in the nation and twice the national average. The state has some of the worst schools and most expensive municipal services in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0063589

We don't know whether Mr. Menendez is guilty of violating federal conflict-of-interest laws. But it's worth noting that a Senate ethics complaint has been filed against him. The last major Senate ethics investigation was the one launched four years ago against New Jersey's Torricelli.

U.S. And S. Korea To Push To Restart Nuclear Talks (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun agreed yesterday to work together to restart stalled six-party nuclear talks with North Korea, but they skated over their deep differences in how to deal with the isolated Stalinist government in Pyongyang.

Emerging from an Oval Office meeting, Bush stressed the potential benefits to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il if he returns to the negotiating table and ultimately gives up his nuclear weapons. Bush avoided the sort of hard-edged tone that in the past has irritated the South Koreans, who want to take a less confrontational approach.

"First and foremost," Bush said, "the incentive is for Kim Jong Il to understand there is a better way to improve the lives of his people than being isolated -- that stability in the region is in his interests."

But Bush and Roh made no concrete progress on the North Korean stalemate, U.S. officials said, nor did they reach a breakthrough on various other issues that divide them. The two sides have been trying to negotiate a free-trade pact that would be the largest for the United States since the North American Free Trade Agreement a decade ago. They have also been discussing a plan for U.S. commanders to relinquish operational command of South Korean troops during wartime.

U.S.-South Korean ties have grown increasingly strained as Bush and Roh split over the North Korean nuclear issue.

The last time Bush and Roh met, 10 months ago in South Korea, Roh privately grilled Bush on whether the administration was trying to sabotage the six-party North Korea process and his government publicly embarrassed the Americans by leaking plans to withdraw 1,000 troops from Iraq. North Korea has refused since November to return to the talks, which also involve Japan, China and Russia.

In recent weeks, U.S. and South Korean officials have sparred over how to respond to North Korea's summertime missile tests, with Washington pressing for tougher actions and Seoul dismissing the political importance of the episode. Wary of a public spat, the White House decided to minimize the chance of discord at yesterday's meeting by scrapping any joint news statement and limiting the encounter to an hour-long session in the Oval Office followed by a lunch focused on human rights abuses in North Korea.

An administration official said the two leaders came up with "no more specific proposals" on North Korea during the meeting but said the spirit was congenial and constructive. Bush aides were pleased that Roh pledged to enforce U.N. sanctions against North Korea stemming from the missile tests and the South Koreans were pleased that Bush committed to further consultation on the question of wartime military command. At a brief session with reporters, Bush called the relationship "strong and vital."

"Some meetings have been less jovial than others, but this looked like it was better than others and did what they needed to do," said Michael J. Green, a former Asia adviser to Bush now at Georgetown University and the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), chairman of the House International Relations subcommittee on Asia, said the lack of fireworks by itself made it a successful meeting but added that he remains worried about the rift. "Nothing went awry, and that is positive," he said. "There are ups and downs and today is on the more positive side than a year ago. But this is a very serious dilemma."

Bush, Roh Hope To Restart Talks With Pyongyang (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. President George W. Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun said their nations are committed to bringing North Korea back to stalled negotiations over its nuclear-weapons program, ignoring differences about the best way to do that.

Mr. Bush said the decision of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to boycott the talks "has really strengthened the alliance" of the U.S., South Korea, China, Japan and Russia. Mr. Roh echoed that, saying the countries would work together to restart negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0063590

Since North Korea began boycotting the disarmament talks in November, the country has sparked concerns around the world as reports circulate that it may be preparing for a nuclear-bomb test. North Korea also defied international warnings and tested seven missiles in July.

Some observers have suggested that mixed messages from Washington and Seoul on how to solve the crisis have allowed Pyongyang to augment its nuclear arsenal as the country falls into deeper isolation.

The Bush administration favors a hard-line approach, refusing to talk to the North outside six-nation talks. Mr. Roh has tried to engage the North. Mr. Roh's low-key trip to Washington had many wondering whether there are cracks in an alliance forged five decades ago during the Korean War.

N. Korea's Refusal To Talk Bolstered Allies, Bush Says (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 15, 2006

President Bush, meeting yesterday with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun in the Oval Office, said North Korea's refusal to return to negotiations had "strengthened" the alliance of five countries trying to persuade the communist nation to abandon its nuclear program.

Mr. Bush, in his first meeting with the South Korean leader since North Korea conducted missile tests in July, said the stalled talks should help convince President Kim Jong-il that "there is a better way to improve the lives of his people than being isolated."

"His refusal to come back to the six-party talks has really strengthened an alliance of five nations that are determined to solve this issue peacefully but recognize a threat posed by a country in the region armed with a nuclear weapon," the president said.

Mr. Roh said his nation, along with the United States, China, Japan and Russia, should continue to press North Korea to resume talks.

"What is important to remember is that the fact that we are consulting closely on the North Korean nuclear issue and we are consulting on ways to restart the six-party process, and I believe this is the important point," he said through a translator.

Still, neither leader offered specific measures to prompt North Korea to return to the bargaining table.

The on-again, off-again talks stalled last November, when North Korea began a boycott, in part because Pyongyang wants the United States to end financial restrictions prompted by accusations that the nation counterfeits U.S. money and trades in illegal drugs. Mr. Kim also wants to engage in bilateral talks with the United States, an idea Mr. Bush has rejected.

Although worldwide fears that the country would conduct nuclear tests have not yet been realized, North Korea, which nuclear specialists say has several atomic weapons, defied international warnings by test-launching seven missiles, including one that is capable of reaching the United States.

While the Bush administration advocates tougher U.N. sanctions against North Korea, Mr. Roh prefers to continue negotiations. After an hourlong meeting at the White House, Mr. Bush sounded a softer tone about the standoff, saying the United States is "determined to resolve this issue peacefully but recognizes a threat posed by a country in the region armed with a nuclear weapon."

Mr. Roh said it is not yet "the appropriate time to think about the possibility of a failure of the six-party process."

"There is a concern in Korea that the United States will take further sanctions against North Korea and whether this will jeopardize the chance of a successful six-party process, my answer is that we are working very hard on restarting the six-party talks," he said.

Mr. Roh has criticized the Bush administration for seeking to isolate the already reclusive North Korean leader, saying in July that the North's test-firing was more likely for political rather than military purposes.

But Mr. Roh also stood firm against North Korea. "My government has taken certain measures, and ... we are, in fact, taking measures tantamount to sanctions after the North Korean missile launches," he said.

Iran President Softens Nuclear Tone (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, September 15, 2006

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, said on Thursday that Tehran was open to compromise on the dispute over the country's nuclear programme, as talks continued between the Islamic republic and the European Union.

Speaking in Senegal on his way to a non-aligned summit in Cuba and then the annual gathering of the United Nations, Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said that Iran was open to "new conditions" on the subject.

DOJ_NMG_0063591

"I am announcing that we are available, we are ready for new conditions," he said. He declined to say whether Iran was prepared to suspend uranium enrichment, a process that can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

But at a meeting last weekend between Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear security official, and Javier Solana, the EU's foreign policy chief, Iran floated the idea of suspending enrichment for an initial period of up to two months once negotiations began.

Mr Larijani and Mr Solana had been scheduled to see each other again on Thursday, but the two men's deputies met instead in Geneva.

European officials said the meeting might have been downgraded because of the work needed to reach any agreement to begin formal negotiations. The EU is watering down its previous insistence that enrichment should be halted as a precondition for negotiations.

But discussions this week at the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN's nuclear watchdog, suggest a divergence between France and Germany, which appear to be more enthusiastic about negotiations, and the UK, which is particularly keen to keep the US on board.

Earlier this year Washington announced that it would join the negotiations with Tehran if Iran suspended uranium enrichment. But the US's reaction to the Iranian initiative this week has been highly cautious.

The US State Department has denied any knowledge of a new Iranian proposal. Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, emphasises that Washington is continuing work on UN sanctions against Iran – although earlier in the week she appeared to react more positively to reports of Tehran's new stance.

Any suggestion that the US should give further concessions to Iran is likely to be deeply controversial within the Bush administration. The extremely sensitive nature of the issue was highlighted further on Thursday by a letter of complaint by the IAEA sent to the US House of Representatives and reported by the Washington Post newspaper.

In an echo of the clash between UN weapons inspectors and the US administration in the run-up to the Iraq war, the letter, signed by the IAEA's director of external relations, criticises a congressional report on Iran for "erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information".

In particular, it takes the report to task for alleging that Iran was enriching uranium to weapons grade, when at present the levels of enrichment are much less.

US: Fight For Sanctions On Iran Will Be Tough, Take Weeks (AFP)

AFP, September 15, 2006

The United States acknowledged that it will face tough resistance from some of its key allies as it presses for UN sanctions against Iran over its suspect nuclear program.

Iran's refusal to comply with UN demands that it suspend uranium enrichment activities some fear could produce nuclear weapons is set to feature high on the agenda when world leaders gather in New York next week for the UN General Assembly.

US officials have for weeks been expressing strong confidence that the permanent Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- will swiftly reach agreement on political and economic sanctions designed to force Tehran to abandon its enrichment program.

Such sanctions were called for in a Security Council resolution adopted in July, which gave Iran until August 31 to freeze its enrichment activity -- a demand Tehran ignored.

But with some Security Council partners increasingly reticent to go down the path of sanctions, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack admitted Thursday that the upcoming negotiations would be "hard-fought."

"The reality of it is that there are going to be intense negotiations on this," he said.

McCormack predicted the process of trying to hammer out a sanctions package with the other Security Council members "would take weeks," a far less ambitious timetable than put forward earlier by Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, who said a deal would be reached in September.

But McCormack continued to express confidence Washington's allies would ultimately back the sanctions foreshadowed in their earlier resolution.

"Our diplomatic interactions indicate that while this will be complex, sometimes hard-fought diplomacy, that we will, in fact, end up with a Security Council resolution that includes sanctions," he said.

Earlier Thursday, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy issued a thinly veiled warning to Washington and Britain -- the other staunch advocate of sanctions -- that pressing too hard for sanctions could fracture the coalition confronting Iran.

"If one or two of the permanent members of the Security Council fail to uphold this dialogue, and there is a growing drive -- on either side -- towards confrontation, the international community would split," he said.

Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao also warned on Thursday that imposing sanctions on Iran could have the "opposite effect" of hardening Iran's stance in the showdown.

DOJ_NMG_0063592

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said Washington wants the sanctions to be imposed in a graduated manner to build pressure on Iran to give up its enrichment program and accept international offers to help it develop a monitored civilian nuclear power industry.

Rice confirmed Wednesday that she will meet her fellow foreign ministers from the permanent Security Council members plus Germany on the sidelines of the General Assembly meeting in New York to discuss the sanctions.

Nuclear Agency For U.N. Faults Report On Iran By U.S. House (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 — The International Atomic Energy Agency has complained about a staff report from the House Intelligence Committee, saying that it "contains erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information" about Iran's nuclear program. Agency officials said Thursday that their concerns had echoes of their arguments with the Bush administration over Iraq three years ago.

The charges were contained in a letter dated Sept. 12 and sent to Rep. Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who is chairman of the committee. Its unclassified staff report, released in mid-August, was widely seen as an effort to prod American intelligence agencies to be more aggressive in their examination of Iran's nuclear program, amid charges from some conservatives that the mistakes made in assessing Iraq's programs four years ago had bred an overly cautious atmosphere.

But the staff report immediately came under criticism, especially from Democrats on the committee, who said it overstated aspects of the threat posed by Iran's nuclear program. The committee's vice chairman, Representative Jane Harman of California, accused the staff of taking shortcuts that inflated the Iranian threat.

The report was overseen by Fredrick Fleitz, a former C.I.A. officer who worked for John R. Bolton, the ambassador to the United Nations, when he was the State Department's leading hawk on Iran.

The letter from the atomic energy agency, the United Nations' nuclear monitoring agency, was first disclosed in The Washington Post on Thursday. It charges that a caption under a picture of Iran's main nuclear site at Natanz falsely states that Tehran is "enriching uranium to weapons grade" with a small collection of centrifuges, the high-speed machines that are used to turn uranium into a fuel usable in nuclear power plants — or bombs. The letter says the uranium was enriched only to 3.6 percent — a level suitable for producing power, but far short of the 90 percent or so commonly associated with fuel for weapons.

A spokesman for the committee, Jamal Ware, said that while "there may be an issue with the caption, the substance of the report is clear, that Iran is working toward the ability to produce weapons grade uranium, but they are not there yet." He said the report was intended to begin a discussion on Iran intelligence.

A senior European diplomat, speaking on the condition of routine diplomatic anonymity, said, "The view at the I.A.E.A. was that this House report exaggerated the evidence, and people had to put a marker down fast."

"No one wants a repeat of 2003," the official said, a reference to the open dispute between the Bush administration and the director general of the atomic energy agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, over whether there was evidence of nuclear activity in Iraq.

Dr. ElBaradei was ridiculed by administration officials at the time; in recent months, though, the administration has cited his reports in pressing their case against Iran.

IAEA: U.S. Report On Iran 'Dishonest' (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, September 15, 2006

A recent House of Representatives committee report on Iran's nuclear capability is "outrageous and dishonest" in trying to make a case that Tehran's program is geared toward making weapons, a senior official of the U.N. nuclear watchdog has said.

The letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Thursday outside a 35-nation board meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency, says the report is false in saying Iran is making weapons-grade uranium at an experimental enrichment site, when it has in fact produced material only in small quantities that is far below the level that can be used in nuclear arms.

The letter, which was first reported on by The Washington Post, also says the report erroneously says that IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei removed a senior nuclear inspector from the team investigating Iran's nuclear program "for concluding that the purpose of Iran's nuclear program is to construct weapons."

In fact, the inspector was sidelined on Tehran's request, and the Islamic republic had a right to ask for a replacement under agreements that govern all states relationships with the agency, said the letter, calling the report's version "incorrect and misleading."

DOJ_NMG_0063593

"In addition," says the letter, "the report contains an outrageous and dishonest suggestion that such removal might have been for 'not having adhered to an unstated IAEA policy barring IAEA officials from telling the whole truth about the Iranian nuclear program.'"

Dated Aug. 12, the letter was addressed to Rep. Peter Hoekstra, chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. It was signed by Vilmos Cserveny, a senior director of the Vienna-based agency.

An IAEA official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the letter, said it was written "to set the record straight."

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the House committee, confirmed they had received the letter and said the chairman had referred it to Rep. Mike Rogers, R-Mich., and Rep. Rush Hold, D-N.J. They will review it and issue a formal response if necessary, he said.

"All IAEA complains about is a photo caption. If you read the report, it's very clear that what it is saying is that Iran is working to develop the capability to enrich uranium to weapons grade, not that they have done so," Ware said. "They use a string of adjectives, while not pointing to any substantive criticism of the report. There are areas where we would disagree with them. A disagreement does not make what we say erroneous."

The dispute was reminiscent of the clashes between the IAEA and Washington over whether Saddam Hussein was trying to make weapons of mass destruction, including nuclear arms. American arguments that Saddam had such covert arms programs were given as the chief reason for invading Iraq and toppling Saddam.

ElBaradei's criticism of the U.S. standpoint on Iraq and subsequent perceptions that he was soft on Iran in his staff's investigation of suspicions Tehran's nuclear activities may be a cover for a weapons program led to a failed attempt last year by Washington to prevent his re-election.

Opposition: Iran Using Laser Enrichment (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, September 15, 2006

Iran has secretly revived a program to enrich uranium using laser technology, reportedly with favorable results, an Iranian opposition figure said Thursday citing information from members of the resistance inside the country.

Alireza Jafarzadeh said information about the laser enrichment program at Lashkar Ab'ad, about 15 miles northwest of Tehran, came from the same sources that led to his revelation in May 2003 that Iran had a clandestine nuclear program.

There was no independent confirmation of the latest information and Iran's U.N. Mission called the allegation "baseless and unfounded."

Jafarzadeh, who heads the Washington-based Strategic Policy Consulting think tank, is credited with having aired Iranian military secrets in the past. But U.S. officials considered some of his past assertions inaccurate.

Jafarzadeh urged the International Atomic Energy Agency to immediately send U.N. nuclear inspectors to Lashkar Ab'ad and demand access to all areas, including a new 5,000-square foot hall in a large garden where he said secret laser enrichment activities are being conducted.

"We've only now been sent a copy of this report," said IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming, "and like all information that we receive, we must take the time to check it against all our information in order to decide whether it is worth following up."

The U.N. has demanded Iran halt uranium enrichment.

Jafarzadeh said there are two ways to separate uranium isotopes and isolate U235 which can be enriched. The most common way is using centrifuges while laser technology is an experimental method, he said.

Jafarzadeh said Iran's decision to revive its laser enrichment program, which is still at experimental levels, shows Iran wants "to use every possibility that is available to them to rush to the bomb."

The laser enrichment is being conducted under the guise of a front company called Paya Partov whose board is chaired by Reza Aqazadeh, head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, Jafarzadeh said. Its advisers include Iran's leading experts on laser enrichment, he said.

Contrary to Iran's claim that it is complying with its obligations under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, Jafarzadeh said, "once again the information indicates that this is absolutely not the case."

"The information I've gotten from my sources today suggests that Iran is heavily involved in laser enrichment program, something Iran has told the IAEA that they have abandoned," he told a news conference.

Jafarzadeh has worked for the political wing of the Mujahedin Khalq, an Iranian opposition group that Washington and the European Union list as a terrorist organization.

DOJ_NMG_0063594

Iran's U.N. Mission countered in a statement, saying: "It is also a well-known fact that at any stage that the international community is witnessing a step forward in the Iranian peaceful nuclear program, this terrorist group and collaborator of Saddam Hussein tries its best to hamper the progress."

The reference to the deposed Iraqi leader stems from Saddam allowing the Mujahedin Khalq to operate bases in Iraq.

Jafarzadeh said laser technology is an experimental method of separating uranium that can be enriched from that which cannot, a process that normally is done using centrifuges.

Jafarzadeh said Iran's decision to revive its laser enrichment program, which is still "at experimental levels shows that Iran want "to use every possibility that is available to them to rush to the bomb."

Chavez Vows Aid For Iran Against Attack (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez pledged Thursday that Venezuela will support Iran if it is invaded as a result of the Middle Eastern nation's high-stakes nuclear standoff with the United Nations Security Council.

"Iran is under threat; there are plans to invade Iran, hopefully it won't happen, but we are with you," Chavez told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a meeting of the Group of 15 developing nations.

The U.N. has demanded that Iran suspend uranium enrichment amid concerns by some nations that it could be used for nuclear weapons. Iran insists that its enrichment efforts are peaceful, aimed solely at producing electrical energy.

Chavez said Venezuela stands with Iran in this time of crisis, just as it has with Cuba, where Fidel Castro handed over power to Raul while recovering from intestinal surgery. If they don't defend each other, no one else will, Chavez said.

"Under any scenario we are with you just like we are with Cuba," Chavez said. "If the United States invades Cuba, blood will run... We will not have our arms crossed while bombs are falling in Havana or they carry Raul off in a plane."

Bush's Message To Iran (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

What would President Bush say to the Iranian people if he had a chance to communicate directly with them? I was able to put that question to Bush in a one-on-one interview in the Oval Office on Wednesday. His answer made clear that the administration wants a diplomatic solution to the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program -- one that is premised on an American recognition of Iran's role as an important nation in the Middle East.

"I would say to the Iranian people: We respect your history. We respect your culture. We admire the entrepreneurial skills of your people. I would say to the Iranian people that I recognize the importance of your sovereignty -- that you're a proud nation, and you want to have a positive future for your citizens," Bush said, answering quickly and without notes.

"In terms of the nuclear issue," he continued, "I understand that you believe it is in your interest -- your sovereign interest, and your sovereign right -- to have nuclear power. I understand that. But I would also say to the Iranian people, there are deep concerns about the intentions of some in your government who would use knowledge gained from a civilian nuclear power industry to develop a weapon that can then fulfill the stated objectives of some of the leadership [to attack Israel and threaten the United States]. And I would say to the Iranian people that I would want to work for a solution to meeting your rightful desires to have civilian nuclear power."

"I would tell the Iranian people that we have no desire for conflict," Bush added.

He expressed hope that Iran would help stabilize Iraq, but he said the best channel for this dialogue would be through Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, who has been in Tehran this week. And he called for a new program of cultural and educational exchanges between the United States and Iran as a way of encouraging greater contact and trust.

Bush's comments were a clear public signal of the administration's strategy in the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program. In recent days, the Washington rumor mill has been bubbling with talk that the administration is planning military options for dealing with the crisis, perhaps in the near term. But Bush's remarks went in a different direction. His stress was on reassuring Iran that the United States recognizes its ambitions to be an advanced nation, with a robust civilian nuclear power program and a role in shaping the Middle East commensurate with its size and power. The red lines for America involve nuclear weapons, military threats to Israel or the United States, and Iran's links to terrorist groups.

Bush's comments tracked the offer the United States and its allies have made to Iran if it agrees to suspend its enrichment of uranium. He proposed that the West supply enriched uranium to Iran and other countries, and collect the nuclear waste. He argued that this global program "would be a solution that would answer a deep desire from the Iranian people to have a nuclear power industry."

DOJ_NMG_0063595

On Iraq, Bush said Maliki's visit to Tehran was "aimed at convincing the Iranians that a stable Iraq is in their interest. They have said so many times, and I think Prime Minister Maliki is now attempting to find out what that means, and how the Iraqi government can work with the Iranians to create a sense of stability."

Bush said he had read commentary criticizing Maliki's trip. "I disagree. Prime Minister Maliki should go to Iran. It is in Iraq's national interest that relations with Iran be such that there are secure borders and no cross-border issues, including the exportation of equipment that can harm Iraqi citizens as well as coalition troops, and the exportation of extremism that can prevent this young [Iraqi] democracy from flourishing."

Our discussion followed the 12-day visit to the United States by former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami. I asked Bush why he had approved this visit by a high-level Iranian and what he thought it had accomplished.

"One of the dilemmas facing [American] policymakers is to understand the nature, the complex nature of the Iranian regime," he said. "And I thought it would be beneficial for our country to receive the former leader, Khatami, to hear what he had to say. And as importantly for him, to hear what Americans had to say."

He wanted Khatami to understand that on the nuclear issue and Hezbollah's attacks on Israel, "It's not just George W. Bush speaking."

The Khatami visit "said that the United States is willing to listen to voices," Bush explained. "And I hope that sends a message to the Iranian people that we're an open society, and that we respect the people of Iran." Clearly, the White House wants to reach out to segments of Iranian opinion beyond the hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

I asked Bush what next steps he would favor in opening dialogue with Iran. "I would like to see more cultural exchanges," he said. "I would like to see university exchanges. I would like to see more people-to-people exchanges."

"I know that the more we can show the Iranian people the true intention of the American government," Bush concluded, "the more likely it is that we will be able to reach a diplomatic solution to a difficult problem."

I came away with a sense that Bush is serious about finding a peaceful solution to the nuclear crisis, and that he is looking hard for ways to make connections between America and Iran.

The Tehran Calculus (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

In his televised Sept. 11 address, President Bush said that we must not "leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons." There's only one such current candidate: Iran.

The next day, he responded thus (as reported by Rich Lowry and Kate O'Beirne of National Review) to a question on Iran: "It's very important for the American people to see the president try to solve problems diplomatically before resorting to military force."

"Before" implies that the one follows the other. The signal is unmistakable. An aerial attack on Iran's nuclear facilities lies just beyond the horizon of diplomacy. With the crisis advancing and the moment of truth approaching, it is important to begin looking now with unflinching honesty at the military option.

The costs will be terrible:

Â· Economic . An attack on Iran is likely to send oil prices overnight to $100 or even to $150 a barrel. That will cause a worldwide recession perhaps as deep as the one triggered by the Iranian revolution of 1979.

Iran might suspend its own 2.5 million barrels a day of oil exports and might even be joined by Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, asserting primacy as the world's leading anti-imperialist. But even more effectively, Iran will shock the oil markets by closing the Strait of Hormuz, through which 40 percent of the world's exports flow every day.

Iran could do this by attacking ships in the Strait, scuttling its own ships, laying mines or just threatening to launch Silkworm anti-ship missiles at any passing tanker.

The U.S. Navy will be forced to break the blockade. We will succeed, but at considerable cost. And it will take time -- during which the world economy will be in a deep spiral.

Â· Military . Iran will activate its proxies in Iraq, most notably, Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. Sadr is already wreaking havoc with sectarian attacks on Sunni civilians. Iran could order the Mahdi Army and its other agents within the police and armed forces to take up arms against the institutions of the central government itself, threatening the very anchor of the new Iraq. Many Mahdi will die, but they live to die. Many Iraqis and coalition soldiers are likely to die as well.

Among the lesser military dangers, Iran might activate terrorist cells around the world, although without nuclear capability that threat is hardly strategic. It will also be very difficult to unleash its proxy Hezbollah, now chastened by the destruction it brought upon Lebanon in the latest round with Israel and deterred by the presence of Europeans in the south Lebanon buffer zone.

DOJ_NMG_0063596

Â· Diplomatic. There will be massive criticism of America from around the world. Much of it is to be discounted. The Muslim street will come out again for a few days, having replenished its supply of flammable American flags, most recently exhausted during the cartoon riots. Their governments will express solidarity with a fellow Muslim state, but this will be entirely hypocritical. The Arabs are terrified about the rise of a nuclear Iran and would privately rejoice in its defanging.

The Europeans will be less hypocritical because their visceral anti-Americanism trumps rational calculation. We will have done them an enormous favor by sparing them the threat of Iranian nukes, but they will vilify us nonetheless.

These are the costs. There is no denying them. However, equally undeniable is the cost of doing nothing.

In the region, Persian Iran will immediately become the hegemonic power in the Arab Middle East. Today it is deterred from overt aggression against its neighbors by the threat of conventional retaliation. Against a nuclear Iran, such deterrence becomes far less credible. As its weak, nonnuclear Persian Gulf neighbors accommodate to it, jihadist Iran will gain control of the most strategic region on the globe.

Then there is the larger danger of permitting nuclear weapons to be acquired by religious fanatics seized with an eschatological belief in the imminent apocalypse and in their own divine duty to hasten the End of Days. The mullahs are infinitely more likely to use these weapons than anyone in the history of the nuclear age. Every city in the civilized world will live under the specter of instant annihilation delivered either by missile or by terrorist. This from a country that has an official Death to America Day and has declared since Ayatollah Khomeini's ascension that Israel must be wiped off the map.

Against millenarian fanaticism glorying in a cult of death, deterrence is a mere wish. Is the West prepared to wager its cities with their millions of inhabitants on that feeble gamble?

These are the questions. These are the calculations. The decision is no more than a year away.

Palestinian PM Accuses U.S. Of Meddling (AP)

By Diaa Hadid, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2006

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas on Thursday accused the United States of undermining efforts to form a new coalition government and he called on Europe to take the lead in lifting international sanctions against the Palestinians.

European diplomats visiting the West Bank indicated formation of a unity government with Palestinian moderates could lead to restoration of vital foreign aid.

Haniyeh spoke a day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the new Palestinian government would have to accept international demands to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

"The U.S. administration does not want the Palestinians to be unified. It puts obstacles in the way of this political coming together," Haniyeh told reporters. "It wants to extort the Palestinian people and the Palestinian government."

Hamas, which has controlled the Palestinian government since March, caved in to the intense international pressure this week and agreed to share power with moderate President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party.

While refusing to give up its calls for Israel's destruction, Hamas has said it will support Abbas' efforts to seek peace. The joint government, which is expected to take several weeks to form, is to be based on a document that calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel — effectively recognizing the Jewish state.

Abbas added conditions to the timetable late Thursday. He said that before formation of a new government, the issue of an Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants in June, as well as Palestinian prisoners held by Israel, must be resolved. Also, he said, there must be "complete calm in the Palestinian territories."

Palestinian leaders hope the compromise arrangement will be enough for donor nations to resume much-needed aid, which was cut off after Hamas took power. The aid halt has caused widespread hardship in the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

With the U.S. maintaining a tough line, the Palestinians are increasingly hopeful that the European Union will be the first to ease the economic siege. A stream of European dignitaries have visited the region this week for talks with Israel and Abbas.

After meeting Abbas in the West Bank city of Ramallah, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy indicated formation of such a government could lead to resumption of assistance. He welcomed the document implicitly recognizing Israel and said if the new government accepts international demands, "the international community should re-evaluate and revisit its position toward political contacts and aid."

The French minister added, "It is obvious that we remain attached to the three principles of the Quartet" of Mideast peace mediators — recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous peace accords.

Abbas also received a boost Thursday from Luxembourg's foreign minister, Jean Asselborn.

"Israel has all the interest to support this initiative and the Americans have all the interest to support it, but first, it is the responsibility of the European Union," Asselborn said after meeting with Abbas. He said he will do everything he can do to support the Palestinians at a meeting of EU ministers in Austria on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0063597

The "Quartet" of Mideast peacemakers — the U.S., EU, Russia and the United Nations — is expected to discuss the Middle East at a meeting in New York next week. The Quartet so far has shown given no indication that it will ease its demands of the Palestinians.

Haniyeh urged Europe to break with the United States. "We expect from the international community, and especially the European Union, to be more balanced and fairer in dealing with the Palestinians," he said.

But in Brussels, EU officials said it was unlikely any major policy changes will take place until the new Palestinian government is formed.

In other developments, the Palestinians said they are sending a senior envoy to Syria to brief President Bashar Assad on the coalition talks. "We listen to them, they listen to us," said the envoy, former Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia.

Syria hosts a number of Palestinian militant groups, including Hamas, and could exert considerable influence over the Islamic group.

Israeli police, meanwhile, said they opened an investigation into three Israeli Arab lawmakers who recently traveled to Syria. The visit came after the end of the recent war with Lebanon, infuriating many Israelis. Syria is a key ally of Hezbollah, the Lebanese guerrilla group that fought Israel.

In Gaza, a 30-year-old unarmed Palestinian was killed by Israeli troops near the border with Egypt, Palestinian security and medical officials said. The Israeli military said soldiers opened fire at a "suspicious" figure who approached troops.

Rights Group Accuses Hezbollah Of 'Indiscriminate' Killing (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 14 -- Amnesty International on Thursday accused Hezbollah of "indiscriminate" and deliberate killings of Israeli civilians during the recent armed conflict in Lebanon, three weeks after accusing Israel of violating international law with "disproportionate" attacks on Lebanese civilians.

The London-based human rights group said its investigations showed that during the 33-day conflict, Hezbollah fired nearly 4,000 rockets into northern Israel, killing 43 civilians, seriously injuring 33 others and displacing hundreds of thousands. It said that about a quarter of the rockets were fired into urban areas and that many were packed with thousands of ball bearings "designed to inflict maximum death and injury."

"The scale of Hezbollah's attacks on Israeli cities, towns and villages, the indiscriminate nature of the weapons used, and statements from the leadership confirming their intent to target civilians, make it all too clear that Hezbollah violated the laws of war," Amnesty International's secretary general, Irene Khan, said in a statement. "The fact that Israel has also committed serious violations in no way justifies violations by Hezbollah. Civilians must not be made to pay the price for unlawful conduct on either side."

The fighting between Hezbollah and Israel began after the militia group crossed into Israel and seized two Israeli soldiers on July 12. The Israeli bombing raids and artillery strikes that followed killed as many as 1,200 people in Lebanon, most of them civilians, while Hezbollah's missile attacks and other operations killed 158 Israelis, most of whom were soldiers. The fighting, the most explosive in years in the Middle East, ended Aug. 14 with a U.N.-brokered cease-fire.

In an Aug. 23 report, Amnesty accused Israel of deliberately killing civilians and destroying Lebanese infrastructure as part of a deliberate military strategy that violated international law.

Israeli officials have repeatedly said that their actions were legal and that their bombing of targets in Lebanon was as precise as possible to minimize civilian casualties.

Israel has accused Hezbollah of intentionally establishing its military bases and conducting operations in areas with large civilian populations to use innocents as human shields to deter attacks. Amnesty said it would investigate those allegations in later reports.

Khan said evidence of violations of international law by both sides creates an "urgent need" for the United Nations to investigate.

"In the conflict between Hezbollah and Israel, the suffering of civilians on both sides has been repeatedly ignored with those responsible escaping all accountability," she said. "Justice is urgently needed if respect for the rules of war is ever to be taken seriously -- and that means accountability for the perpetrators of war crimes and reparations for the victims."

Amnesty said that in meetings with its investigators, Hezbollah officials argued that the militia's rocket attacks on Israel were in response to Israeli attacks on civilians in Lebanon.

"We do not deny that we have bombarded Israeli cities, settlements and infrastructure. But this was always a reaction," Hezbollah legislator Hassan Fadlallah told al-Jazeera television, according to the Associated Press. "It was a natural reaction. When a state is invaded, it must defend itself."

DOJ_NMG_0063598

Inaccurate Map Led To Fatal Strike On U.N. Post, Israel Says (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 14 — The airstrike that killed four United Nations observers in July was the result of the Israeli military's reliance on inaccurate maps, Israel said in a report released on Thursday.

Mark Regev, a Foreign Ministry spokesman, said the report was given to diplomats from Canada, China, Finland and Austria, which each had an unarmed observer killed in the July 25 airstrike in the Lebanese town of Khiam, near Israel's border.

"The findings of the inquiry are that at the time the ordnance was launched, the target we perceived that we were hitting was a Hezbollah military position," Mr. Regev said. "That was a mistake because what was targeted was the U.N. post."

Mr. Regev said that fresh Israeli forces had just been deployed then in the area, where there was intense Hezbollah activity. The change in personnel prompted a need to duplicate maps and charts.

"In that process, unfortunately, the U.N. post was not accurately mapped," he said. "When our aircraft launched its ordnance it believed it was targeting Hezbollah. This was a mistake; it shouldn't have happened."

He said the report detailed Israeli standing orders at the time, which "said unequivocally that it is totally prohibited to target U.N. personnel and U.N. positions."

The United Nations has said that before the airstrike, its observers in Lebanon had telephoned the Israeli military 10 times in six hours to ask it to stop shelling near their position. The strike set off international anger at Israel.

United Nations officials said the observation position was well marked. A picture it released a day after the attack showed the three-story building was painted white and had the letters "U.N." emblazoned in large black letters on all sides.

The United Nations is expected to issue its own report.

U.S. Criticizes China Weapons Sales (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP, September 14, 2006

Top U.S. officials on Thursday criticized what they called China's indiscriminate sale of weapons to rogue countries, suggesting that Beijing's policies had made the world a more dangerous place.

Peter Rodman, assistant secretary of defense for international security, urged China to reevaluate its relationship with Iran and North Korea, two countries with which the United States is locked in standoffs over nuclear weapons development.

"China's actions seem to us dangerously shortsighted," Rodman told the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission, an advisory panel created by Congress. "China's proliferation behavior, past and present, can come back to haunt it, even placing its own political interests in jeopardy."

The United States, Rodman said, sees "in China a general willingness to transfer a wide variety of technologies to customers around the world."

He mentioned Iran, Sudan, Myanmar, Zimbabwe, Cuba and Venezuela, and also linked China to North Korea's July missile test launch of seven missiles and to Hezbollah's use of Chinese-designed cruise missiles on an Israeli naval vessel, also in July.

Rodman said the United States worries that Chinese companies have helped Iran as it tries to establish a self-sufficient ballistic missile production program. China wants to build relations with Iran, Rodman said, to secure access to oil and gas and, potentially, to find ways to control China's restive Muslim population.

China says it opposes the spread of weapons technology and materials and that it forbids Chinese companies from transferring such material. And Rodman said that Beijing has strengthened its nonproliferation efforts by promoting export control laws and its oversight of those laws, but hasn't done enough.

Ukraine Stalls NATO Bid To Build Public Support (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

MOSCOW -- In another sign of the cooling of the Orange Revolution's pro-Western zeal, Ukraine's new prime minister told NATO that his country is putting efforts to join the alliance on hold because of lack of public support for the move.

"We have to take a pause," said Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych, Thursday after meeting with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's chief in Brussels. He said Ukraine would formally launch its bid to join the alliance, but only after a referendum on the issue. "We have to convince society."

Ukraine's backtracking on its aspirations to join NATO is a defeat to the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush, which had hoped a quick entrance of Ukraine into the alliance would tug the former Soviet state decisively closer to the West.

DOJ_NMG_0063599

Ukraine's own slow movement on NATO is likely to also spell problems for the entrance of another former Soviet state, Georgia, into the alliance. Though public opinion in Georgia is strongly in favor of joining the alliance, NATO members in Europe are wary of admitting Georgia without Ukraine coming first.

The Kremlin has lobbied hard against Ukraine's entrance into the alliance. The Kremlin said that Ukraine as a NATO member would be a threat to Russian security and warned Kiev that any movements toward membership would worsen relations.

Mr. Yanukovych was named prime minister last month, after a pro-Western coalition of politicians came to pieces over how to divide positions in the government. Mr. Yanukovych has been advocating closer relations to Moscow, which backed him in 2004 presidential elections that were tainted by vote fraud and reversed by the mass public demonstrations of the Orange Revolution.

Thursday was Mr. Yanukovych's first visit to Brussels since he was named prime minister. After meeting with NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Mr. Yanukovych said that few Ukrainians -- maybe 12% to 25% -- supported the idea of joining NATO. He said that Ukraine shouldn't be forced to make a choice between steering the country to either a pro-Russian or pro-Western course. "We should build a reliable bridge between Russia and the European Union," he said.

Mr. Yanukovych also met with EU External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner and repeated that Ukraine was interested in joining the union. But Ms. Ferrero-Waldner said this wasn't a prospect for the moment.

Besides numerous trade ties with Russia, Ukraine also must worry about its heavy dependence on Russian natural-gas deliveries. Ukraine is in the midst of negotiations with Russia for next year's shipments, and officials have said that a sharp increase in prices by Russia could be ruinous to the Ukrainian economy.

While Mr. Yanukovych has advocated a public campaign to drum up support for NATO within Ukraine, analysts are skeptical that he would ever do such a thing. Ivan Presniakov, an analyst with the International Centre for Policy Studies in Kiev, said that Mr. Yanukovych's government appears to want to delay any serious moves toward NATO membership for at least two or three years, so that it can buy enough time for Ukrainian industry to retool and cope with higher energy prices.

"I don't think that they really want to increase the support for NATO right now," he said. "They want to do is calm the fears of Russia."

Mr. Yanukovych's political party made a strong showing in parliamentary elections earlier this year, after campaigning strongly against NATO membership. This summer his party orchestrated anti-NATO protests that hounded U.S. soldiers out of a southern Ukrainian province.

Ukraine's Yanukovych Halts NATO Entry Talks (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

MOSCOW, Sept. 14 -- Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych of Ukraine said Thursday that his government would suspend negotiations on membership in the NATO alliance, his first major step toward reversing his country's drift away from Russia and toward the West.

"Because of the political situation in Ukraine, we will have to take a pause," Yanukovych told reporters in Brussels after talks with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer and NATO ambassadors. "We have to convince society."

The prime minister, who has said he personally opposes NATO membership, cited insufficient popular support for the step. A recent survey found that 60 percent of Ukrainians are against membership in the alliance, significantly more than support the prime minister and his coalition partners.

Making Ukraine, a former Soviet republic, part of the alliance is a cherished goal of Yanukovych's rival, President Viktor Yushchenko.

In late 2004, the two men competed in a presidential election. Yanukovych, Russia's favored candidate, was initially declared the winner, triggering a street revolt and a new vote that swept Yushchenko into office.

Yushchenko set the country on a firmly pro-Western course, setting off alarm bells in Moscow and the Russian-speaking parts of his own country with a promise to quickly push for Ukraine's membership in the Western military alliance.

Yushchenko had expressed hope that the country could join as soon as 2008, and the issue was scheduled to be discussed at a NATO summit in November.

But the coalition that backed him disintegrated last September, and after parliamentary elections earlier this year, Yanukovych, whose party won a plurality of votes, resurrected himself on the back of his rivals' infighting. He became prime minister in July.

American officials have been enthusiastic about Ukraine's potential membership in NATO. But they have become increasingly worried about the anemic support for the move within the country, Western diplomats said in recent interviews. The prospect of Ukraine joining the alliance is also anathema to the Kremlin and the vast majority of Russians, who regard it as an attempt to encircle and isolate their country.

DOJ_NMG_0063600

Yanukovych stressed Thursday that he was not turning his back on the West. "For the time being, we are looking at enlargement of our cooperation with NATO," rather than membership, he said. "We should be a reliable bridge between the European Union and Russia."

Yanukovych promised to continue supporting internal reforms that "will bring us in the long term to accession of the European Union."

E.U. officials, facing growing skepticism in the bloc's 25 member nations about any further expansion, were reserved, if not cold, to Ukrainian membership but said a free-trade zone could be negotiated.

E.U. External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner said the union had no plans to offer Ukraine membership "at this moment."

Leftist's Backers End Blockade In Mexico City (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 14 — Supporters of a leftist candidate who narrowly lost the presidential election this summer were tearing down five miles of tents on Thursday that have blockaded this capital's central avenues for six weeks.

"It's an emotional situation," Juan Gutiérrez Calva, 45, a street vendor, said as he packed up his tent. "I'm calm. I'm not sad or happy. It was always clear that we were not going to advance much toward a real democracy in this country."

The move signaled a shift by their leader, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, who says he was robbed of an election victory.

Having lost a legal battle for a full recount, and facing a steady defection of supporters, Mr. López Obrador is now striving to find a way to remain a political force over the coming six years, while Felipe Calderón, a conservative, serves as president.

Mr. López Obrador and his aides have organized a mass rally for Saturday, grandly calling it the "National Democratic Convention," where supporters are expected to anoint Mr. López Obrador head of a movement still ill defined that will, among other things, press for a new Mexican constitution.

"This political regime no longer works," Mr. López Obrador said earlier this week. "It's rotten and we must construct something new, and that is what we are going to do at the National Democratic Convention."

In recent days, Mr. López Obrador has decided to lift his blockade in the heart of the capital, which has caused weeks of chaos and tension, and avoid a conflict with the military during its annual parade on Saturday.

The softening of strategy comes as cracks are beginning to appear in Mr. López Obrador's coalition, with the court's decision last week to support Mr. Calderón's election victory.

Now even Mr. López Obrador's aides acknowledge that he is losing some support among middle-class liberals and influential leftist politicians and intellectuals, as Mexicans seem prepared to move on from the election dispute, even if Mr. López Obrador is not.

The founder of his party, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, for instance, published a letter on Thursday accusing Mr. López Obrador and his inner circle of being intolerant of dissent.

"It worries me profoundly, the intolerance and demonization, the dogmatic attitude that prevails around Andrés Manuel for those of us who do not accept unconditionally his proposals and who question his points of view and decisions," he wrote.

And Carlos Fuentes, the giant of Mexican letters, also assailed Mr. López Obrador this week for continuing to insist there was widespread fraud in the election, while he never challenged the elections of his party's members to the Legislature.

"There could have been fraud in the Chamber of Deputies, there could have been fraud in the Senate, but there wasn't," he said. "There was only fraud for the presidency of the republic. How strange, no? I don't believe it."

There have been other signs of weakening support. Mr. López Obrador's party voted down a slate of his closest allies for leadership positions in Congress, choosing the leaders of other factions. Two prominent governors from his party have also recognized Mr. Calderón's victory.

The questioning extends to the voters. Several said in interviews that the prolonged blockade of the city's central avenues and main square, as well as Mr. López Obrador's refusal to concede defeat, only confirmed the accusations of his political enemies that he was autocratic and had little regard for courts or the law.

"It left me with a bad taste in my mouth," said Berenice Malagón, a 27-year-old employee of a cosmetics company. "I know he has a right to protest, but what is not right is to close the avenues and sources of work and generate instability."

Despite the loss of some support, the leftist leader still has enough loyal supporters to make trouble for the government. Politicians in Mr. López Obrador's camp are scrambling to find a way to wield their power in Congress while still supporting him.

DOJ_NMG_0063601

On Thursday morning, three former campaign aides and several leaders of his Party of the Democratic Revolution, along with the Workers' Party and the Convergence Party, announced the formation of the "Wide Progressive National Front."

The politicians said their goal was to help Mr. López Obrador and his supporters in the street achieve their goals in the Congress. The lawmakers must walk a fine line, however.

Mr. López Obrador still maintains the election was fraudulent, but his party has also gained enough seats to become the second largest faction in Congress. Few of those newly elected lawmakers are willing to follow their leader into the political wilderness.

Mr. López Obrador's closest advisers hope the national convention on Saturday, coupled with the formation of the "progressive front" in Congress, is the solution. The scheme allows him to become the leader of what amounts to a shadow government or a permanent protest movement. It gives him a way to criticize Mr. Calderón, push for constitutional change, oppose the sale of state oil reserves and remain in the limelight.

Manuel Camacho, a close adviser, said the idea was to remake Mr. López Obrador, 53, into a civil rights leader, a "symbolic figure on the model of Martin Luther King."

"I see him as a moral leader in this scheme, someone who promotes the interests of the poor, strengthens their rights and will promote a change in political institutions," Mr. Camacho said.

Mexican Leftist Refuses To Back Down (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

USA Today, September 15, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Opposition presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador, responding to his loss to Felipe Calderón in Mexico's closely contested July 2 presidential election, has asked his supporters to attend a political convention on Saturday to decide whether to set up a parallel government.

López Obrador and his followers, who have rejected the results of a partial recount, say democracy here is in danger if what the former Mexico City mayor calls a "new republic" is not created to address the gap between rich and poor.

Critics such as Enrique Krauze, a Mexico City-based historian, say such ideas threaten Mexico's stability and the democratic progress achieved after the country emerged from seven decades of one-party rule six years ago.

"It's a very delicate moment. It still has a lot of uncertainties, because you can never know the possibilities of one charismatic leader leading the masses," says Krauze, who also is an editor of Letras Libres magazine. "You don't need huge majorities to create really serious social strife."

For more than a month, López Obrador and his supporters have occupied Mexico City's main plaza, the Zocalo, and major thoroughfares. Initially, the sit-in was launched to force a recount of all ballots in the election, in which Calderón's final victory margin was just 0.56 of a percentage point.

The protest has strangled traffic and eroded public support for López Obrador. In an Aug. 13 opinion piece in the daily newspaper Reforma, political writer Homero Aridjis described a post-electoral "drunkenness" that has left Mexicans "on the verge of a nervous breakdown."

The purpose of the national convention, which López Obrador spokesman Cesar Yañez claims will draw at least 1 million "delegates," is to decide where the movement should go now that the electoral court has rejected a full recount, threw out claims of widespread fraud and certified Calderón the winner.

They will vote on whether to name a shadow government and parallel president (López Obrador), complete with a Cabinet, though they have not said how they would govern. Yañez says it's unlikely the protesters will continue blocking the streets in the capital.

The convention will test the president-elect, whose narrow margin of victory means most voters backed either López Obrador of the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD), the candidate of the former ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party or two other minor candidates.

Calderón, a member of outgoing President Vicente Fox's National Action Party, received much of the vote from the industrial, richer north, which has benefited from Fox's free-trade policies. Most voters in the rural south and in Mexico City chose López Obrador.

Despite the electoral court's finding that the election was fair, a poll at the end of August released by Mexican research institute GEA-ISA showed 37% of voters believe Calderón won by fraud.

"We are not looking for problems," says Mario Ramirez, 58, of Mexico City. He has been sleeping along Reforma Avenue most nights for more than a month. He says he would be willing to protest for the next six years. "Calderón will never be my president," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0063602

Apparently in response to these sentiments, Calderón is turning his attention to Mexico's poor. “If something demands urgent action … it is taking care of millions of families who still live in poverty,” Calderón said in a speech after the court affirmed his victory.

Dan Lund, a pollster for Mund Americas in Mexico City, says the shadow government proposed by López Obrador could keep the issue of income inequality at the forefront of the national debate and energize the political scene. “It's the most exciting and hopeful period I've seen,” he says.

Calderón also faces opposition within Congress. Three governors — members of López Obrador's PRD from the states of Zacatecas, Michoacan and Guerrero — chose not to appear in a snapshot taken with the president-elect this week at a governors conference. On Sept. 1, Fox was unable to give his state of the union address after PRD legislators blocked the podium. The president was forced to give his last annual address on TV later that night.

“Calderón will have to do some extraordinary things to convince people who believe in what the PRD has said,” Krauze says.

López Obrador's movement could become more powerful depending on other factors, including economic performance. “If oil prices go down, or a semi-catastrophe happens, this appeal from the left in hard times is likely to be much more potent,” says Federico Estevez, a political scientist at the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico.

López Obrador has indicated he wants his supporters to work peacefully. He decided to pull protesters from their encampments in the capital to let the military march in its annual Independence Day parade on Saturday.

To avoid further conflict with López Obrador, Fox won't open Independence Day festivities tonight in the Zocalo. For nearly 200 years, Mexican presidents on Sept. 15 have performed the ritual grito, or cry, to kick off Independence Day celebrations.

Interior Secretary Carlos Abascal said Thursday that Fox will move his ceremony to the small town of Dolores Hidalgo, 170 miles northwest of Mexico City, where Roman Catholic priest Miguel Hidalgo launched the first call for independence from Spain in 1810.

Fox's final grito should have been robust and harmonic: His victory in 2000 heralded a new era in Mexico's transition to democracy.

Instead, his shout could turn into a screaming match. López Obrador has promised to stage a parallel grito that could propel Mexico into a period of discord and even unrest.

IMF Has No Crisis To Manage (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

Less than a decade ago, economists at the International Monetary Fund were jetting into the capitals of countries stricken by financial crises, patching together rescue plans aimed at staving off global economic chaos.

That, after all, was the IMF's chief mission: preserving financial stability. So as currencies plunged, foreign investors fled and defaults loomed in South Korea, Russia, Brazil, Argentina, Turkey and elsewhere, the fund responded with zeal. In tense negotiations, the IMF offered billions of dollars in emergency loans if the governments would make drastic changes in their economic policies.

This weekend, as top economic policymakers gather in Singapore for the annual meetings of the IMF and World Bank, the global environment is dramatically different. The fund's era of crisis-fighting, which lasted until 2002, is a fading memory that staffers swap stories about like war veterans.

Financial markets are buoyant. There's nary a crumbling currency in sight. And middle-income countries in Asia, Eastern Europe and Latin America have accumulated stockpiles of dollars that in some cases exceed the IMF's $227 billion.

The hope of some of the policymakers gathering in Singapore, including those from the Bush administration, is that the IMF will start playing an active role in helping to combat another threat to the world economy -- huge imbalances in trade, specifically the $700-billion-plus U.S. trade deficit and the corresponding surpluses in Asia and oil-producing countries. The fund's experts are also trying to improve their ability to figure out how future crises may arise and encourage countries to take preventive measures.

Doubts abound about whether the IMF can exert much influence over countries that don't need its money; the fund's eat-your-peas advice has often gone unheeded in such cases. And extolling the virtues of pea-eating, important as it may be, leaves some on the fund's staff of 2,700 with a sense of ennui.

"Firefighters don't like to sit in the firehouse," said Mohsin S. Khan, director of the IMF's Middle East and Central Asia department. "If you're in this organization and you've been caught up in the excitement of rushing around to countries helping them fight crises -- well, if there are no crises, you're sitting around wondering what to do."

DOJ_NMG_0063603

In his department, Khan said, wars and high oil prices have created some fascinating challenges. "People are interested in working on Lebanon, Iraq, the West Bank-Gaza -- those are the Brazils and Argentinas of today," he said. But for many others on the staff, "it's the old story about Napoleon. Remember, he said it's tough for an army to sit on its bayonets."

The disappearance of crises is obviously welcome news, Khan and others hastened to add. But in a possible sign of malaise, resignations of IMF economists in 2005 increased about 45 percent over the average of the previous three years. Departures this year are running ahead of last year's pace. IMF spokesmen stressed that turnover is still relatively low, and reasons for quitting may include frustration with the lack of promotion opportunities at an institution that almost never fires senior employees. But several of the recent departees confided that they found their jobs less interesting than before, according to one senior IMF official who spoke to them.

None of this means that the IMF staff is idle. One group of economists trying to anticipate where the next crisis might arise describes its work as highly stimulating; future crises, the economists think, will almost surely be different from the turmoil of the late 1990s and stem from some murky area, probably new and exotic financial instruments for which little data are available.

"This is a moment of investment, when we are trying to strengthen the fire-prevention department," said Carlo Cottarelli, deputy director of the Policy Development and Review Department. "Firefighting is one function, but the main goal of the fund is fire prevention.

"In terms of work intensity, my wife is complaining more than when I was mission chief for Turkey. . . . It's clear, the level of adrenaline is different from a crisis. Thank God. In a crisis, the level of adrenaline can get too high."

If there is one area in which the IMF may soon return to center stage, it is "multilateral surveillance" -- the term the experts use for the fund's role in addressing global imbalances. Echoing many other economic experts, IMF Managing Director Rodrigo de Rato has been warning for some time that as foreigners accumulate vast amounts of dollars from U.S. spending on imports, the risk increases of a sudden, wide sell-off of U.S. currency that could throw the world financial system into damaging disorder.

The tricky question is how the IMF -- with its limited leverage -- can help steer the big players toward steps that are politically painful but are widely viewed as necessary to reduce the imbalances, without triggering a recession. Those measures include a shift in the U.S. economy toward more saving instead of continuing the consumption binge of recent years, and a rise in the exchange rates of Asian countries, especially China, that have become too dependent on exports based on cheap currencies. They also include changes in European regulations that restrain growth, and more spending by Middle Eastern nations of their petrodollars on foreign goods and services.

"It's not that the IMF needs to stand astride all of us wielding a stick," said Timothy D. Adams, U.S. undersecretary of the treasury for international affairs, who has been particularly aggressive in spurring the fund to get involved. "What they need to do is facilitate a conversation and provide general expertise."

Many of the countries with surpluses, Adams said, "will feel more comfortable meeting under the heading of an IMF-sponsored endeavor," responding to the recommendations of international technocrats rather than the hectoring of the U.S. government.

Adams also wants the IMF to tighten its rules on the types of currency systems that member nations can have. That is obviously aimed in large part at the relatively fixed exchange rate of China's yuan, which critics say gives Chinese manufacturers an unfair pricing advantage. In a quid pro quo of sorts, Washington is strongly backing a plan in Singapore to adjust voting power among the IMF's 184 member countries so that fast-growing nations -- including China -- can gain representation on the fund's board that is more commensurate with their economic size.

All that will take time, Adams said, "but this institution is too critical to let it become stale."

Doing Business In Latin America (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

When the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank convene their annual meetings in Singapore in the next few days, they will be eager to discuss a common problem: how to justify their existence in a world that no longer wants or needs them.

The more elegant term for this discussion is "reform" of the international financial institutions, which were born at Bretton Woods more than 60 years ago under the gold standard. In a world of floating exchange rates and open capital markets, the IMF's raison d'être no longer exists. Its "clients" are rapidly repaying their outstanding loans. Macroeconomic accountability has improved world-wide, not because the fund mandates it but because without the guarantee of IMF rescues, investors now impose their own discipline. If hazards remain it is because, with the IMF still hanging around looking for work, future bailouts cannot be ruled out.

DOJ_NMG_0063604

The IMF's sister, the World Bank, is also facing an existential crisis on its lending side. The bankers at the International Finance Corporation, which is dedicated to the private sector, now busy themselves financing big business, a job that ought to be left to the market. The bank's main business of lending to governments in middle-income countries -- that neither seek nor require bank loans -- is drying up. More broadly, foreign aid as a tool for development has increasingly come under scrutiny as wasteful and even counterproductive.

If only the bank would pay more attention to its own research, specifically the annual report titled "Doing Business," which looks at the regulatory policies and tax climate of 175 countries. The 2007 edition was released last week and, not surprisingly, finds that poor countries could be much better off if only they would stop discouraging legal, tax-paying business activity.

When governments make it expensive to operate in the legal sector, small and medium-sized businesses go underground, giving up economies of scale, the benefits of technology and productivity gains. Governments have to rely more and more on large companies for tax revenues and high tax burdens take a toll on competitiveness. Growth rates suffer. Joblessness and poverty persist.

Serious leaders have taken steps to free animal spirits. Much of Latin America has not. In this year's report, as the nearby table shows, the region largely finishes in the cellar. Even Africa outperformed Latin America in its pace of reform this year.

Lest we lose hope, there are a few positive developments to note. Three Latin American countries made the top 10 list of most improved business climates. Mexico is the world's third best reformer (after Georgia and Romania). The report praises Mexico's new securities law that protects minority investors, a streamlined process for business start-ups and a graduated cut in the corporate tax rate to 29% this year from 33% in 2004.

Yet Mexico's corporate tax rate is still too high relative to Eastern European competitors. And even though the country jumped 19 places in its overall rank, it lost ground in important areas such as registering property, international trade and enforcing contracts.

Guatemala and Peru also made the top 10 list of most reformed. But both are still far from exhibiting respect for their entrepreneurial populations. In Guatemala, for example, the bank says that to complete the process of licensing a business takes 23 steps, 390 days and costs 496.47% of income per capita. In the category of "trading across borders," researchers found that importing a container costs $1,985 versus an OECD average of $883. It takes 1,459 days and 36 steps to enforce a contract.

Peru moved up 13 places, but it still ranks a lowly 158th in the regulatory burden of "employing workers" and 135th in "paying taxes." For a medium-sized business to be tax compliant in Peru requires 53 payments, taking 424 hours and costing 40.80% of gross profit. Like its neighbors, Peru doesn't need foreign aid. It needs a leader to take a machete to its red tape.

These countries constitute the good news in the region. The rest of the hemisphere has an even grimmer profile. Costa Rica and Ecuador made zero net reforms over the past 12 months while Venezuela and Bolivia both lost ground. Venezuela dropped 20 places and now has the honor of ranking below Zimbabwe (153). In the "paying taxes" category the survey finds that Venezuelan "entrepreneurs must make 68 payments, spend 864 hours and pay 51.92% of gross profit." To enforce a contract it takes 41 steps and 435 days.

Most troubling for the region is the performance of the South American giant, Brazil. As a middle-income democracy with a young, talented, eager population and a world-class industrial sector, Brazil ought to "get it" by now. But its rankings on paying taxes, starting a business, getting credit and registering property are all worse this year and its overall rank moves up only one place. No wonder the government is always broke and poverty in the favelas is booming.

The World Bank researchers understand that the problem here is politics. They even have some wisdom for would-be poverty-fighters: "In the top reforming economies in the past three years, nearly 85% of reforms took place in the first 15 months of a new government," the report notes. "The message: for a government recently elected (as in Benin) or re-elected (as in Colombia and Mexico), the time to push through ambitious reforms is at the start of its term."

There are at least 10 new governments in Latin America this year and that means there is plenty of opportunity for change. Latin America has taken lots of money from international financial institutions over the years, along with lots of dreadful advice. Now it's time to take note of some sensible guidance, even if that would be bad for those who earn a living shoveling money out the door from Washington.

Russia Shaken By Killing Of Bank Official (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 15, 2006

MOSCOW, Sept. 14 -- The assassination of a senior civil servant who led a campaign to clean up the country's banks drew calls Thursday for a merciless response from the government, as well as hand-wringing over whether Russia is outgrowing the bloody business tactics common in the 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0063605

Andrei Kozlov, 41, first deputy chairman of Russia's Central Bank, was shot Wednesday evening outside a sports complex after attending a soccer match between bank employees. He died early Thursday of his wounds. His driver was killed instantly in the attack, which politicians said was probably a contract killing.

Kozlov was respected in financial circles for his drive to shut down banks that engaged in money laundering and put the deposits of customers at risk through illegal practices. Since January, his department at the Central Bank had revoked the licenses of 44 of the country's roughly 1,200 banks, the Russian news agency Interfax reported.

The confidence of ordinary Russians in the country's banking sector, which plummeted after a financial crisis in 1998, has been growing steadily, and deposits have jumped sixfold in the last four years.

"He was at the cutting edge of the battle against financial crime," said Finance Minister Alexei Kudrin. "He was a very brave and honest man, and through his activity he repeatedly encroached on the interests of unprincipled financiers."

Boris Gryzlov, speaker of the lower house of parliament, said business disputes may have prompted the killing. "A series of banks had their licenses taken away, and it's entirely possible that criminals connected with those structures could have ordered the murder," he said.

Police said they were exploring all possible motives for the killing and reported finding two weapons thrown into tall grass about 200 yards from the scene of the killing. Russian Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika said he would personally supervise the investigation.

The assassination was the first killing of a senior federal official since President Vladimir Putin came to power in 2000. Among other recent assassinations, a regional governor was shot dead in Moscow in 2002, and American journalist Paul Klebnikov was slain in 2004.

As recently as last week at a conference in the resort city of Sochi, Kozlov warned some people in the banking sector that he would continue to target them.

"There is still a large share of suspicious operations in the banking system," he said. "You take part in money laundering, then there might be a ban on your professional activities for the rest of your life. There's no place for this in the banking sector. It disgraces the banking system."

The former head of the Russian Central Bank, Sergei Dubinin, said the killing was a direct assault on the state and on Putin's claim that he has stabilized the country after the chaos of the 1990s.

"The authorities should prove that today's stability is not a mere name," said Dubinin, whose office was fired on in 1996. "This is a challenge to the state's policy in the banking area. The authorities should solve the crime and find not only the actual murderers but also those who ordered Kozlov's assassination." The Kremlin had no immediate comment on the killing.

Former prime minister Anatoly Chubais, who now heads the country's electric utility, said the killing was "a barefaced challenge to all Russian authorities."

"Andrei Kozlov was an unquestionably honest, principled and absolutely noncommercial person," said Chubais, who survived an assassination attempt last year. "This is a case when the authorities must respond in a tough manner, promptly and mercilessly."

Kozlov was married and had three children. He began working at what was then the Soviet Union's Central Bank when he was 24 and spent most of his career, except for short stints in the private sector, in central banking. He had been in charge of banking supervision since 1997 and made the assault on money laundering the centerpiece of his work.

Uganda Peace Hinges On Amnesty For Brutality (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

GULU, Uganda — In the beginning, it was simply called the Acholi war, and despite its brutality, few people outside Uganda paid attention.

The Lord's Resistance Army, a messianic rebel group, was exploring a new dimension of violence by building an army of abducted children and forcing them to burn down huts, slice off lips and pound newborn babies to death in wooden mortars, as though they were grinding grain.

"I killed and killed and killed," said Christopher Oyet, an 18-year-old former rebel who was kidnapped at age 9. "Now, I am scared of myself."

But, for the first time in 20 years, the killing has stopped. The rebel leaders, boxed in and with dwindling support, signed a cease-fire agreement on Aug. 26. Whether it lasts depends on whether Joseph Kony, the phantom rebel commander who is said to live deep in the jungle with 60 child brides, and his top deputies are given amnesty.

DOJ_NMG_0063606

That is uncertain, because they have been charged with crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Court in The Hague. Still, this is the furthest any peace deal has come, fueling hopes that one of Africa's most grotesque and bizarre wars, which cost tens of thousands of lives, may finally be over.

White flags are already fluttering in Gulu, the hub of Acholiland, even from the antennas of government trucks. People are no longer night commuting, the signature north Ugandan exodus from villages to towns every evening for safety's sake. Instead, they are returning to the carpeted green hillsides to plant cassava, corn and beans, and this time their hoes and machetes are being swung to make things grow, not to destroy them.

The victims of this war are so desperate to put the nightmarish days behind them that they want to forgive, just as much as they want to forget. Typical is Christa Labol, whose ears and lips were cut off by bayonet-wielding prepubescent soldiers she now says she would welcome home.

"Only God can judge," Mrs. Labol said through a mouth that is always open.

Of course, the rebels are not out of the bush yet. Many still hide in a remote, lawless corner of northern Congo. Some people wonder if Mr. Kony, who has told his troops he is possessed by spirits, will ever give up.

Mr. Kony has said he will but only if he is not prosecuted.

The International Criminal Court has issued arrest warrants for Mr. Kony and four of his commanders. Ugandan government officials have said they will ensure that the rebels get amnesty if they surrender. But the rebels have said the amnesty must come first. It is an impasse that possibly only the international court can break, but the court, established in 1998, has not indicated what it will do.

"We've never had such a situation," said Claudia Perdomo, a court spokeswoman.

The Acholi people have their own solution. It is the mataput — the word means drinking a bitter root from a common cup — and it is a traditional reconciliation ceremony. Peace is more important than punishment, Acholi elders say, and they would rather have Mr. Kony return to Gulu for a mataput than rot in some European prison. Although the fighting may be over, it seems a new battle has begun: tradition versus modernity.

"In our culture, we don't like to punish people," said Collins Opoka, an Acholi chief. "It doesn't really get you anywhere."

The Acholis know something about punishment. For decades, it was customary for members of southern tribes to get the prized university spots and good office jobs, while northerners like the Acholis were stuck in the fields. The Acholis were known as superstitious — and tough — and filled the ranks of the national army. They fought rebel forces led by Yoweri Museveni, and after Mr. Museveni seized power in 1986 — he has been president since — the Acholis were marginalized and persecuted.

Enter Mr. Kony, a former Catholic altar boy revered in his village near Gulu as a prophet since he was 12. He smeared himself with shea butter, said his body and those of his Acholi followers were impervious to bullets and vowed to overthrow the government.

"We saw him as our savior," said Mary Olanya, who knew Mr. Kony growing up.

Mr. Kony claimed to be guided by the Ten Commandments but soon his army was violating each and every one.

From about 1988 on, the rebels terrorized their own people, raping, robbing and killing across Acholiland. According to former rebels, Mr. Kony communed with spirits and his rules became stranger by the minute — anyone caught bicycling had to have his feet chopped off; all white chickens were to be destroyed; no farming on Fridays.

Few adults wanted to join his cultish, bloodthirsty movement, and soon the only recruits were children, most against their will.

Mr. Oyet said he was snatched one night nine years ago from his hut near Gulu and forced to march miles into the bush. The boys whose feet swelled and could no longer walk were clubbed to death — by other boys. All new recruits had to help with the killing. It was called registration. The population responded to the rebel violence by seeking safety in numbers. Nearly two million people abandoned their villages and crowded into government camps. "It was a desperate time,'' said Quinto Otika, a Gulu elder.

And it continued for years, nourished by the Arab-led government of Sudan, which gave the rebels arms and sanctuary as payback for Ugandan support for the Christian rebellion in southern Sudan.

But by 2002, the Sudanese government was making peace with southern separatists and no longer supporting the Lord's Resistance Army.

Mr. Kony — and his bodyguards and harem — fled to Congo, where, according to Ugandan military sources, they set up a slave kingdom, living off the land and slaughtering wildlife. By then, the elusive rebel army had shrunk to a shadow of a shadow, with fewer than 2,000 fighters left. The West mostly ignored this war, more focused on Rwanda, Somalia, and Darfur, Sudan. But in 2005, the Ugandan government persuaded the international court to issue arrest warrants against rebel leaders, despite pleas from Acholi elders.

DOJ_NMG_0063607

In Acholi culture, killers are accepted back into the community after they have paid compensation, admitted to their misdeeds and shared a meal, usually a roasted sheep, with the relatives of their victim. This is the mataput ceremony, and it comes from the days when clans were tightly intertwined by marriage and trade and could not afford to alienate one another.

The Ugandan government eventually warmed to the idea and signed a cease-fire with the rebels that took effect on Aug. 29. Since then, some rebel soldiers have emerged from hiding. They plan to assemble at collection points in southern Sudan, where they will wait until a full peace agreement is reached.

Though some United Nations officials have bristled at the idea of granting immunity to Mr. Kony and his top commanders, Ugandan officials say they are confident a deal can be reached.

"We can go to the judges and say there are new circumstances and that the indictments are no longer needed," said a Ugandan government spokesman, Robert Kabushenga.

People are already beginning to wonder what Mr. Kony will do if he comes home a free man.

"He never aspired to be a politician," said Florence Adokorach, now in her early 20's, who was kidnapped at age 14 and forced to be one of Mr. Kony's brides. Instead, he told his young wife, he just wanted to return to spreading God's word.

Property Deeds OfficeMax Thwarts Families' Attempts To Tap Cuba Funds (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

In February, nearly 45 years after two American men were executed by Fidel Castro's government, their families were on the verge of collecting $88.5 million in damages from Cuba's long-frozen U.S. accounts.

Then the relatives of Howard Anderson and Thomas "Pete" Ray ran up against an unexpected obstacle: OfficeMax Inc.

The office-products giant, founded in 1988, didn't exist at the time of the Cuban revolution. But in 2003 the company was purchased by Boise Cascade Corp., a paper-products company that adopted the OfficeMax name. Through a 1960s acquisition, Boise Cascade took a majority stake in Cuban Electric Co., which owned most of Cuba's pre-Castro electricity systems. As a result, OfficeMax today controls the largest single U.S. claim against the Cuban government for property confiscated after the 1959 revolution.

The U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission, an arm of the Justice Department, has certified nearly 6,000 U.S. claims for property seized by Cuba. Claimants hope that after the reign of Fidel Castro ends they can recover their homes, factories, beachfront land and sugar plantations believed to be valued at $6.7 billion today. To settle some claims, they also expect to gain access to more than $268 million in Cuban assets -- largely held in U.S. banks -- that were frozen under the Kennedy administration's Cuban embargo.

Most citizens and businesses will likely have to wait years to recoup any losses. In the mid-1990s, a coalition of U.S. companies, including OfficeMax's future parent, put pressure on the Clinton administration to settle its members' numerous claims with Cuba -- with no luck.

But thanks to special antiterrorism laws passed in 1996 and 2002, a few families have been able to leapfrog to the head of the line. The legislation helped permit relatives of Messrs. Anderson and Ray to seek, and ultimately win, wrongful-death judgments in Florida state courts, with a federal judge in January clearing the way to tap into the frozen Cuban funds.

OfficeMax wasn't pleased with the news. In March, the company filed court papers in New York U.S. District Court, Southern District, seeking to block the Ray and Anderson relatives from collecting.

Robert Muse, a Washington, D.C., lawyer who represents Cuban Electric and OfficeMax, says the dead men's families shouldn't be given first dibs on the accounts. "I'm not trying to be provocative," Mr. Muse says. "That money was sequestered for the purpose of paying [restitution] claims."

Janet Weininger, a daughter of Mr. Ray, says she is outraged at the latest roadblock to gaining justice for her father's execution. "I don't understand why a company like OfficeMax would act like this," she says.

An OfficeMax spokesman said the company doesn't comment on litigation. The Cuban Interests Section, the country's de facto embassy in Washington, didn't respond to requests for comment on the cases.

Renewed Interest

Fidel Castro's recent health troubles have sparked renewed interest in the property seized after Cuba's communist revolution. The battle between OfficeMax and the two families offers a taste of much larger struggles likely to come.

Mr. Castro's government has floated the idea of Americans returning and kicking residents out of their homes -- many of which were taken over to shelter multiple families. The issue is so sensitive that many Cuban-American community leaders and the White House say it is best left for a future democratic government in Cuba to resolve.

President George Bush's Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba said in a report this year that the U.S. government "can reassure the Cuban people that the U.S. government will not support any arbitrary effort to evict them from their homes."

DOJ_NMG_0063608

The Cuba claims case is unusual. Historically, the U.S. government has blocked access to frozen foreign funds -- including cases against Saddam Hussein-era Iraq. But a powerful Cuban-American voting block in Florida has managed to win preferential treatment under both the Clinton and Bush administrations.

In 1996, Congress swiftly passed the special law allowing U.S. citizens to file domestic lawsuits against foreign countries that commit terror attacks. The measure was introduced to benefit the families of three men who died that same year when Cuban military jets shot down civilian planes operated by a group called Brothers to the Rescue. Relatives of a fourth man who died couldn't benefit because he wasn't a U.S. citizen. Based in Miami, the activists were known for flying missions over the Florida Straits to spot refugees for rescue at sea.

After suing the Cuban government, the Brothers to the Rescue families won a federal court judgment to unlock some of the Cuban funds. From there, the group's attorneys subpoenaed various banks around the country in search of the dozens of frozen Cuban accounts. In 2001, they collected a total of about $97 million. Most of that sum was drawn from accounts at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.

That successful outcome prompted lawyers for the Anderson and Ray families to seek to qualify under the same narrow provisions of the U.S. antiterrorism laws.

Mr. Anderson was on trial in April 1961 -- accused by the Castro government of smuggling guns to anti-Communist rebels -- when U.S.-backed expatriates launched the Bay of Pigs invasion. During the attack, Cuban antiaircraft guns brought down a bomber piloted by Mr. Ray, a 30-year-old Central Intelligence Agency contractor. Both men eventually were executed: a firing squad for Mr. Anderson; a single shot to the temple for Mr. Ray.

For years after Mr. Ray's execution, U.S. and Cuban authorities revealed little about what had happened to him. Beginning at age 15, in 1970, Ms. Weininger says she wrote monthly letters to Mr. Castro seeking information about her father's body. She says she wrote repeatedly for nine years without receiving a response.

Mr. Ray's family later found out that his corpse was being kept frozen at a Havana morgue and, according to the family, periodically exhibited as a war trophy. It wasn't until 1979, after some diplomatic wrangling, that a black wooden coffin containing Mr. Ray's remains were returned for burial in Alabama.

Dorothy Anderson McCarthy, Mr. Anderson's 84-year-old widow who later remarried, wishes to see the Cuban government pay for her husband's death before she dies.

Tall and athletic, Mr. Anderson was stationed in Havana during World War II, where he met and married Dorothy, the 20-year-old daughter of American parents who lived in Cuba. The couple led a well-to-do life, raising four children. In the aftermath of the 1959 revolution, Mr. Anderson evacuated his family, along with his mother, to Miami. Mrs. McCarthy says she left Cuba "with a $5 bill, one suitcase and one watch."

The family acknowledges that Mr. Anderson, 41 at the time of his death, carried CIA messages to anti-Castro groups in Havana. He wasn't a paid American intelligence agent, they say, but he did take radios to the island to help support an underground anti-Castro movement. His family further asserts that at the time of his arrest, he was in Cuba only to attempt to prevent the expropriation of his family's small chain of gas stations and other businesses.

In his last letter to his wife from a jail cell in Cuba's Pinar del Rio province, Mr. Anderson said his fate was sealed. As his trial began, air-raid sirens could be heard outside the courtroom -- the opening salvos of the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion during which 1,500 CIA-trained Cuban exiles unsuccessfully tried to foment rebellion against Mr. Castro's government.

"It is unfortunate that this invasion took place, as under normal circumstances I am sure that the tribunal would not have been ruled by passion but by their own revolutionary laws," Mr. Anderson wrote in neat, square letters. "I hope and pray that you and mother will forgive me for the troubles that I have caused...especially this present big one." He was executed four hours later.

Now living in a retirement apartment complex in Florida, Mrs. McCarthy can recite from memory the transcribed words of the prosecutor who tried her husband in April 1961: "This American will die for everything that he has done. He doesn't deserve the death penalty, but he will receive it because perhaps from his blood something better will grow."

Mrs. McCarthy sued Mr. Castro's government in 2001, and Ms. Weininger followed in 2003, both in Florida state courts in Miami. Lawyers for the families argued that the Cuban government was liable for the torture and wrongful deaths of their relatives.

Emotional Testimony

In emotional testimony, family members described brutal executions suffered by their loved ones. Across the courtroom, the table typically reserved for defendants -- in this case the Cuban government -- sat empty. As has been its practice in recent years, the Cuban government ignored the lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0063609

State courts in Miami issued compensatory default judgments of $67 million for Mrs. McCarthy in 2003, and a year later $21.5 million for Ms. Weininger. Ms. Weininger won an additional $65 million in punitive damages, which under current laws are much more difficult to collect.

With judgments in hand, lawyers for the families filed claims in federal courts to access Cuban government funds anywhere in the U.S. They ended up in U.S. District Court in New York, where accounts at J.P. Morgan Chase still hold the bulk of the Cuban funds. The bank asked the court to rule that it wouldn't have any liability if it complied with court orders to pay the claims. A spokesman for J.P. Morgan Chase, which is named in the suit, declined to comment on the case.

This year, federal Judge Victor Marrero joined the two cases and asked for any final objections from the Cuban and U.S. governments, as well as from any claimants believing they had rights to the blocked funds. The Cuban government didn't respond and the U.S. government declined to intervene -- effectively signaling no objection to the payments.

That is when OfficeMax entered the picture. Cuban Electric, the corporate name by which OfficeMax identifies itself in court papers, argued that at the time of the executions of Messrs. Anderson and Ray, Cuba wasn't on the U.S. government's list of state sponsors of terrorism. The State Department added Cuba to the terror list in 1982, after the U.S. accused the Castro government of aiding Colombian guerrillas.

In his "friend of the court" brief filed in March, the attorney Mr. Muse argued that the relatives of Messrs. Anderson and Ray "were never entitled to the Florida state court judgments" they won.

Joseph DeMaria, Mrs. McCarthy's attorney in Miami, says only the Cuban government -- not OfficeMax -- can challenge the judgments in the case. He disputes OfficeMax's assertion that the frozen Cuban assets were intended to settle expropriation claims. Leon Patricios, attorney for Ms. Weininger, says the company "should have properly intervened in this case when it was filed."

A ruling from the federal judge in New York assigned to the families' case is expected soon.

When news broke in August of Mr. Castro's illness, Gary Anderson, the eldest son of Howard Anderson, was worried Mr. Castro might die.

"I honestly hope Fidel is OK, because I would like our case to come to some sort of conclusion while he is still alive," says Mr. Anderson, who owns an industrial supply company in Houston. "I would like Fidel to know that he's paying."

Growing Pains Booming Municipalities Defy China's Effort To Cool Economy (WSJ)

By Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2006

ZHENGZHOU, China -- The new musical fountain in this drab provincial capital in central China demonstrates why authorities in Beijing are having so much trouble controlling the world's fourth-largest economy.

Jets of water dance to the patriotic anthem "Love My China," while laser beams shoot into the sky. Soon, the fountain will be overshadowed by a hotel styled after a classical Chinese pagoda, which, at 918 feet, will be nearly three-quarters as tall as the Empire State Building. A waterfront arts complex, almost completed at a cost of $100 million, looks like a clutch of enormous duck eggs. Nearby, a newly opened conference center resembles an unfurled umbrella. An exhibition hall boasts the biggest stretch of free-standing roof in Asia.

Mayor Zhao Jiancai says his vision is to transform backward Zhengzhou into the "Chicago of the East" -- a gateway between the booming coast and the vast interior -- by more than tripling the city's size. Total investment in the area around the business district could hit $35 billion. It is a huge amount of money for the capital of Henan province, one of China's poorest.

"We can only make achievements with scale," says the mayor, a former tractor factory engineer.

A similar dynamic is at work across China. Local governments are encouraging a frenzy of construction to boost their economies -- even as China's central government seeks to throttle back investment that is producing runaway economic growth. The economy expanded 11.3% in the second quarter of this year from the same period a year earlier, far outstripping the government's target of 8% for the whole year.

Many developing countries would gladly trade places with China: Most suffer from too little investment, not too much. And they worry more about spreading slums than expanding skylines.

Nevertheless, hyper-investment keeps roiling the world's fastest-growing major economy. Concerns are mounting that the boom could cause property bubbles that weigh down banks with bad debt when they burst. It also could clog railway lines and ports and trigger brown-outs as overloaded power grids collapse. Already, it is generating outsize demand for energy and raw materials, pushing up the cost around the world.

The International Monetary Fund, which is meeting Tuesday and Wednesday in Singapore, this week urged China to rein in credit to avoid "tipping off a boom-bust cycle."

DOJ_NMG_0063610

Though inflation remains low at 1.3%, China's top leaders are worried. Almost every day, they issue edicts to slow economic growth -- with little effect. Leaders can't even be sure how much municipalities are spending because local finances have become so murky. According to official figures that many economists believe understate the true total, fixed-asset investment rose 21.5% in August from a year earlier. While that growth rate was slower than the 27.4% of July, total annual investment as a percentage of gross domestic product, the total value of all goods and services produced in a nation, still is much higher than Japan, South Korea or Taiwan managed to sustain even during their giddy years.

If inflation takes hold, as some economists expect, the effects would be felt globally. Since China is the world's third-largest trading nation, inflation could ripple to the U.S. and other countries through rising prices for its exports. That would complicate the efforts of the U.S. Federal Reserve and other major central banks trying to head off rising inflationary pressures.

More than a quarter century of economic overhauls has produced a striking contrast in China: Politically, the Communist central government maintains a tight grip over the entire country; economically, it is losing control.

Caught in a Trap

China's leaders are caught in a trap as they cast around for ways to rein in investment. The old administrative methods -- ordering state banks to stop lending, restricting land sales, halting government approvals for major projects -- aren't working as well as before, partly because local governments are defying Beijing.

Trying to enforce investment curbs in a vast country is a tough challenge: Beijing has resorted to using satellite images to spot bulldozers working on illegal construction projects in far-flung provinces. The economy, says Andy Xie, an economist in Hong Kong with Morgan Stanley, is too big and complicated to manage through fiat.

On the other hand, market-oriented measures to slow economic growth, such as raising interest rates, aren't likely to be as effective in China as in more sophisticated economies. One reason is that local bankers still are susceptible to political pressure to extend loans. Also, state-run companies make a habit of not repaying loans, so the cost of funds often is irrelevant. Much of the corporate investment is funded out of company savings.

Already, the big state banks have ignored Beijing and dished out almost all the loans they were targeted to extend for the whole year. The Ministry of Land Resources announced recently that in some cities as many as 90% of all government land acquisitions are illegal.

To be sure, an economy expanding at double-digit rates sooner or later will likely find uses for much of the infrastructure -- highways, bridges and power plants -- that local governments are installing. But when the latest investment boom unwinds, there are concerns that Chinese cities will be littered with white elephant industrial projects that will stand empty for years.

"It's mindless," says Wang Lina, a researcher at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, a leading think tank, who says local governments are generating large amounts of wasteful investment.

About 10% to 20% of all investment in China is made by local governments, according to World Bank economist Louis Kuijs, who is based in Beijing. That figure understates their influence. For instance, it doesn't include investment by real-estate developers that are nominally private but often act as agents for local authorities.

Under China's former socialist economy, central planners in Beijing doled out investment funds under an annual quota program -- so much for the railroads, for the power industry, for steelmakers. China's central government grabbed local revenue and redistributed the cash around the country to pay for further investment as well as government services.

This started changing in 1978, when Deng Xiaoping launched economic overhauls that made local governments responsible for delivering growth to their own communities. Economic growth has become the path to career glory for city mayors, like Zhengzhou's Mr. Zhao, who now are driving the national economy to an unprecedented extent. Hong Liang, an economist in Hong Kong with Goldman Sachs, compares modern Chinese cities to corporations, and their mayors to chief executive officers, all competing with each other to expand their business empires.

There are good reasons why China's cities need to expand. Each year, they have to accommodate at least 10 million peasants flooding in from the countryside. Increasingly, cities also have been forced to fund their own health, education and social-welfare programs.

These financial pressures all feed into higher rates of investment, which is the quickest way for cities to expand their economies and increase their revenue.

Economic Giants

Cities in China have ballooned into economic giants. If Shanghai were a country, it would be among the 40 largest economies in the world. Its economic output last year of $114 billion was bigger than the Philippines or the Czech Republic. Shenzhen, in southern China, has an economy much larger than Vietnam's.

Still, many question whether local spending has become excessive. Zhengzhou's new conference hall, for instance, boasts a theater with seats that can be individually climate-controlled. Its vast foyer is clad in shimmering Italian marble.

DOJ_NMG_0063611

Zhengzhou's drastic makeover is typical of those under way in cities around China. Shanghai led the way in the early 1990s by setting out to build a national financial and commercial hub on a stretch of rice paddy in an area called Pudong.

Over the years, Shanghai's urban plans have become ever more fanciful. It now is building a series of satellite cities -- each themed after a European country -- to relieve pressure on the city center. Anting, which aspires to be a car-making hub, is re-creating the pastel-colored apartment blocks and Bauhaus offices found in the German city of Weimar. It has even splurged on a Formula 1 race track.

Nearby, the emerging college city of Songjiang turned to a British engineering consultancy to construct an English-style community called Thames Town. There, residents can choose to live in Victorian terraced houses, drink in pubs and marry in a church whose spire rises over cobblestone lanes.

In March, Premier Wen Jiabao unveiled a five-year economic blueprint to steer China in a new direction. Instead of go-for-broke growth that has blighted the environment and widened social divisions, China would pursue more-balanced development. Still, growth is running at its fastest pace in 12 years.

China's leaders sought to curb credit by pushing through two interest-rate increases. They have taken funds out of the banking system by raising reserve requirements -- money that commercial banks must deposit with the central bank rather than lend out -- and slapped new taxes on real-estate transactions.

The two interest-rate increases this year have been too incremental -- each only 0.27 percentage point -- to have a real impact, economists say. Lending rates still are only around 6%, low for an economy expanding 14% in nominal terms, not taking into account inflation. By contrast, U.S. rates are at 5.25% -- up from 1% more than two years ago -- in an economy now expanding around 3%.

Compounding the problem is the way local governments are forced to fund their investments. China's central government doesn't allow them to raise local taxes or issue debt. Instead, they are cashing in their most valuable asset -- land. The sale of land now accounts for 40% to 60% of all local government revenue, according to Ms. Wang of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences.

This dynamic adds momentum to the geographical expansion of cities. To acquire more land that they can sell, cities simply redraw their boundaries to engulf the surrounding farms. The compensation they pay to farmers for the land is far less than its value to developers. When the city flips the land, the revenue isn't part of regular budgets that can be audited by Beijing.

Zhengzhou, an ancient city on the Yellow River plains of central China, has long been an underachiever. Its 1950s-era textile mills are laying off workers. It has shuttered some of its grimy aluminum works on Beijing's orders to cut back on overcapacity. One of its few claims to fame is that it makes a third of all the frozen dumplings sold in China.

With a population of just two million, it considered itself too small to drive the economy of China's most populous province, with roughly 100 million people, let alone make a national impact.

So in 2001, city authorities hired the acclaimed Japanese architect Kisho Kurokawa to draw up blueprints for the new urban area after an international competition. Zhengdong New District covers 58 square miles -- somewhat bigger than San Francisco. The plan will double the size of the city and add 1.5 million people to the existing population. It received the blessing of the State Council -- China's cabinet -- in 1995.

By 2020, Mr. Zhao says, additional enlargement will turn Zhengzhou into a city of five million covering 193 square miles.

Most of the investments will be made by companies rather than the government, says Mr. Zhao, 50, who sports red ties and slicks back his hair. Bank loans will pay for some infrastructure as well.

The skyline of the central business district eventually will be populated by 60-odd commercial and residential towers. The first are already in place and waiting for tenants to move in.

Radiating outward will be arrayed the industries and services of Zhengzhou's future: banking and finance, insurance, logistics, high-technology manufacturing and higher education. "It's the most advanced urban concept in the world," says Vice Mayor Wang Qinghai, who is directly responsible for the construction of the Zhengdong New District. Land prices have quadrupled in two years.

Mr. Wang says Beijing has given the go-ahead to projects covering only about 20% of the planned new area. That is holding up plans for a man-made island on a lake to house dozens of luxury apartments.

Elsewhere, there are few signs building momentum is slowing. The city's own glossy publicity materials boast that Zhengzhou has one of the highest densities of construction cranes operating in China.

Does Zhengzhou have a shot at becoming the "Chicago of China"? True, it sits at a railway crossroads between the main north-south and east-west lines, a major asset in a country where most goods still are moved by train. But there is plenty of competition from other central cities, including Wuhan farther south, as well as Nanchang, the fast rising capital of Jiangxi province.

DOJ_NMG_0063612

Mayor Zhao says he is untroubled by the competition. "We all have our strengths," he says. "We'll fly together wing-to-wing."

The Energy Harvest (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 15, 2006

São Paulo, Brazil

Any time that OPEC got a little too overzealous in pushing up oil prices back in the 1970's, the legendary Saudi oil minister Sheik Ahmed Zaki Yamani was fond of telling his colleagues: Remember, the Stone Age didn't end because we ran out of stones.

What he meant was that the Stone Age ended because people invented alternative tools. The oil age is also not going to end because we run out of oil. It will end because the price of oil goes so high that people invent alternatives. Mr. Yamani was warning his colleagues not to get too greedy and stimulate those alternatives.

Too late — oil at $70 a barrel has done just that. One of the most promising of those alternatives is ethanol, an alcohol fuel made from corn, sugar cane or any biomass. I came to Brazil to try to better grasp what is real and what is not in the ethanol story, because no country has done more to pioneer sugar ethanol than Brazil.

My impression, after talking to a range of Brazilian experts, is that not only is ethanol for real, but we have not even begun to tap its full potential. With just a few technological breakthroughs, Brazil really could be the Saudi Arabia of sugar and we could actually achieve that energy dream of getting "barrels from bushels."

Since the 1970's oil shocks, Brazil has, with lots of trial and error, made ethanol part of its daily life. It hits you the minute you drive into a gas station in São Paulo, where you need two things: a credit card and a calculator. In rough numbers, sugar ethanol now sells here at a little over $2 a gallon and gasoline at a little more than $4 a gallon. Because sugar ethanol gets only about 70 percent of the mileage of gasoline, drivers here do the math each day and figure out if ethanol is at least 30 percent less than the price of gasoline. If it is, many will fill 'er up with sugar cane.

Brazilians have that luxury because there are 34,000 gas stations here that offer both gasoline and ethanol (compared with around 700 in the U.S.) and because 70 percent of new cars sold here can run on either gasoline or sugar ethanol. As a result, Brazil has replaced about 40 percent of its gasoline consumption with sugar ethanol.

I visited the Cosan sugar mill northwest of São Paulo, Brazil's largest, where you fly in over an ocean of green sugar cane. The cane is harvested onto big lorries and trucked to the Cosan distillery. There, the juice is extracted and converted to either crystal sugar or ethanol. The remaining cane waste — called bagasse — is used to fuel huge steam boilers that produce enough electricity to both power the refining process and leave a surplus to be sold back to the grid.

It's important to understand this process to appreciate just how "much more energy we could get from sugar cane" with just a few more breakthroughs, explained Plinio Mario Nastari, one of Brazil's top ethanol consults.

Think of each stalk of sugar cane as containing three sources of energy. First, the juice extracted from the cane is already giving us ethanol and sugar. Second, the bagasse is already heating very low-technology, low-pressure boilers, giving us electricity. But if Brazil's refiners converted to new high-pressure boilers, you could get three times as much electricity.

Finally, when the cane is harvested the tops and leaves are often just left in the field. But this biomass is rich in cellulose, the carbohydrate that makes up the walls of plant cells. If the sugar locked away in cellulose also could be unlocked — cheaply and easily by a chemical process — this biomass could also produce tons of sugar ethanol. There is now a race on to find that process.

A breakthrough is expected within five years, and when that happens it will be possible to extract "more than double" the amount of ethanol from each sugar stalk, said José Luiz Oliverio, a senior V.P. at Dedini, the Brazilian industrial giant, which has a pilot cellulosic ethanol project.

I asked Brazilian experts what they'd do if they were the U.S. president. The consensus answer: Require U.S. oil companies to provide ethanol fuel pumps at all their gas stations, require U.S. auto companies to make all their new cars flex-fuel and improve mileage standards, and get rid of the crazy 54-cent tariff we've imposed on imported sugar ethanol (to protect our farmers). And then let the market work.

Demand for ethanol would soar. This would push us faster down the innovation curve, so we'd solve the cellulosic ethanol problem quicker, and that would strengthen the democrats in our hemisphere and weaken the petrocrats in the Middle East. If only we were as smart as Brazil ...

DOJ_NMG_0063613

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Friday, September 15, 2006 10:42 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 9/15/06 Civil Division News

Muslim air safety expert sues government over suspension

Two Kuwaiti prisoners return from Guantanamo

Management changing at hospital

Nursing Home Chain Will Pay $20 Million to Settle Fraud Case

Judge Nixes Wellbutrin Suit Against FDA

N.H. one of states getting money from GlaxoSmithKline

Pledge Challenger Newdow Claims Web Scribe Defamed Him

AP

September 14, 2006

Muslim air safety expert sues government over suspension

By WAYNE PARRY

Associated Press Writer

NEWARK, New Jersey_An Egyptian-born aviation security pioneer is suing the U.S. government, claiming he was wrongly suspended from his job at a Transportation Security Administration technical center based on a classified FBI file the government will not let him see.

Wagih H. Makky, who lives in Maryland, filed a lawsuit Thursday in U.S. District Court in Newark, claiming he was harassed and discriminated against at work after the Sept. 11 terror attacks based on his nationality and his Muslim religion.

The lawsuit claims Makky is one of the world's leading experts in designing and evaluating technology to prevent explosives from being smuggled onto airplanes and rail cars.

"In many instances, the dangers of the post-Sept. 11 world require a careful balance between two compelling but competing interests: American values and the security of the American people," his lawyers wrote in the lawsuit. "In this case, these interests are perfectly aligned. Dr. Makky has devoted his career as a TSA engineer to protecting the American people from terrorist attacks.

"Dr. Makky's suspension not only betrays the core American values of equal treatment and fair process, but also compromises the security of the American people by depriving them of the expertise of one of their ablest security technicians," they wrote.

The lawsuit names the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, Secretary Michael Chertoff, and other government agencies and individuals as defendants.

A Homeland Security spokesman did not immediately return a call seeking comment Thursday.

Makky, 55, came to the United States 30 years ago and has since become a U.S. citizen. Following the bombing of a Pan Am jet over Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed 270 people in 1988, Makky was chosen to create a special technical unit within the Federal Aviation Administration to focus government efforts on preventing terrorist attacks on American airliners.

He has written numerous books on aviation security, and has lectured at conferences around the world on the topic. He could not be reached for comment Thursday.

He most recently worked as an electronics engineer at the TSA aviation center outside Atlantic City.

According to the lawsuit, when a new supervisor took over in 2002, the first question he asked Makky upon meeting him was about his ethnic background. On the day in March 2003 that the U.S. began its invasion of Iraq, the supervisor placed him on administrative leave and told him not to come to work.

The action was based on a classified FBI file that the supervisor kept locked in a safe, and would not show to Makky, according to the lawsuit. Although Makky had held security clearance for 15 years, including "top secret" clearance for 10 years, he was informed in January 2005 that his clearance was being revoked.

In August 2005, Makky was suspended without pay, and remains suspended.

Makky asked for the entire FBI file under the Freedom of Information Act, but only received limited portions of it, according to the lawsuit. He does not know what derogatory information could be included in it, but noted that he had participated in peaceful demonstrations against the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Although the Egyptian government refuses to recognize renunciation of citizenship by its nationals who become citizens of another nation, Makky considers himself solely an American, according to the lawsuit.

The lawsuit alleges several instances of bias against Makky.

"Dr. Makky was later told by the very person who hired him that it was a mistake to hire someone of Arab descent," his lawyers wrote. "Another supervisor, speaking with several employees, including Dr. Makky, about the possibility of a terrorist attack by Islamic fundamentalists, opined that 'Muslims have no brains.'"

END

AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE ENGLISH WIRE

September 15, 2006

Two Kuwaiti prisoners return from Guantanamo

KUWAIT CITY, Sept 15, 2006 (AFP) - Two Kuwaiti nationals released from the US prison at Guantanamo Bay on Cuba returned home Friday after being held for almost five years, the head of a detainee group said.

The men were brought back aboard a special Kuwaiti plane and were immediately hospitalised for a checkup, Khalid al-Oudah, head of the society of families of Kuwaiti prisoners in Guantanamo, told AFP.

"The two appeared tired after the long journey. One of them seems to be suffering from minor health problems, but generally they were better than the previous inmates" released, Oudah said.

The two were allowed to meet with their families soon after arriving at the military hospital, he said. It was not immediately known for how long they will remain there.

Oudah named the two former Guantanamo inmates as Omar Rajab Amin and Abdullah Kamel al-Kundari.

The Pentagon announced Wednesday that the two men, who were held at the prison since early 2002, had been transferred to Kuwait.

It said they were among about 130 detainees recommended for transfer or release by a review board.

Kuwait said Sunday Amin and Kundari would be tried in the emirate under an agreement reached during a visit to Washington last week by Emir Sheikh Sabah al-Ahmad al-Sabah.

Of a dozen Kuwaitis held at Guantanamo since early 2002, eight have now been transferred or released.

Oudah said the US and Kuwait are currently negotiating at foreign minister level to secure the release of the remaining four captives, who include his son Fawzi.

Five of the six former inmates who returned to the emirate were cleared by Kuwait's appeals court while a sixth was sentenced to five years in jail. The verdicts must be approved by the supreme court to become final.

About 455 people are currently held at Guantanamo Bay, a naval base on Cuba where the US has detained and interrogated 750 prisoners since early 2002 in its "war on terror" after the attacks on New York and Washington the previous September 11.

END

The Monitor (McAllen, TX)

Sept. 15, 2006

Management changing at hospital

Kyle Arnold
Monitor Staff Writer

EDINBURG — A rehabilitation hospital tied to a federal Medicare fraud lawsuit has closed down and set to be replaced by another hospital group.

Cornerstone Rehabilitation Hospital is partially owned by Dr. Raul Marquez, the orthopedic surgeon federal prosecutors say defrauded the federal government by making false Medicare reimbursement claims.

Now, Cornerstone Rehabilitation Hospital is gone and phone calls to the facility are answered by another group, Solara Hospitals McAllen.

Marquez, who holds ownership interest in the Cornerstone medical facilities and owns his own clinic, did not return repeated telephone calls for comment Thursday. And a spokeswoman for Cornerstone Regional Hospital would not comment on the rehabilitation facility.

Solara Hospitals is an Oklahoma-based group with operations at McAllen Medical Center. Its rehabilitation hospital is a separate company that Solara officials say will now take over the space on North McColl Road.

Cornerstone Rehab had been used for orthopedic care but now will be used for general long-term care, said Rick Knowland, CEO for Solara Hospitals McAllen.

He said the change had been in the works for a few months after new Medicare rules stopped payments for long-term orthopedic care.

"We took over on September 1st," Knowland said.

Knowland said "a handful" of Cornerstone's employees will stay on with Solara.

In a lawsuit filed earlier this month in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas, prosecutors said Marquez used Cornerstone Rehabilitation Hospital and Cornerstone Regional Hospital to commit the frauds.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston alleged Marquez billed Medicare for procedures he never performed, as well as for procedures more expensive than those actually conducted.

The lawsuit against Marquez alleges he sent patients home from his practice, the Orthopedic Surgery Center, when they were in fact sent to one of the Cornerstone facilities. That would insure Marquez a higher reimbursement than sending them to another hospital.

In May 2004, FBI agents raided Marquez's office in connection with a Medicare fraud investigation. But it is unclear if that raid was connected to this lawsuit because the court documents are sealed.

END

Andrews Publications

Sept. 14, 2006

Nursing Home Chain Will Pay $20 Million to Settle Fraud Case

By ROBERT WOODMAN MCSHERRY, Andrews Publications Staff Writer

National nursing home chain Beverly Enterprises Inc. has agreed to pay the federal government and the state of California $20 million to settle an investigation into a former subsidiary's billing practices.

A pre-suit settlement agreement released by the U.S. Department of Justice Aug. 18 says subsidiary MK Medical submitted false claims for unspecified durable medical equipment to Medicare and to California's Medi-Cal insurance program from October 1998 until August 2002. MK Medical is no longer in business.

Medicare is America's national health program for the elderly and disabled, while Medi-Cal provides health and nursing home coverage to low-income Californians.

The investigation was conducted by the FBI, the Department of Justice and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California in San Francisco.

"Health care fraud is one of the priorities of this office," San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan said in a statement. "We are committed to pursuing allegations of fraud against federal health care programs and to safeguarding federal funds against false claims."

According to the statement, MK Medical billed Medicare and Medi-Cal for durable medical equipment without first obtaining certificates of medical necessity as required by the government health programs. The certificates must be signed by a doctor.

"The United States alleges that, in numerous instances, the certificates of medical necessity in MK Medical's files were incomplete, had been altered or had been filled in by MK Medical personnel in areas reserved for physicians," Ryan said.

According to the settlement agreement, Beverly will pay the federal government nearly $14.5 million; Medi-Cal will receive an additional payment of about $5.5 million.

"This agreement reflects the government's determination to prevent fraud and abuse by ensuring that health care providers comply with program safeguards regarding critical documentation," Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler said in the statement.

END

The Associated Press
09-15-2006

Judge Nixes Wellbutrin Suit Against FDA

By Matthew Perrone

A U.S. District Court judge has opened the door for generic drug companies to market competing versions of Wellbutrin, a popular anti-depressant drug, made by Biovail Corp. The company had been asking the Food and Drug Administration not to approve generic versions of the drug.

The Canadian drug maker's request for a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction against the FDA to prevent it from granting market approval of generic versions of Wellbutrin was characterized by analysts as a last-ditch effort. The judge's decision, filed last week in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., clears the way for Irvine, Calif.-based Anchen Pharmaceuticals to release the first competing version of the drug.

"Every day means additional revenue for Biovail, so they'll try anything to keep generics off the market," BMO Capital Markets-Canada analyst Christine Charette said. In fiscal 2005, Biovail recorded $354.2 million of revenue from Wellbutrin.

Anchen received "tentative approval" from the FDA in November 2005 but was barred from launching the drug until the resolution of a patent-infringement case between the company and Biovail. That case was resolved last month when a U.S. District Court judge in California ruled that Anchen had not infringed the Biovail patent.

Biovail's suit against the FDA argued that the agency had not adequately addressed concerns raised in a filing to the agency last December. In that filing, Biovail said generic Wellbutrin might contain chemicals known to cause seizures, which would threaten patients and hurt Biovail's reputation.

The FDA responded in June, saying it would need additional time to consider the petition because it raised "complex issues requiring extensive review." U.S. District Court judge Ricardo Urbina ruled that this "tentative response" adequately fulfilled the agency's legal obligations. He concluded that Biovail did not show how the marketing of generic Wellbutrin would cause the "irreparable injury" needed to justify a restraining order.

Anchen and Biovail representatives declined comment.

Shares of Biovail rose 22 cents to close earlier at $14.95 on the New York Stock Exchange.

END

AP

September 14, 2006

N.H. one of states getting money from GlaxoSmithKline

CONCORD, N.H._New Hampshire is one of several states that have finalized a settlement with pharmaceutical manufacturer GlaxoSmithKline to resolve allegations that the company improperly inflated the average wholesale price for certain drugs, the attorney general's office said Thursday.

Glaxo has agreed to pay states $23 million in damages resulting from the allegedly improper pricing data. New Hampshire's share is more than $85,000.

The issue concerned Glaxo's reporting of wholesale price data fro two of its drugs, Kytril and Zofran, which are injectable anti-nausea drugs used in connection with chemotherapy.

Glaxo allegedly increased the reported prices for the two products to create a "spread" between what purchasers paid and what federal and state health programs would pay. The "spread" could then be marketed as an inducement to physicians or other drug purchases to choose Glaxo products.

END

The Recorder
09-15-2006

Pledge Challenger Newdow Claims Web Scribe Defamed Him

Mike McKee

Sacramento, Calif., atheist Michael Newdow took plenty of grief from conservative commentators two years ago when he tried unsuccessfully to get the words "under God" taken out of the Pledge of Allegiance.

But being called a liar in an online column was more than he could stand -- and a Northern California minister could pay the price.

This Monday, Newdow -- who's both a lawyer and an emergency room physician -- is scheduled to appear in San Francisco's 1st District Court of Appeal to argue that his libel suit against the Rev. Austin Miles should be allowed to proceed.

Newdow claims that Miles -- a self-described "interdenominational chaplain" who writes conservative columns posted on the Internet -- defamed him by accusing him of committing perjury before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals during the pledge case. Specifically, Newdow claims Miles accused him, in posts on two news service sites, of telling the court his young daughter suffered emotional distress as the result of being forced to recite the pledge in her classroom. Newdow insists he never said that.

Instead, he says, he only argued that children, including his daughter, are unduly influenced when a state-run school leads them in a ritual proclaiming the existence of God.

"Had Miles done as any reasonable person would have done -- i.e., simply read the 9th Circuit's panel decision before writing his article," Newdow wrote in court papers, "he would have quickly appreciated that his 'view' ... was 100 percent wrong."

The 9th Circuit in 2002 agreed with Newdow's claim that the pledge, as recited in public schools, violated the First Amendment's establishment clause. But two years later, the U.S. Supreme Court tossed Newdow's suit, voting 5-3 that he didn't have standing to bring it in the first place.

Since then, Newdow has pursued the merits of his arguments by representing an unnamed "Roe" client in challenging the pledge again. That case is now pending before the 9th Circuit, as is a separate case of Newdow's challenging the inclusion of the words "In God We Trust" on American money.

In his case against Miles, Newdow won a $1 million default judgment in Superior Court in June 2004 after Miles failed to respond to the initial complaint. That judgment was later set aside, though, after the trial court found that Miles, through no fault of his own, had no actual notice of the suit.

Immediately thereafter, Miles filed a motion to strike Newdow's libel suit as an attempt to block free speech. Contra Costa County Superior Court Judge Steven Austin denied that motion last year.

On appeal, Miles' lawyers -- Edward White III, associate counsel at the Thomas More Law Center in Ann Arbor, Mich., and Stockton, Calif., attorney Mark Thiel -- contend their client has shown his online comments were protected speech involving an issue of public interest.

To overcome that presumption, they argue in court papers, Newdow -- as an admitted public figure -- would have to show by clear and convincing evidence that Miles acted with actual malice. White and Thiel contend Miles' comments were based on information from other sources that he believed were accurate.

"When all is said and done," the two argued, "the dispute here is one of semantics and not of malicious falsehood."

That's not what Newdow believes. He even accuses Miles of making up quotes purported to be Newdow's own words.

"This man has no compunction whatsoever about disseminating falsehoods and persisting in flouting the law," Newdow, who is representing himself, wrote in court documents. "His meaningless claim that Newdow must have said something, somewhere -- 'on an Internet site ... or during television interviews' -- that could be used to support his fabrication is nothing but drivel."

Newdow also argues his default judgment should be reinstated, contending Miles actively hid to avoid being served the suit. Newdow says he tried service by mail, made two attempts through a professional service company and hired a licensed private investigator, all to no avail.

"The court will see," he wrote, "that the only inference that can be drawn from the evidence in this case is that Miles sneered at our judicial system and intentionally avoided service."

Miles' lead lawyer, White, couldn't be reached for comment.

Newdow, contacted in his Sacramento office, said Monday he mainly wants to clear his name.

"I think many people think that what he wrote was true," he said. "I'd like to restore my reputation."

The case is Newdow v. Miles, A109660.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, September 18, 2006 8:12 AM
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, September 18, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060918.pdf; agnb060918.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

White House, Senate Holdouts Say Compromise Possible On Detainee Bill 4
US Said To Hold 14,000 Detainees In Overseas Prisons....8
Chambliss' Comparison Of Civil War, War On Terror Draws Fire 8

Homeland Response:

BioShield Setbacks Threaten Deal To Produce Anthrax Vaccine 8
Fish Used To Monitor Water Supplies....8
"Path To 9/11" Writer Says He Has Received Death Threats ...8
Freedom Tower Project Makes "Progress." 8

War News:

US Working To Establish Secure Perimeter Around Baghdad 9
Sunni Politician Assassinated; Dozens Of Bodies Recovered ..9
Anbar Tribes Reportedly Have Formed Coalition To Fight Al Qaeda....10
Casey Says Iraq Needs 12 To 18 Months Before It Can Take Over Its Own Security 10
Deadly Bombings Kill Twenty-Four In Kirkuk 11
Suicide Bombers Kill Three Iraqi Police Outside US Base In Fallujah 11
Iraqi Police Uncover Large Munitions Cache Near Basra....11
US Has Held Iraqi AP Photographer Since April Without Charging Him....11
Kimmitt Optimistic About Iraq's Economic Recovery Plan 12
Minister Analyzes US Christians' Response To War In Iraq ...12
NATO Hails Afghan Offensive, But Violence Continues....12

DOJ:

DOJ's "Institutional Memory" Profiled....13

Corporate Scandals:

Sentencing Of Several Enron Officials Slated For This Month 13
Hewlett-Packard Faces Deadline To Turn Over Documents Related To Snooping Scandal 13

Criminal Law:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Charges Linked To Abramoff Scandal 14
Former New Jersey State Senator Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes....14
Aryan Brotherhood Leaders Avoid Death Penalty....15
Miami Seniors Press For Federal Action On Rising Medicare Fraud....15
FBI Documents Detail Disgraced Philly Consultant's Fund-Raising Prowess....16
Gotti Lawyer Makes Closing Arguments....16
High Court To Consider Murder Conviction Overturned By 9th Circuit....17
Review Reveals Flaws In National Security Contracting Procedures 17
Armitage Revelation Has Reconfigured Plame Leak Case 18
Few Police Departments Require Four-Year Degrees....18
Kidnapping Victim Found After Sending Text Message....18
Police Seek Gunman After University Shooting....18
National Guard Joins Search For Kidnapped Baby 18

Civil Rights:

Key Witness Says FBI Ignored Exculpatory Comments In Boston Police Brutality Case 18

Antitrust:

MAN AG Embarks On Bid For Scania AB....19
AOL Agrees To Sell German Internet-Access Unit....19

Environment:

Investigators Search For Source Of E. Coli Outbreak....19

Associates Offer "Complex" Portrait Of Alleged Long Island Polluter 20
Boehlert Calls For Increase In CAFE Standards 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico Extradites Drug Cartel Suspect To US 20
Suspected Drug-Smuggling Tunnel Found Along US-Mexico Border 21
San Diego County Challenges California's Medical Marijuana Law 21
In Michigan, Federal Law Credited For Drop In Gun Crimes 21

Immigration:

DHS Set To Designate Contractors For Secure Border Initiative 21

Tax:

IRS Cracking Down On Partisan Activity By Religious Groups 22
Refund-Anticipation Loan Practices Facing Legal, Regulatory Challenges 23

Congress-Administration:

New High Court Term To Feature Controversial Cases 23
Hardiman Tapped For 3rd Circuit Vacancy 23
Paulson Said To Be Returning Treasury To "Top Tier" Status 24
Earmark Reform Languishing In Senate 24
Boehner Clarifies Comments On Democrats' Commitment To War On Terror 25
USPS Granted Official Two Month Vacation Despite Allegations Of Improprieties 25
Transportation Department Official Charged With Using Stolen Funds For Escort Services 25
Report Lists Six Key Trends For Overhauling Government Operations 25
First Lady To Headline Opening Of Clinton Global Initiative . 25
Colleagues Praise Hyde's Accomplishment As International Relations Chair 26
Senate Urged To Approve General Officer Promotions 26
NYTimes Urges Census Bureau To Change The Way It Counts Inmates 26

Other News:

Dow Nears Record High Set In 2000 26
Democrats Plan To Attack GOP On Economic Issues 27
Polls Show GOP Closing Gap, Bush's Approval Rating Higher 27
Republicans Hope 2000 Redistricting "Firewall" Will Protect Some Endangered Seats 28
At Iowa Event, Obama Says Democrats Need Tougher Line On National Security 29
Allen And Webb Clash Over War In Iraq 29
Burns Facing The "Toughest Test Of His Career." 31
Republicans Still Hopeful That McGavick Can Unseat Cantwell 31
Senate Candidates Not Required To Submit Electronic Campaign Finance Reports 31
Opponent Tries To Capitalize On Reichert Fundraiser With Rove 31
Graf Win Raises Questions About GOP's Immigration Strategy 32
Mehlman's RNC Said To Be Outperforming DNC 32
Wesley Clark To Take Position At UCLA 32
WPost Urges Universities To Eliminate Early Admissions 33
US Showdown With Iran Seen As Increasingly Likely 33
Hezbollah Leader Plans Celebration Of "Victory" Over Israel . 35
Pope Expresses Regret That His Comments Sparked Violence In Muslim World 35
Rise Of Islamists Said To Be Destabilizing Mideast Governments 35
Abbas, Hamas Suspend Unity Government Talks 36
Administration, Business Groups Said To Stymie Darfur Divestment Bill 36
Far-Right Party Wins Representation In East German State .. 37
Conservatives Win Swedish Elections 37
López Obrador Proclaims Himself President-Elect, Will Lead "Parallel" Government 38
IAEA Concerned About Terrorists' Access To Serbian Nuclear Site 38
US Officials Said To Have Bungled Chinese Spy Ring Case 38
US, Europe Seek To Push Up Exchange Values Of Asian Currencies 38
China Competes With West To Aid Asian Neighbors 38
Afghan Finance Minister Expected To Enter Race To Replace Annan 39
Foreign Service Officers Say DSS Abuses Security Clearance Process 39
IMF Expected To Approve Overhaul Today 39
Colombian "Peace Communities" Disavow Any Contact With Armed Groups 39
US' Human Rights Efforts In Equatorial Guinea Called "Low Key." 39
NATO Official Praises Unified Missile Defense 40
WSJournal Says WHO Has "Come To Its Senses" On DDT .. 40

DOJ_NMG_0063625

WPost Praises Rockefeller, Gates Foundation Efforts In Africa 40

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 40

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 41

DOJ_NMG_0063626

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House, Senate Holdouts Say Compromise Possible On Detainee Bill. CBS News Radio (9/18) reports this morning, "There is a change in the battle between the Bush White House and three respected Republicans over the war on terror. The senators who want no retreat from the Geneva Conventions are signaling a willingness to compromise. Among them John McCain on ABC's This Week." McCain: "Absolutely the talks are continuing. I have supported this President in the war on terror. I have supported him in the war in Iraq. I think he is a friend, I hope he considers me a friend. I believe we can sit down, we can work this out." CBS added, "The White House insists it is not looking to redefine the Geneva Convention rules on prisoner detention and interrogations nor does it want to legalize torture." National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley: "The President is very clear, this not about torture. This is about a program that is going to be professionally run by people who have been highly trained."

ABC World News (9/17, story 5, 0:25, Harris) reported last night that "there are hopeful noises about ending a rather extraordinary showdown between President Bush and some powerful senators from his own party. … Today, both sides say they are confident they can reach some sort of compromise."

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 4, Jordan, 9.87M) reported, "On the Sunday talk shows, talk of compromise on the issue that's loudly split the Bush Administration and several key Senate Republicans." Stephen Hadley, National Security Advisor: "We need to find a way through that obstacle course. I think we can." Sen. John McCain: "I believe we will be able to work this out to the satisfaction of everybody concerned." NBC added, "Another sign Senate Republicans are trying to find a solution tomorrow staffers from Chairman of the Judiciary Committee will be meeting with Senator McCain staffers."

The New York Times (9/18, Sanger, 1.21M) runs a story titled "Compromise Called Possible On Interrogations," in which it says Hadley "is negotiating with…McCain…and other Senate leaders over the administration's proposal, which would give the C.I.A. permission to use "alternative" techniques when interrogating terrorism suspects. … Asked if he believed compromise was possible, Mr. Hadley said, 'I do.' He said it was essential that 'we continue to have this terribly important program for protecting the country, as the president requires, that gives the men and women who carry out this program clear guidance and clear Congressional support, and also achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change Common Article 3,' referring to the Geneva Conventions." The Times adds, "Other administration officials said it became clear over the weekend that the administration was going to have to give ground. 'I don't think anyone anticipated the avalanche of opinion that would be assembled on the other side of what seemed like a pretty abstruse legal issue,' one official said, speaking on condition of anonymity as he was not authorized to discuss the issue with a reporter." USA Today (9/18, Diamond, 2.27M) runs a similar story under the headline "Compromise On CIA Interrogations Possible," while the AP (9/18, Pickler) reports, "The Bush administration and holdout GOP senators expressed confidence on Sunday they could reach a compromise on rules for CIA interrogations of suspected terrorists."

The Washington Times (9/18, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Sen. Lindsey Graham "agrees with Mr. McCain on the issue and said the administration and Congress are closer than some observers think. 'I think we can get there from here,' Mr. Graham said." The Times adds, "'Fox News Sunday' moderator Chris Wallace noted that many of those opposed to the administration's plan, including Mr. Graham, Mr. McCain and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, all have military combat experience. In contrast, many of the plan's supporters, including Mr. Bush, do not."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, Chaddock, 58K) says that "for now, the GOP revolt in the Armed Services Committee is giving cover to Senate Democrats, who don't want to head into another midterm election tagged with being weak in the war on terror." Yesterday, Sen. Mitch McConnell "said it would be awkward for Democrats to 'go home and explain a vote...to shut down an intelligence program that we know has helped save lives.'"

USA Today (9/18, Kiely, Johnson, 2.27M) runs a "Question and Answer" background report on the legislation, in which it says "the House of Representatives has scheduled a vote on the president's plan for this week and is likely to approve it. The Senate is more likely to approve the competing Armed Services Committee bill. If that happens, House and Senate negotiators would have to work out the differences." The Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M), in an editorial, makes a similar point, "The good news is the Senate is not the last word on this debate. The House is likely to endorse the Administration's preferred language this week, and a bill that emerges from conference may be a compromise the CIA can live with. The government's ability to protect Americans using the vital tool of interrogation depends on it."

DOJ_NMG_0063627

Newsweek (9/25, Hirsh, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports that "recently Bush administration officials, in private negotiations with the Senate, have agreed to drop waterboarding from a list of approved CIA interrogation techniques, according to a Senate source involved in the dispute. … The Bush administration wants to maintain seven other approved CIA interrogation methods, however, for use against suspected high-level terrorists, according to one congressional source and a lawyer involved in the negotiations." Newsweek also reports, "Scott Horton, a New York City Bar Association lawyer who has advised the Senate on the legislation, says Capitol Hill aides have told him that the CIA has sought to use the following techniques: (1) induced hypothermia; (2) long periods of forced standing; (3) sleep deprivation; (4) the 'attention grab' (the forceful seizing of a suspect's shirt); (5) the 'attention slap'; (6) the 'belly slap'; and (7) sound and light manipulation." Time (9/25, Calabresi, 4.03M) provides a brief description of the terrorism bills being considered by lawmakers.

Graham Says A Compromise Is Still Possible. Time (9/25, Tumulty, Bacon, 4.03M) reports, "White House and congressional leaders had hoped that focusing on terrorism in the final months before a tight midterm election would give their party an advantage over the Democrats. But they didn't count on a rebellion in their own ranks, made worse by the fact that it is led by [Sen. Lindsay] Graham and two more senior members of the Armed Services Committee who also have impressive military credentials: chairman John Warner, a former Secretary of the Navy who was a Marine ground officer in the Korean War, four years before Graham was born; and John McCain, a former Navy pilot whose father and grandfather were admirals and who still suffers from what he endured during 5 1/2 years in a North Vietnamese POW camp." Time adds, "The showdown on the Senate floor, where majority leader Bill Frist is expected to introduce the President's proposal, is not likely to be pretty." Graham "insists that there are still ways to work out a compromise, although both sides appear to be digging in. 'I share the President's goal of pursuing a CIA program that would protect us and operate within the rule of law,' he told TIME. 'And I will work with him to achieve that.'"

Negroponte Says Legal Uncertainty Has Diminished Use Of Interrogations. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte was asked on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace) if the CIA is currently unable to interrogate detainees "because intelligence officers are unwilling to risk being charged with war crimes." Negroponte answered, "There's been precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now and certainly since the Supreme Court decision." Negroponte noted that a terrorism suspect "may be questioned, but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques that the president was referring to the other day may be problematic because of the uncertainty that has been introduced by the current situation. So all these patriotic, professional agents are looking for is the kind of clarity to ensure that they will not be violating the law when they carry out these interrogations." Asked if the legislation, "as passed by the Senate Armed Services Committee and drafted by Warner and McCain and Graham, is unacceptable," Negroponte replied, "the director of the CIA tells me that, if it were passed in that form, he does not believe it would be possible for the program to go forward. And I accept his judgment on that." The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Miller, 918K) runs a story on the detainee bill in which it focuses on Negroponte's TV appearance, which it says "was part of a campaign by the Bush administration to defend a CIA program in which high-ranking Al Qaeda operatives had been held in secret prisons abroad and subjected to interrogation methods that critics contend are tantamount to torture."

Hadley, Senators Outline Their Stance. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, also on ABC's This Week (9/17, Stephanopoulos), said, "What we're talking, in terms of Common Article 3, is a minimum set of standards that would apply to what's called unlawful combatants, people like Al Qaida terrorists. And let's be clear who these people are. These are people who don't wear uniforms, who hide among civilian populations and, quite frankly, use war crimes, killing innocent civilians as a tactic. So let's be clear what we're talking about here. Nonetheless, notwithstanding the fact these are people who don't detain Americans on the battlefield; they kill them, we have said that we are going to provide the kinds of standards of treatment that are in the Detainee Treatment Act, sponsored by Senator McCain, approved by the Congress in December of last year. … It's interesting that the Department of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the director of Central Intelligence, the agencies whose men and women are on the front lines on the war on terror and are at risk every day, support this legislative approach we have proposed."

DOJ_NMG_0063628

On CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), Hadley added, "The most important thing here, and the question before the Congress and the American people is -- do we want a program run by the Central Intelligence Agency that questions these Al Qaida terrorists? … If so, we need to give clear guidance to the men and women who run it. And if you don't want the program, then you explain why you're willing to give up a tool which really has gotten more information about Al Qaida and made more of a contribution in preventing attacks on this country and our troops abroad than almost any other country."

Appearing on CNN's Late Edition (9/17, Blitzer), Hadley singled out a provision barring "humiliating treatment," saying, "I'm saying that nobody knows what humiliating treatment is. What does it mean? And the concern is that these people are being asked to take on very tough assignments. They want to be clear as to what is required, and they want it to be interpreted by U.S. law, not by opinions of European courts or other courts."

McCain, asked on ABC's This Week (9/17, Stephanopoulos) to respond to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's contention that "interpreting" the Geneva Conventions "is accepted practice in international law," said, "Of course it's not -- when we ratify a treaty…that was the time to, quote, 'interpret,' or make reservations. … The Vietnamese treated us rather badly for quite a period of time. That didn't mean that the United States of America wanted to interpret the Geneva Conventions any other way. In fact, they insisted that the Vietnamese treat us under those, and indeed for reasons that are still not clear to me, it was improved." McCain added, "We have to hold the moral high ground. We're the nation that people look up to. We can't lower our standards because others do. … There is a war that we are losing in some ways, as General Powell pointed out, and that's our standing in the world because of our treatment at Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo, et cetera. We have to keep the moral high ground."

On CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), Graham said, "What I would like to do is give our president the tools that we need to defend ourselves, an effective CIA program, where our agents can't be prosecuted for war crimes ill-defined; they can't be sued and lose their houses because they're doing their job; they can defend themselves in court if they're ever accused of doing something, by saying, 'I was following orders.' … If it's seen that our country is trying to redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of the CIA, why can't every other country redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of their secret police? It would be a disaster."

Sen. Arlen Specter, also on CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), added, "I agree with senators Graham, Warner and McCain that you cannot have classified information which is not shown to the defendant. I agree with them that you cannot use coerced confessions because they're unfair and unreliable. I disagree with senator McCain, Graham and Warner and the president trying to eliminate habeas corpus. That is, judicial review, because we have so many complicated matters. When you come to the Geneva Convention, we have to follow the Geneva Convention. But what I'm looking for is a way to accommodate both interests, and I think that is possible."

During his appearance on CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), Democratic Sen. Carl Levin commented, "We cannot claim that we are abiding by international treaties such as the protections in Geneva that protect our troops if we decide unilaterally that we're going to modify Geneva. And the problem with this administration is that it's had this unilateral approach to law and to many other things in this world, and it's coming back to haunt us. And if we modify Geneva unilaterally, it's going to come back to haunt us, because other countries are going say, 'you people don't live up to obligations. What we saw at Abu Ghraib is what the CIA is all about, and don't complain when we treat your people the way you treat detainees.'"

On CNN's Late Edition (9/17, Blitzer), Sen. Evan Bayh said, "We can be true to the Geneva Convention, but we can do it by amending the War Crimes Act to give clarity to our agents so they can conduct these intelligence interrogations, get the information we need to protect our country but protect our own people and be true to our own values in the process."

Responding to Bayh's comment, Sen. John Cornyn, also on CNN's Late Edition (9/17, Blitzer), said, "I'm glad to hear what he said. … But I do think it's going to take more than amending the War Crimes Act because when the Department of Justice passes judgment on whether an interrogation technique is lawful or unlawful, they're going to look at the whole range of laws, not just the War Crimes Act, to determine that. That's why we need the clarity that would be provided by the Detainee Treatment Act."

DOJ_NMG_0063629

McCain Said To Be Risking His 2008 GOP Frontrunner Status. Fox News' Brit Hume, appearing on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace), said, "I might add this about McCain, that he is seeking the Republican nomination for president of the United States. It's pretty clear. He's supposedly the frontrunner. Another week of this, he won't be the frontrunner. In fact, I would say if this ends in some kind of a confrontation in which he, quote, 'wins,' I think his chances of becoming the nominee of the Republican Party are basically out the window."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, also on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace), asked, "Do we think if we polled the soldiers in Iraq, they would be with McCain on this, not with Bush? I rather doubt it. This is an issue of how tough we can be on the very few high- value terrorists whom we choose to have the CIA interrogate. It has nothing to do with the military treatment of other military prisoners. And on this issue, I think the country is with Bush. I think the enlisted men in the military are with Bush. And Bush is going to win."

The New York Times (9/18, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports McCain "on Sunday flew to New Hampshire -- and right into a blistering editorial from the conservative Manchester Union-Leader that assailed him for standing up to President Bush on the issue." McCain "responded with a spirited defense, invoking his experience as a prisoner of war as he vowed to block the White House effort." McCain said, "The United States has always been better than our enemies. I'll tell you right now: one of the things in prison, in North Vietnam, that kept us strong was that we knew we were not like our enemies. That we came from a better nation, with better values, with better standards." The Times adds that after "months of orchestrated peace, the battle with Mr. Bush over the administration's effort to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions has put Mr. McCain back into a familiar position: bucking the White House and at odds again with some conservatives, who had already been wary of his ideological views." The dispute is "shaping up as an early chapter in a shift of influence in the Republican Party away from Mr. Bush as he approaches the final two years of his administration, and toward its presidential nominee of 2008. And it is spotlighting divisions in the party as prospective presidential candidates jockey for support from the conservative wing." Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts "said in an interview that he disagreed with Mr. McCain, and offered a forceful endorsement of Mr. Bush."

Relatives Of 9/11 Victims Urge Senate To Reject Bush Bill. The AP (9/18, Pickler) reports "34 relatives of Sept. 11 victims released the text of a letter they had sent to senators asking them to fight Bush's proposal. The family members said they do not believe 'that it is in the interest of the United States to create a system of military courts that violate basic notions of due process and lack truly independent judicial oversight. Not only does this violate our most cherished values and send the wrong message to the world, it also runs the risk that the system will again be struck down, resulting in even more delay' in prosecuting terrorists, the relatives wrote.

Krugman Claims Torture "Appeals To The President And The Vice President." Paul Krugman, in a column titled "King Of Pain," writes in the New York Times (9/18, 1.21M), "I haven't seen much discussion of the underlying question: why is Mr. Bush so determined to engage in torture? … So why is the Bush administration so determined to torture people? To show that it can. The central drive of the Bush administration -- more fundamental than any particular policy -- has been the effort to eliminate all limits on the president's power. Torture, I believe, appeals to the president and the vice president precisely because it's a violation of both law and tradition."

More Commentary. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (9/18, 1.21M), "Bush, Cheney & Co. are desperately trying to hold together a house of cards that is ready to collapse because their strategy and tactics for fighting terrorism were slapped together with no real regard for the rule of law. What we've seen over the past few years has been a nightmare version of the United States. Torture? Secret prisons? Capital trials in which key evidence is kept from the accused? That's the stuff of Kafka, not Madison and Jefferson."

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, writes in the Washington Post (9/18, A17, 748K), "The Soviets understood that these methods were cruel. They were also honest with themselves about the purpose of such cruelty -- to brutalize their enemies and to extract false confessions, rather than truthful intelligence. By denying this, President Bush is not just misleading us. He appears to be deceiving himself."

DOJ_NMG_0063630

US Said To Hold 14,000 Detainees In Overseas Prisons. In a 2,230-word analysis piece, the AP (9/18, Quinn) reports, "In the few short years since the first shackled Afghan shuffled off to Guantanamo, the U.S. military has created a global network of overseas prisons, its islands of high security keeping 14,000 detainees beyond the reach of established law." The AP continues, "Captured on battlefields, pulled from beds at midnight, grabbed off streets as suspected insurgents, tens of thousands now have passed through U.S. detention, the vast majority in Iraq. Many say they were caught up in U.S. military sweeps, often interrogated around the clock, then released months or years later without apology, compensation or any word on why they were taken." Many experts told the AP "the detention system often is unjust and hurts the war on terror by inflaming anti-Americanism in Iraq and elsewhere." Some practices have been curtailed, and "living conditions for detainees may be improving as well," but the AP adds, "Whatever the progress, small or significant, grim realities persist."

Chambliss' Comparison Of Civil War, War On Terror Draws Fire. Roll Call (9/18, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Sen. Saxby Chambliss "argued last week that the South could have won the war between the states if the Confederates had just had better intelligence. During Thursday's closed-door Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on trials, interrogation and detention of foreign terrorism suspects, Chambliss made an analogy between the current war on terror and the Civil War. He made the point that history would have been altered dramatically if only the South had had better intel. Democratic sources expressed outrage that he compared the Civil War to the Bush administration's war on terror."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

BioShield Setbacks Threaten Deal To Produce Anthrax Vaccine. The New York Times (9/18, Lipton, 1.21M) reports on "Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion effort" to build a national stockpile of new drugs and vaccines that critics say "has largely failed to deliver." The "most acute" problems have come with the project's "$900 million push to add a new anthrax vaccine to the stockpile. What had begun as an effort to test and manufacture a safer, faster-acting vaccine has turned into an ugly battle between two biotech businesses. Each has hired Washington lobbyists to attack its rival's product and try to win over lawmakers and administration officials. Delivery of the new vaccine is far behind schedule, and a dispute between the Department of Health and Human Services and VaxGen, the company chosen to make the vaccine, could even end the deal."

Fish Used To Monitor Water Supplies. The Washington Post (9/18, A8, Lee, 748K) reports on the bluegill's new task of "keeping vigil over the Washington region's water supplies, where it might be able to save millions of lives in the event of a terrorist attack." The fish "are a key component of the IAC 1090 Intelligent Aquatic Biomonitoring System, a new water-monitoring device that electronically analyzes the behavior of eight captive bluegills to detect the presence of chemical toxins or other contaminants." The system, also in use in New York City and San Francisco, "automatically trips an alarm, takes samples, and summons authorities by e-mail and pager" if it detects signs of stress in the fish.

"Path To 9/11" Writer Says He Has Received Death Threats. Cyrus Nowrasteh, who wrote the screenplay for "The Path to 9/11," writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M), "I am neither an activist, politician or partisan, nor an ideologue of any stripe. What I am is a writer who takes his job very seriously, as do most of my colleagues: Also, one who recently took on the most distressing and important story it will ever fall to me to tell. I considered it a privilege when asked to write the script for 'The Path to 9/11.' I felt duty-bound from the outset to focus on a single goal -- to represent our recent pre-9/11 history as the evidence revealed it to be." Nowrasteh adds, "In July a reporter asked if I had ever been ethnically profiled. I happily replied, 'No.' I can no longer say that. The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. … The hysteria engendered by the series found more than one target. In addition to the death threats and hate mail directed at me, and my grotesque portrayal as a maddened right-winger, there developed an impassioned search for incriminating evidence on everyone else connected to the film."

Freedom Tower Project Makes "Progress." While "several hurdles remain," the Wall Street Journal (9/18, Frangos, 2.03M) reports on "progress" made with the $2 billion, "iconic" Freedom Tower, as the state and federal governments reiterated their leasing commitments. New York's Office of General Services, the state government's property manager, signed a "nonbinding 'term sheet'" that is the basis of their deal to acquire "415,000 square feet" at "$59 a square foot" for "15 years," with the option to expand to "1 million square feet over 50 years." Meanwhile, the federal government's property manager, the General Services Administration, signed their "third" nonbinding memorandum of agreement that takes "600,000 square feet" at "$59 a square foot." This latter commitment will require congressional approval, one "hurdle" challenging the Freedom Tower's "financial viability." Another is a meeting this week to finalize the rebuilding framework for the WTC complex, and the last "hurdle" is whether the Freedom Tower can attract private business, since the only government agencies are the only ones to sign tentative lease agreements. If the federal and state governments actually sign the leases, the Freedom Tower would be on a "stronger financial footing" because the agreements could be "used as collateral to back construction bonds." And, the project will be financed from insurance proceeds and revenue the Port Authority collects at bridge and tunnel tolls. Also, the project appears to be gaining "political support," since Democratic gubernatorial nominee Eliot Spitzer, who once called the tower a "white elephant," said the lease agreements are a "crucial step in ensuring the financial viability of the Freedom Tower."

DOJ_NMG_0063631

WAR NEWS:

US Working To Establish Secure Perimeter Around Baghdad. NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 3, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that the US military's "immediate focus is to establish a security corridor around the capital to protect it from insurgent car bombers but one analyst doesn't believe the strategy is workable." General Barry McCaffrey, military analyst: "I am skeptical in the short run anything will tune back this level of violence." NBC continued, "The plan within two weeks to dig ditches and erect sand barriers, the aim to funnel inbound traffic through 28 checkpoints, the purpose stop suicide bombers trying to infiltrate the city. This has been tried in other smaller Iraqi towns and has been successful but Baghdad is a sprawling city. This is a major security undertaking on short notice."

US, Iraqi Officials Claim Security Belt Will Not Include Trenches. USA Today (9/18, Sabah, 2.27M) reports, "Iraq's Defense Ministry said Sunday that plans to fortify the 28 entrances to Baghdad do not include encircling the city with trenches, as has been reported. Col. Qassim Atta, a ministry spokesman, denied that Iraqi and U.S. forces planned to set up a perimeter of new trenches and berms to try to staunch one of the bloodiest periods in the capital since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. 'The 28 entrances to Baghdad will be tightly controlled by the Iraqi police,' Atta said. 'But to besiege Baghdad with trenches is total exaggeration.'" U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson "said the plan had been 'mischaracterized' in the media. 'There are plans for a security belt around Baghdad in order to constrict movement through authorized checkpoints. … This has been mischaracterized by some media as a giant trench around the city. This is not what's happening.'"

Sunni Politician Assassinated; Dozens Of Bodies Recovered. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports police in Baghdad "reported the discovery of 24 bullet-riddled corpses that had been dumped in various parts of the capital. Armed men also assassinated Muhammad Shihab al-Dulaimi, an official with the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni political bloc in parliament, while he was driving his car in the capital's Mansoor district, said Brig. Gen. Fadhil Abdul Muhsin of the Interior Ministry."

The New York Times (9/18, Al-Ansary, Adeeb, 1.21M) reports, "The police in Baghdad reported finding 36 bodies in several neighborhoods, an Interior Ministry official said. Eight were discovered in one area with gunshot wounds to the head and bearing marks of torture. But an American military spokesman said her office was aware of only 11 bodies found."

Sectarian Death Squads Said To Choose Victims Seemingly At Random. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, McDonnell, 918K) reports, "Evidence enough in the cold calculation of life and death in this capital of fear. A wrong turn, a detour, an untoward stare, a pointed finger, an anonymous denunciation, a nod of the head — these can, and do, lead regularly to death. Sectarian death squads snatch victims off the street or from their cars, from their homes or their offices, from mosques or hospitals. The killers come at night or day. They come in uniforms or civilian garb." The Times goes on to report, "Some bodies are never found, perhaps tossed in a clandestine grave, or decomposed beyond recognition, or dumped in the Tigris River or an irrigation canal from which they never emerge. So many corpses were clogging the capital's main sewer plant last spring that authorities launched an inquiry, with U.S. technical assistance. Investigators discovered a macabre pattern: Manholes from as far as several miles away had been used as disposal sites, allowing the remains to course underground through broad concrete pipes along with the city's subterranean effluvia."

DOJ_NMG_0063632

Very Few Of Baghdad's Booksellers Remain. The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Raghavan, 748K) reports on the remnants of the booksellers on Mutanabi Street in Baghdad "the intellectual ground zero of Baghdad, they are the guardians of a literary tradition that has survived empire and colonialism, monarchy and dictatorship. In the heady days after the U.S.-led invasion, Mutanabi Street pulsed with the promise of freedom. Now, in the fourth year of war, it is a shadow of its revered past. Many of the original booksellers have been forced to shut down. Others have been arrested, kidnapped or killed, or have fled Iraq. … Under former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, Mutanabi Street was the nexus for resistance and freewheeling debates, where underground writers published illegal books that denounced Hussein."

Anbar Tribes Reportedly Have Formed Coalition To Fight Al Qaeda. The New York Times (9/18, Al-Ansary, Adeeb, 1.21M) reports, "Nearly all the tribes from Iraq's volatile Sunni-dominated Anbar Province have agreed to join forces and fight Al Qaeda insurgents and other foreign-backed 'terrorists,' an influential tribal leader said Sunday. … Twenty-five of about 31 tribes in Anbar…have united against insurgents and gangs that are 'killing people for no reason,' said the tribal leader, Sheik Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi." The Times notes, "It is unclear how quickly or forcefully the tribal fighters will confront Al Qaeda and other insurgents, who mostly operate in and around the provincial capital, Ramadi, despite recurrent American military efforts to stop them." Rishawi "said the 25 tribes counted 30,000 young men armed with assault rifles who were willing to confront and kill the insurgents and criminal gangs that he blamed for damaging tribal life in Anbar, dividing members by religious sect and driving a wave of violent crime in Ramadi. 'We are in battle with the terrorists who kill Sunnis and Shiites, and we do not respect anyone between us who talks in a sectarian sense,' said Mr. Rishawi, the leader of the Rishawi tribe, a subset of the Dulaimi tribe, the largest in Anbar. Half the Rishawi are Shiite Arabs and half are Sunni, he said."

Reports Of Tribal Agreement Disputed. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports "on Sunday, tribal leaders in Anbar province denied news reports that local chieftains had gathered recently and agreed to join forces to fight al-Qaeda. 'All the talk and rumors that you may hear about alliances or new initiatives to wipe out al-Qaeda by the tribes in Anbar is all pure nonsense,' Sheik Faraj Khalid Essawi said. 'We wish that we could build a strong tribal alliance against al-Qaeda to defeat them and reestablish security in our area and rebuild the dignity and the stature of the tribal sheiks. But frankly, we are unable to stand up to or to confront al-Qaeda because even the American army itself has not succeed in defeating it.'"

Iraqi Insurgents Described As "Only Loosely Related" To Bin Laden's Al Qaeda. The Christian Science Monitor's Peter Grier (9/18) writes, "The war in Iraq constitutes a perimeter defense of the United States. Simply put, the US is fighting Al Qaeda and other extremists there, so it doesn't have to fight them on American soil. That's the way President Bush sees the situation, anyway. In his speech to the nation on Sept. 11, he said that terrorists wouldn't quit fighting if the US pulled out of Iraq. Instead, they'd pursue their target, in essence pouring through a gap in US lines. … Is that really the case? Many critics of the administration think Iraq is not the foremost trench in a global war on terrorism. The enemy there, they say, is only loosely related to the one that struck at the American heartland five years ago. Most insurgents in Iraq are natives, not wandering members of a terrorist international. It's unlikely they'd look for further ways to target the US if it left, say some terrorism experts."

Sailor Dies From Wounds Sustained In Anbar. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports "the U.S. military announced that a sailor assigned to the 1st Marine Logistics Group died Saturday from combat injuries in Anbar province."

Casey Says Iraq Needs 12 To 18 Months Before It Can Take Over Its Own Security. Gen. George Casey, the senior US military officer in Iraq, took Newsweek (9/25, Nordland, 3.12M) on a tour of Adhamiya, "a place that has been known for years as the worst neighborhood in Baghdad." Casey "says he's pleased with the progress he's seeing. 'It has worked,' Casey says. 'You see the reactions of the people on the streets.' Even so, the general acknowledges, 'there's a long way to go.' He says Iraq will need 12 to 18 months more before it's ready to take charge of its own security."

DOJ_NMG_0063633

Bush Case That America Is Safer From Terror Because Of War Seen As Not Catching On. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "Polls show that a majority believes that the country is, in fact, now less safe from terrorism because of the war in Iraq. At every opportunity, Bush is pressing his case that things in Iraq are headed in the right direction-and that the war must be won. But with elections just weeks away, some vulnerable lawmakers may have shuddered after opening the Washington Post last week to see a column by influential conservatives William Kristol and Rich Lowry calling for the president to send 'substantially more' troops to Iraq to 'improve the chances of winning a decisive battle at a decisive moment.'" US News adds, "The op-ed column by Kristol and Lowry didn't create much of a stir in military circles, where talk about needing more troops in Iraq is hardly new. … But that's not what President Bush says he's hearing from his top commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey."

Deadly Bombings Kill Twenty-Four In Kirkuk. ABC World News (9/17, story 3, 0:15, Harris) reported, "One note from Iraq, now, where a series of deadly bombings today in the northern city of Kirkuk. 6 bombs killed 24 people and kill wounded 84 more. This was the worst of the suicide attacks in a long time."

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 3, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, back-to-back bombings today that took a heavy toll leaving nearly two dozen Iraqis dead and the death of an American. Fears of increasing violence are leading up to the start of the Muslim holy month Ramadan. NBC (Boettcher) added, "It was a wave of bombings, the likes not seen in the oil rich city north of Baghdad. … This is what coalition forces fear could be in Baghdad's future as the holy month of Ramadan approaches." NBC noted, "more than 200 victims have been delivered to the Baghdad morgue in the past few days."

The USA Today/AP (9/18, 4A, Barzanji) reports, "There was no indication who was behind the bombings." According to the AP, "the worst assault involved a suicide truck bomb. The explosion in the city center killed 18 and wounded 55, police Brig. Sarhat Qadir said. A few hours later, a car bomb was rammed by a suicide attacker into a joint U.S.-Iraqi army patrol in the south of the city. At least three bystanders died and eight people were injured. Two roadside bombs and two parked car bombs went off in other parts of the city, killing three civilians and wounding 21 people, including two policemen and four soldiers, police told the Associated Press."

The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports, "The restive northern city -- considered a likely flash point for sectarian violence because of its combustible mix of Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens -- declared a state of emergency and hastily put up dozens of checkpoints to thwart further attacks, police Maj. Jalal Mahmood Aras said. The attacks were the most recent bloodshed in a bitter struggle between Arabs and Kurds to take control of Kirkuk, the country's third-largest city. Iraq's new constitution calls for a referendum to determine whether the Kirkuk region will become a part of the Kurdish north.

The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Roug, 918K) reports, "There has been an upsurge in attacks during recent weeks in Kirkuk, where Kurds and Sunni Arabs have struggled for control of the city's oil wealth. Late Friday night, a bomb exploded in the Tiseen neighborhood, injuring three people. Sunday's attacks, however, were unusual in their scale and toll."

Suicide Bombers Kill Three Iraqi Police Outside US Base In Fallujah. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports that in Fallujah "two suicide car bombs exploded within minutes as the drivers tried to ram into a U.S. military base, killing at least three Iraqi police officers and wounding five others, police Capt. Ammar Yasser Halbousy said."

Iraqi Police Uncover Large Munitions Cache Near Basra. The AP (9/18) reports Iraqi police "have uncovered a large munitions cache in southern Iraq, near the area where a roadside bomb killed two British soldiers earlier this month, a spokesman said Sunday. Police received a tip that munitions were being stored in the town of Ad Dayr, near the southern city of Basra, Maj. Charlie Burbridge said. A raid early Saturday uncovered dozens of artillery and mortar rounds, as well as 100 rounds of high explosive shells of various caliber, Burbridge said.

US Has Held Iraqi AP Photographer Since April Without Charging Him. The AP (9/18, Tanner) report the U.S. military "has imprisoned an Associated Press photographer for five months, accusing him of being a security threat but never filing charges or permitting a public hearing. Military officials said Bilal Hussein, an Iraqi citizen, was being held for 'imperative reasons of security' under United Nations resolutions. AP executives said the news cooperative's review of Hussein's work did not find anything to indicate inappropriate contact with insurgents, and any evidence against him should be brought to the Iraqi criminal justice system." Hussein "is a native of Fallujah who began work for the AP in September 2004. He photographed events in Fallujah and Ramadi until he was detained on April 12 of this year. 'We want the rule of law to prevail. He either needs to be charged or released. Indefinite detention is not acceptable,' said Tom Curley, AP's president and chief executive officer."

DOJ_NMG_0063634

Kimmitt Optimistic About Iraq's Economic Recovery Plan. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) Robert Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary and presidential emissary for the Iraq compact, writes, "Ministers from around the world will meet today to discuss the International Compact for Iraq, an Iraqi government-led initiative to transform Iraq's economy and achieve financial independence within five years. If the Iraqis map out a credible and promising plan, the international community will support it, investing in Iraq's future. Additional assistance will be expressly conditional on Iraq achieving the benchmarks it has set out. A most important issue to be covered is how to develop Iraq's oil sector and immense oil reserves in a manner that benefits all the Iraqi people and serves as a unifying force across sectarian lines." According to Kimmitt, Iraqi leaders "will commit to pass a law developed through a consensus-building process that will share oil revenue among all Iraqi regions, enable development and delineate significant opportunities for private investors."

Minister Analyzes US Christians' Response To War In Iraq. In an op-ed for the USA Today (9/18, 2.27M) Oliver 'Buzz' Thomas, a minister in Tennessee, writes, "Three-quarters of the U.S. population consider themselves Christian. That translates into about 224 million Americans. So why are so few of us taking the teachings of Jesus seriously when it comes to this latest war? Out here in the heartland, only a handful of churches are even talking about it."

NATO Hails Afghan Offensive, But Violence Continues. The AP (9/17, Abrashi) reports, "NATO said Sunday that its two-week offensive in south Afghanistan was a 'significant success' that had driven Taliban insurgents from their positions and opened the way for development. But violence was unabated, with suicide bombers killing three civilians and wounding six soldiers." In another development, "some 400 heavily armed Taliban crossed into the western Farah province, taking control of its Gulistan district after chasing away the police and burning the district headquarters and a local clinic, provincial police chief Gen. Sayed Aqa Saqib said." Lt. Gen. David Richards said that NATO would not "dance to the Taliban's tune" by pursuing Taliban fighters who sought to thus distract NATO.

USA Today (9/18, 2.27M) reports that Lt. Gen. David Richards called the two-week offensive in southern Afghanistan a "significant success." He adds in the brief article, "This time, we're not leaving." The Taliban's seizure of the Gulistan district HQ is noted.

NATO Call For Troops To Afghanistan Falls Short. The Washington Post (9/18, Moore, Anderson, 748K) reports, "More than a week after NATO's top leaders publicly demanded reinforcements for their embattled mission in southern Afghanistan, only one member of the 26-nation alliance [Poland] has offered more troops, raising questions about NATO's largest military operation ever outside of Europe and the goal of expanding its global reach." Commanders resorted to the "highly unusual" act of publicizing their need for more forces "after 18 months of fruitless private pleas with alliance members."

The pessimistic article observes, "The North Atlantic Treaty Organization's forces are suffering the highest casualty rates of the nearly five-year-long conflict in Afghanistan, and as European governments are feeling stretched by the demands for troops there and in Iraq, Lebanon, the Balkans and in several African countries." In addition, public opinion in Europe "is also tainted by the war in Iraq, and a general frustration that President Bush's fight against terrorism has led to a deteriorating global security situation, according to public officials and analysts."

Afghans Express Anger At Government. The New York Times (9/18, Gall, 1.21M) reports that American and Afghan troops moving into Andar district found "anger and frustration" among the locals. The bulk of the article describes a meeting with "elders and townspeople" who complain to US forces about the government's inaction and the police's "preying" on the population.

DOJ_NMG_0063635

DOJ:

DOJ's "Institutional Memory" Profiled. The Legal Times (9/18, McLure) runs a lengthy profile of David Margolis, "an assistant deputy attorney general and the Justice Department's most powerful career lawyer. … Margolis is widely described as the 'institutional knowledge' of the Justice Department. A notorious straight shooter known more for his love of country music and outlaw garb than his politics, he's managed to navigate the shifting sands of Washington to retain a powerful voice under Attorney Generals Janet Reno, John Ashcroft, and now Alberto Gonzales. Though Margolis is technically outranked by more than a dozen political appointees at DOJ headquarters and all 94 U.S. attorneys scattered throughout the country, his influence on the department extends far beyond his title, say both current and former Justice officials." The Times adds, "Margolis' bulletproof reputation and lack of partisan stripes also mean that the presidentially appointed attorneys general and deputy attorneys general at the top often turn to Margolis when Justice Department investigations venture into the swirl of national politics. From the investigation after former White House lawyer Vincent Foster's suicide to the ethics of Kenneth Starr's Lewinsky probe to the leak of Valerie Plame's identity, Margolis has played a major role in the DOJ's attempts to show that its law enforcement actions aren't motivated by political concerns." The Times notes, "Margolis serves as the Justice Department's chief disciplinarian of its federal prosecutors, helps choose U.S. attorneys and U.S. marshals, vets top FBI officials, advises prosecutors on when to recuse themselves from investigations, authorizes travel requests for the director of the FBI and the administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, and approves requests by political appointees to attend campaign events. In addition, on the rare occasion when a nominee for a presidential appointment is part of a criminal investigation, it falls to Margolis to decide how much of the investigation's information should be shared with the White House and the Senate."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sentencing Of Several Enron Officials Slated For This Month. The Houston Chronicle (9/18, Hays) reports, "Open season for the Enron era's criminal sentencings is about to get into full swing. .. A few former executives-turned-felons have already received their punishments for crimes they committed within the disgraced energy company's walls, and two have lived in a prison cell. … But this month launches a string of sentencings for those who helped prosecutors as well as those who fought them and lost since Enron cratered nearly five years ago." The Chronicle continues, "The most high-profile sentencing comes next month for former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, barring any last-minute delays. Andrew Fastow, the former finance chief who is among the most notorious felons to emerge from the Enron rubble, also is expected to garner attention when he is sentenced later this month. … A jury convicted Skilling in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors in the government's foremost case to emerge from its sprawling Enron investigation. He aims to appeal." The Chronicle adds, "Skilling's potential punishment of 20 to 30 years in prison is comparable to the 25 years awaiting WorldCom founder Bernard Ebbers, who was convicted last year of engineering an $11 billion fraud that undercut the company. … Another Enron defendant convicted by a jury this year, former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard, is slated to be sentenced a week after Skilling. He faces a maximum of 30 years, but likely will serve half that or less, for one count of conspiracy, three counts of wire fraud and a count of falsifying books and records. … And a slew of Skilling's former underlings whose cooperation helped prosecutors win his conviction face punishments for their own crimes, ranging from probation to 15 years behind bars, depending on the offense and whether prosecutors recommend leniency."

Hewlett-Packard Faces Deadline To Turn Over Documents Related To Snooping Scandal. USA Today (9/18, 3B, Kessler) reports, "Hewlett-Packard has until today to turn over a massive stack of documents related to its snooping scandal to Congress, which has also asked four key players to testify. The House Committee on Energy and Commerce is investigating whether HP illegally obtained the home phone records of nine journalists and at least two board members. It wants the computer giant to voluntarily hand over nearly all related documents. Friday, the panel also requested testimony from HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, general counsel Ann Baskins and outside counsel Larry Sonsini, who works for prominent Silicon Valley law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati. Additionally, it summoned Ronald DeLia, a private investigator. HP has admitted hiring detectives who pretended to be reporters and board members to access their phone records, a trick that may be illegal under fraud laws." USA notes, "Other agencies are interested in HP. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to charge employees of HP and its subcontractors. The Department of Justice, Securities and Exchange Commission and FBI have also launched inquiries."

DOJ_NMG_0063636

HP Leak Investigation Reveals "Rare Glimpse" Of Boardroom Turmoil. The New York Times (9/18, Darlin) interviews anonymous sources who offer details of Hewlett Packard's investigation of news leaks there, reporting that the "secret investigation" was "more elaborate than previously reported." The Times reports, "Those briefed on the company's review of the operation say detectives tried to plant software on at least one journalist's computer that would enable messages to be traced, and also followed directors and possibly a journalist in an attempt to identify a leaker on the board. The revelations at Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer maker that helped define Silicon Valley, have provided a rare glimpse of boardroom turmoil — resulting in Ms. Dunn's agreement to step down as chairwoman in January, and two resignations from the board. But they have also cast a harsh light on the questionable and possibly illegal techniques used in the episode, raising the possibility of criminal charges." The Times adds, "Those briefed on the internal review said that at various times, questions were raised about the legality of the methods used. They did not identify who raised the questions, when, or to whom they were addressed. But a crucial legal opinion, its origins previously undisclosed, was supplied by a Boston firm that shares an address and phone number with a detective firm on the case."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Charges Linked To Abramoff Scandal. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Pound, 2.03M) reports that Rep. Robert Ney last week "agreed to plead guilty to criminal charges linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ney acknowledged his guilt on charges of conspiring to defraud the public of his 'honest services' and making false statements. According to prosecutors, Ney accepted trips worth more than $170,000 from Abramoff, his lobbyists, and their clients. The Abramoff team showered him with campaign gifts, meals, and sports and concert tickets; Ney gave them legislative help."

The Legal Times (9/18, Palmer, Schwartz) reports, "In the two-count plea, filed in the U.S. District Court for the D.C. Circuit, Ney, 52, admitted to making false statements and to being part of a conspiracy to violate congressional gift bans by accepting handouts and free trips from Abramoff and his clients in exchange for pushing their legislative agenda beginning in 2000 until April 2004." The Times adds, "Ney is the first member of Congress to face charges in a lobbying scandal that has already ensnared six other lobbyists and government officials. Abramoff and his associates Michael Scanlon, former Ney Chief of Staff Neil Volz, Adam Kidan and Tony Rudy all pleaded guilty to bribery charges. David Safavian, former chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstructing justice in connection with his work with Abramoff. (Judge Paul Friedman denied Safavian's motion for a new trial this week.) … Lawyers familiar with the investigation say the government is likely to bring charges against other government officials, former Hill staffers and lobbyists in the coming months."

Former New Jersey State Senator Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/16, Martin) reported and powerful New Jersey Democratic Party leader and former state Sen. John Lynch on Friday "admitted secretly taking tens of thousands of dollars from a contractor while lobbying to help him develop state parkland, a stunning acknowledgment of corruption by one of New Jersey's most influential politicians." Lynch "pleaded guilty to defrauding the state's citizens and to tax evasion," and Jack Westlake, "a developer and longtime member of the Monmouth County Board of Taxation, pleaded guilty to a separate tax evasion charge. Their pleas marked a sudden end to a four-year investigation that began with an inquiry into billboard sales by two high-level aides to former Gov. James E. McGreevey," and "U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie called it possibly 'the most significant' case in his office during a four-year barrage of corruption prosecutions that has sent dozens of elected officials, public employees and contractors to prison. … He praised the case prosecutors, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Jeffrey Chiesa and Ricardo Solano, and lead investigators, Special Agents William Grace of the FBI and William Frederick of the IRS."

DOJ_NMG_0063637

The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/16, Graham, Moroz, 399K) reported, "Christie said investigations spawned by the billboards case would continue, and FBI Special Agent in Charge Leslie Wiser warned, 'our team is not done.' 'Put this on the billboard: 97-0 and counting,' he said. … Christie called Lynch's plea 'a sad moment,' and acknowledged that the conviction might not change the way politics work in New Jersey. 'The problem is that you get rid of one set of corrupt bosses and another set seems to come in to replace them,' he said. 'It's up to the people of this state and the leaders of this state... to decide if they want to continue on this path.'" The New York Times (9/16, Kocieniewski, 1.21M) noted, "In a written statement distributed by his lawyer, Jack Arsenault, Mr. Lynch said he was deeply sorry for betraying the public trust and embarrassing his family, political colleagues and constituents." Christie "hailed the guilty pleas as the end of an era of political bosses that had led to what he called 'the corrupt McGreevey administration.'"

The Asbury Park Press (9/17, Malwitz) noted, "When the FBI exercised a search warrant at the office Westlake and Lynch shared in Tinton Falls, Lynch claimed he was innocent," but "with Friday's guilty plea, the bang of a judge's gavel in federal court forever tainted his name." The Bergen Record (9/16, Sampson, Maddux) reported that Lynch "is by far the most prominent of dozens of New Jersey public officials convicted in a series of federal corruption probes during the past several years. State Republican Party chief Tom Wilson was quick to make political hay of the news. 'John Lynch isn't just symbolic of the Democratic Party in New Jersey: He was the literal hub of the Democratic Party in New Jersey,' Wilson said. … Democratic State Committee Chairman Joe Cryan fired back: 'These types of things happen in both parties, whether it's Republican mayors in Monmouth County or Republican congressmen around the country. Tom should know better than to make these kinds of allegations.'"

Former McGreevey Aide Disputes Claim Of Sexual Relationship. The New York Times (9/18, Jacobs, 1.21M) reports, "There were no fireworks, no swooning — and no sex, for that matter, says the man at the center of the political maelstrom that led to the resignation of Gov. James E. McGreevey." Golan Cipel "said in an interview from Israel yesterday that he wanted to set the record straight and dispute Mr. McGreevey's memoir, 'The Confession,' which is to be released tomorrow. He said the book was simply an attempt to rehabilitate Mr. McGreevey's public image." The Times notes, "At the time of Mr. McGreevey's resignation, lawyers for the governor said Mr. Cipel was threatening to file a sexual harassment lawsuit," but Cipel yesterday "said he wanted only that Mr. McGreevey stop harassing him. The F.B.I. investigated extortion accusations but declined to take action." The AP (9/18) notes that "Cipel said FBI investigators came to Israel and concluded he didn't try to blackmail McGreevey. 'I was just the only one with the courage to speak out,' Cipel said."

Aryan Brotherhood Leaders Avoid Death Penalty. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Goffard, 918K) reported that jurors on Friday "deadlocked…on whether to execute two kingpins of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang who orchestrated a decades-long reign of murder from their cellblocks. As a result, Barry 'The Baron' Mills, 58, and Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham, 59, will live out their years where they have spent most of their adult lives — and where their names already carry near-mythic weight: behind bars." The Orange County Register (9/16, Welborn) noted, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Terri K. Flynn said that even though the jury did not vote for death for Bingham and Mills, the trial was a success. She said the convictions in July should send a message to Aryan Brotherhood members and other prison gangs that the government will go after violent prison inmates. 'These two defendants have effectively been gutted,' she said. 'They will spend the rest of their lives hidden away in isolation in some prison.'"

The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M) added, "The judge is scheduled to sentence the two men to life terms on Nov. 13. Under the law, the prosecutors cannot ask for a new penalty phase." The AP (9/16, Flaccus) also reported on the deadlock, in a widely-distributed story.

Miami Seniors Press For Federal Action On Rising Medicare Fraud. The Miami Herald (9/17, Dorschner, 310K) reported, "When Muriel Sherman, 81, decided to go to war against Medicare fraud, she found a lot of seniors who wanted to join her. Her story, reported in The Miami Herald last month, has sparked a wave of responses from seniors with similar stories about their identities being used for widespread fraud that FBI officials estimates runs $1 billion a year in South Florida alone." The Herald noted, "Timothy J. Delaney, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami Division, warned seniors not to do investigations on their own. 'I would leave that up to the professionals.' Delaney, who previously was the FBI's national case manager for healthcare fraud cases, acknowledged that healthcare fraud is a huge issue here, particularly in durable medical equipment, a long-standing concern, and in expensive HIV/AIDS infusion treatments, which was first revealed as a massive problem in a Miami Herald report last year. 'It is a huge problem, but there are many people trying to do something about it,' Delaney said. Thirty of the Miami division's 390 case agents are dedicated to healthcare fraud."

DOJ_NMG_0063638

Miami Federal Prosecutors Cracking Down On "Street-Level" Scams. The AP (9/18, Anderson) reports, "Borrowing a tactic used successfully against drug traffickers, federal prosecutors in Miami are attacking the problem by focusing on both the 'street-level' scams that typically involve between $1 million and $5 million in [Medicare] fraud as well as the high-dollar cases involving large health providers. Since last October, the effort has result in criminal charges against more than 100 people in 63 separate cases and civil lawsuits against another 38 defendants. All told, the cases over this one-year period involved more than $100 million in Medicare fraud, Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said. In past years, Acosta said, criminals widely thought that investigators wouldn't waste much time on relatively small-dollar fraud amounts of $1 million or $2 million." The AP notes, "The crackdown involves several federal, state and local agencies."

FBI Documents Detail Disgraced Philly Consultant's Fund-Raising Prowess. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/17, Budoff, 399K) reported, "When Democrat Bob Casey Jr. needed money for his gubernatorial race, there was one man he couldn't do without: fund-raiser extraordinaire Robert M. Feldman." He "also raised millions for other politicians, such as Gov. Rendell, Mayor Street, and former New Jersey Gov. Jim McGreevey," but "ever since Feldman got entangled in an FBI investigation into Philadelphia corruption and another in Puerto Rico, he has lived in exile from the political world he once walked as a king." The Inquirer added that "a remarkably candid portrait of Feldman's dealings has emerged from a court case and FBI wiretaps of conversations with the late dealmaker Ronald White. The documents had not been previously made public."

Gotti Lawyer Makes Closing Arguments. The New York Times (9/16, Williams, 1.21M) reported that during his closing arguments Friday, "John A. Gotti's lawyer acknowledged for the first time yesterday that his client had once been the boss of the Gambino organized crime family. But when Mr. Gotti gave up the Mafia life in 1999, the lawyer said, his withdrawal was heartfelt and true. … A federal prosecutor, in her closing arguments, said Mr. Gotti's claim to have quit the Mafia was a ruse to avoid prosecution," but Charles Carnesi "said his client had soured on the mob life. 'The message is: "I went to the very top of this life and it's no good. It destroys you and your family. It's not worth the toll,"' Mr. Carnesi said." The Times adds that "Carnesi attacked the F.B.I. tapes that are at the center of the government's case, particularly a recording from 2003 in which prosecutors say Mr. Gotti can be heard complaining about a demotion to 'captain' in the Gambino family. Mr. Carnesi said that the word 'captain' had never been uttered, though he did not say what the conversation had been about."

Newsday (9/16, DeStefano) reported "Carnesi said that as a young man, his client was intoxicated with the respect his late father…received. … But after a few years, the younger Gotti…became disillusioned with mob life, the lawyer said. 'There is a point where the boy becomes a man; a man learns it is not like that,' said Carnesi, referring to the romanticized notion of La Cosa Nostra. Instead, Gotti saw the death of men he knew and days filled with 'treachery and deceit,' the lawyer said." The New York Daily News (9/16, Zambito, 729K) noted, "The jury of seven women and five men is expected to start deliberating Monday in the federal government's third attempt at convicting Gotti." The New York Post (9/16, Cornell, 608K) also reported on Carnesi's closing, under the headline "'Junior': My Father 'Freed' Me."

Gotti Lamented What He Saw As Decline Of Traditional Mob Culture. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/16, Caruso) reported, "As he languished in a federal prison in 2003…Gotti had plenty to worry about. … But at the root of his troubles was this: The modern mob, he lamented, was losing its manliness. 'Now are we men? Or are we punks or rats or weasels? You tell me,' he angrily asked one friend while serving a racketeering sentence. Gotti's conversations were routinely recorded before his release from prison last year, and the tapes have played a central role in his current racketeering trial." The AP noted that "the tapes provide an inside look at the gangster's code, particularly its obsession with 'being a man' at all costs."

DOJ_NMG_0063639

High Court To Consider Murder Conviction Overturned By 9th Circuit. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Savage, 918K) reports that for Jim Studer, "wearing a button with a photo of his brother, Tom, was a simple way of bearing witness for him at the trial of Tom's accused killer, Mathew Musladin." Little did he "think the buttons he and his parents wore to the trial in San Jose would nearly free the man convicted of Tom's murder — or put the killer's case before the Supreme Court. But he had not considered that Musladin would someday have a chance to bring his case before the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals." The Supreme Court has long "cast a critical eye on the liberal-leaning 9th Circuit, particularly in cases involving crime and the death penalty. The justices will consider two of those cases soon after they return next month." The jury convicted Musladin "of first-degree murder and attempted murder, and he was sentenced to 32 years to life in prison." But Musladin's case "came before two" of the 9th Circuit's "decidedly liberal judges," Stephen Reinhardt of Los Angeles and Marsha S. Berzon of San Francisco. In a 2-1 decision, the judges reversed Musladin's conviction, saying that the buttons worn by Studer's family deprived Musladin of a fair trial." Judge Reinhardt said "the photo buttons — described by the prosecutor as 2 inches in diameter and by Musladin's lawyer as 3 to 4 inches — conveyed a 'specific message.' 'The buttons essentially 'argue' that Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty,' Reinhardt said."

Review Reveals Flaws In National Security Contracting Procedures. U.S. News and World Report's (9/25, Ragavan) cover story reports on the scandal involving defense contractor Mitchell Wade, noting that it would ultimately lead him and one lawmaker, former Rep. Randall Cunningham, to jail and "still more criminal charges" are expected "in the next few days or weeks, against some of the most influential insiders in the nation's capital." US News adds, "A two-month US News investigation, based on a review of hundreds of pages of court documents, private internal MZM records, and detailed interviews with a dozen key officials, shows how Wade used his connections on Capitol Hill and inside the Pentagon to gather inside information and turn his company into a moneymaking juggernaut. … The magazine's review also revealed fundamental flaws in the government's national-security contracting procedures and showed how Wade risked compromising sensitive government secrets."

FEC Looking Into MZM Contributions To Lawmakers. In its cover story, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Ragavan, 2.03M) reports in its cover story, "According to US Attorney Kenneth Wainstein in Washington, who is leading the MZM investigation, Wade admitted pressuring MZM executives to make campaign contributions. He also got 19 MZM employees or their spouses to make 39 different contributions in their names, which he then reimbursed-in violation of federal election laws. Virginia Rep. Virgil Goode, a Republican, received $46,000 in such 'straw contributions,' and Florida Rep. Katherine Harris, also a Republican, got $32,000. … Wade had other Republican lawmakers in his sights, as well. He tried to cultivate Mississippi's Trent Lott, then the Senate majority leader, by sending him expensive seven-fold ties, and North Carolina's Elizabeth Dole, by proffering a marble bust. Both declined the gifts. In all, Wade gave nearly $305,000 in campaign contributions-98 percent of it to Republicans." US News adds, "According to knowledgeable sources, the Federal Election Commission is investigating a number of MZM-related campaign contributions, including $12,000 that King and his wife made to Representative Goode."

MZM May Have Had A Role In Getting US Troops To Iraq. In a separate story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Ragavan, 2.03M) reports that MZM "may have played a role in getting troops to Iraq, according to a national commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led to the war. The commission blamed the Pentagon's National Ground Intelligence Center (where Wade had analysts on contract through earmarks) that handled much of the military's prewar analysis of whether Saddam Hussein had developed nuclear precursor capabilities. The report didn't single out the MZM analysts but said that NGIC had 'in particular displayed a disturbing lack of diligence and technical expertise.'"

Hoekstra Seeks Probe Of Cunningham's Awarding Of Intel Contracts. In its cover story, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Ragavan, 2.03M) reports in its cover story, "The chairman of the House Select Committee on Intelligence, Republican Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, has also asked an independent investigator, Michael Stern, to conduct a separate inquiry into Cunningham's activities while he served on the intelligence committee. Stern, congressional sources say, has found that Cunningham corrupted the awarding of intelligence contracts, much the same way he did military contracts. The leaders of the intelligence committee are now debating whether to subpoena Cunningham to testify."

DOJ_NMG_0063640

Armitage Revelation Has Reconfigured Plame Leak Case. Time (9/25, 4.03M) reports in its "Notebook" column that the Valerie Plame leak case "received a radical reconfiguring when former State Department bigwig Richard Armitage confirmed that he was the original source for columnist Robert Novak's revelation. Novak weighed in last week, calling Armitage's contrition bogus and the leak deliberate." Time examines the major players in the case including Armitage, Novak, Vice President Dick Cheney's former Chief of Staff Lewis "Scooter" Libby, The Nation reporter David Corn who "still sees scandal in Bush aides' efforts to tarnish Wilson."

Few Police Departments Require Four-Year Degrees. USA Today (9/18, Johnson) reports, "Since 1963, when the Multnomah County, Ore., Sheriff's Department became one of the first police agencies to impose a four-year degree requirement on recruits, only a few other local departments have followed. Less than 5% of local police departments with more than 100 officers require four-year degrees, says Louis Mayo, executive director of the Police Association for College Education. Most departments give higher pay to recruits with four-year degrees, he says, but have avoided requiring recruits to have them for several reasons. Among them: concerns about recruiting enough minority officers in increasingly diverse urban areas, and fears that not enough college graduates would be attracted by police salaries."

Kidnapping Victim Found After Sending Text Message. ABC World News (9/17, story 7, 2:15, Harris) reported, "A suspect is under arrest in South Carolina tonight, charged with kidnapping a teenage girl and holding her in a booby-trapped bunker, 15 feet under ground. And police say they were able to rescue this girl and capture the suspect, all because she managed to send a text message from a cell phone." ABC (Osunasami) added, "When her family finally received that text message, it was nothing short of a miracle. The 14-year-old girl had been held in what authorities describe as a booby-trapped bunker, underneath leaves and branches, 15 feet in the ground. The girl got a hold of a cell phone, left behind by the accused kidnapper, and was able to send a text message. Police were able to pinpoint the cell phone signal and were able to rescue her yesterday."

Police Seek Gunman After University Shooting. NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 5, , Seigenthaler) reported, "Authorities are searching for a gunman" in Pittsburgh who "shot five basketball players after they left a party on campus. Two of the players remain in critical condition." NBC (Okwu) added, "Police say the shooter, believed to be a non-student had been disruptive inside the party, encountered two of the players outside after leaving and opened fire. All but one of the students are new recruits brought on to help a struggling team."

National Guard Joins Search For Kidnapped Baby. NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 6, , Seigenthaler) reported, "In Missouri, the National Guard as well as state and local police are involved in a search for a nine-day-old baby girl. The mother said she was stabbed by a kidnapper. It happened in Union, Missouri." NBC (Shamlian) added, "The family's nightmare started Friday night when a woman interested the home of the new mother with a gun and a knife. The intruder cut her throat and snatched the new born. The 21-year-old mom survived. Her one-year-old son was not hurt. The FBI and the Missouri National Guard are combing the area for evidence. A bloody knife was found in the woods near the home. He says the kidnapper likely wanted a baby of her own."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Key Witness Says FBI Ignored Exculpatory Comments In Boston Police Brutality Case. The Boston Globe (9/17, Lehr, 425K) reported, "It was the most notorious Boston police brutality case of the last 10 years, and, in the end, the federal investigation hinged on what Officer Kenny Conley saw -- and what he wouldn't say. Conley was convicted of perjury and obstruction of justice after he testified that he never saw a drug-unit officer, dressed in plainclothes, who had been pummeled by other officers who mistook him for a fleeing slaying suspect," but "a Globe reexamination of the case has found an apparent and perhaps devastating defect in the eyewitness case against

DOJ_NMG_0063641

Conley, one which, for some court observers, raises the possibility of government misconduct." Key prosecution witness Robert "Smut" Brown, "a drug dealer whom Conley and other officers were pursuing on the night of the beating," said in a jailhouse interview with the Globe that "Conley wasn't the officer he saw, and that he tried, unsuccessfully, to alert federal authorities during the trial that they had the wrong man. … Indeed, he says, minutes before testifying, he spotted in the courthouse hallway the officer he had seen standing near the scene of the beating that night and pointed him out to Kimberly McAllister, the FBI agent in charge of the probe. 'She's like, "No, no, no, no, no, that's not the guy,"' Brown said. … McAllister, through an FBI spokesperson, said she does not recall Brown pointing out the officer in court that day. What she does remember is that Brown, fearful of police retaliation, didn't want to take the stand. Had Brown provided new evidence, McAllister would have immediately told prosecutors, said FBI spokeswoman Gail A. Marcinkiewicz."

ANTITRUST:

MAN AG Embarks On Bid For Scania AB. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, Singer) reports, "MAN AG of Germany launched a cash-and-stock takeover bid for Swedish rival Scania AB that values the maker of trucks and buses at about €9.6 billion ($12.15 billion) and would potentially form Europe's largest commercial-vehicle maker. The supervisory board of Munich-based MAN met yesterday to approve the move. Scania, of Södertälje, Sweden, hasn't approved the bid, but the German company is hopeful of the deal ultimately being friendly, said people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "A combination would bring together two of the larger makers of trucks, including 18-wheelers and light-duty commercial vehicles and buses. … Together, they would rank as the largest truck maker in Europe by market share, ahead of Volvo AB, of Göteborg, Sweden, and DaimlerChrysler AG, of Stuttgart, Germany, and third in global market share, behind Volvo and DaimlerChrysler."

AOL Agrees To Sell German Internet-Access Unit. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, Karnitschnig, Vascellaro) reports, "In the first step of a broader plan to reorganize AOL's international operations, Time Warner Inc. agreed to sell the unit's Internet-access business in Germany for €675 million ($854.7 million) to Telecom Italia. In coming weeks, AOL is expected to also complete negotiations for the sale of its Internet-access businesses in the United Kingdom and France. Proceeds from the sale of all three businesses are expected to total about $2 billion, according to people familiar with the talks." The Journal adds, "Though its European operations are profitable, AOL never managed to establish itself as a major player in the European Internet-access market, and Time Warner has since written off most of AOL Europe's value. The move to sell the access business, which is the core of the operation, comes as Time Warner has been paring its large portfolio of assets. It recently sold a regional cable channel for $375 million and has been negotiating to sell the Atlanta Braves baseball team, which is valued at about $460 million."

ENVIRONMENT:

Investigators Search For Source Of E. Coli Outbreak. ABC World News (9/17, story 4, 2:40, Yang) reported, "Teams of investigators from two agencies here at the Department of Health and Human Services have been working throughout the weekend to try to track down this deadly outbreak of E. Coli. In California's Central Valley today, the investigators are hunting for the source of the contamination. Food and Drug Administration officials tell ABC News the plant where the suspect spinach was packed shows no signs of the bacteria." ABC World News adds, "So far, they haven't identified the cause. In recent years, more people have reported getting sick from eating bad produce has been rising.

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 7, Allen) reported, "Food safety officials do not know where the tainted spinach came from or how the E. Coli got into it, reasons why the warnings now include all fresh spinach. The source of the contamination could be anything from the water used to irrigation to a worker that did not wash their hands. … Ultimately food specialists say one of the biggest issues is that we lived in a fast paced, eat on the run society."

Second Company Linked To Contaminated Spinach. The New York Times (9/18, Wald) reports that River Ranch Fresh Foods is the second company to be "\implicated in the E. coli outbreak linked to spinach, the Food and Drug Administration said late Sunday, and the number of identified victims is still rising. … The spinach that passed through River Ranch was sold under the brand names Farmers Market, Hy-Vee, and Fresh and Easy." The Times adds, "The federal health authorities are advising consumers not to eat fresh spinach. They said frozen spinach had not been implicated. The number of reported cases of E. coli infection rose by seven on Sunday, to 109, but officials said that the real number was probably higher and that reporting was probably delayed because some health departments were not staffed on weekends."

DOJ_NMG_0063642

The USA Today (9/18, Vergano) reports, "Suspicion has centered on packaged spinach sold by Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. The company has recalled all of its spinach packaged in bags, either alone or blended with salads, with "best if used by dates" from Aug. 17 to Oct. 1, 2006. A second company, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., which investigators found had bought spinach from Natural Selection, is expected to issue a recall of three packaged salad mixes, Acheson said."

The Washington Post/AP (9/18, A4) reports, "Natural Selection Foods, the world's largest producer of organic produce, has been linked to the infected greens, prompting a recall of 34 brands. They include the company's labels and those of companies contracting with Natural Selection, based in San Juan Bautista, Calif., to produce or package its spinach. On Sunday, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., added to its recall spring mixes containing spinach sold under the labels Hy Vee, Fresh and Easy, and Farmers Market, FDA officials said."

Associates Offer "Complex" Portrait Of Alleged Long Island Polluter. Newsday (9/18, Bernstein) reports, "Gerald Cohen could express concern for his employees: He would give them time off to take care of personal problems, send flowers to those who were ill, and show up at funerals for workers or their family members. But he also had a way of making employees feel insecure. Cohen bounced paychecks, never granted a raise or a bonus, withheld pension money and was unable to develop any friendly relationships, even with those who worked for him for years. … Most describe Cohen as complex," but "the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn says it has no doubt who the 72-year-old Cohen is: one of the nation's worst polluters. Earlier this month, Cohen was arrested by FBI agents and charged with failing to legally dispose of more than 11 tons of highly caustic alkaline chemicals that had been stored in two large tanks on the company's 125-acre property along Sheep Pasture Road, not far from Long Island Sound.

Boehlert Calls For Increase In CAFE Standards. In a Washington Post (9/18, 748K) op-ed, House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood Boehlert (R) writes, "politicians have handled U.S. energy policy the way BP apparently handled its pipeline: We've talked about it, we've taken some superficial actions, but we've failed to examine it closely, secure in our belief that everything seemed pretty much okay." Boehlert says, "The House repeatedly passed legislation to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, with proponents arguing that pollution from drilling is a thing of the past -- presumably a harder argument to make in the wake of this summer's revelations from BP." Boehlert writes, "The most important, realistic and feasible step the government could take would be to require automakers to make more fuel-efficient cars by raising corporate average fuel economy (CAFE) standards."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico Extradites Drug Cartel Suspect To US. There are more than 200 media references to the Mexican government's decision to extradite an Arellano Félix drug cartel suspect. For example, Copley News Service (9/17, Walker) reports the oldest of four brothers "accused of heading the ruthless Arellano Félix drug cartel in Tijuana was extradited by the Mexican government to the United States…to face drug charges in San Diego. Francisco Rafael Arellano Félix, 56, was escorted off a commercial fight at Lindbergh Field…after being handed over earlier in the day to U.S. authorities in the Texas border town of Brownsville. … Flanked by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Marshals Service, the balding, bespectacled Arellano Félix was rushed to a vehicle waiting to take him to federal prison, authorities said. … The decision to extradite Arellano Félix came the same day that U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza sharply criticized the Mexican government, saying, 'Drug cartels, aided by corrupt officials, reign unchecked on many towns along our common border.'" The San Diego Union-Tribune used the Copley News Service story.

The AP (9/17) reports the U.S. ambassador "praised the 'courage and conviction' of Mexico's President Vicente Fox on Sunday after Mexico extradited alleged drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix to the United States. Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter

DOJ_NMG_0063643

Saturday in the Mexican city of Matamoros, then flown across the border and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville after serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico. … U.S. officials have been pushing Mexico to overcome reluctance to extradite its citizens. When Mexico officials have tried to extradite major trafficking suspects, courts have blocked them."

In a separate story, the AP (9/16) writes that Mexico extradited drug kingpin Arellano Felix on Saturday, "making him the first major Mexican drug lord to be sent north to face drug charges. The extradition was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords. … Most of the seven Arellano Felix brothers have been arrested or killed, weakening the group. But Mexican and U.S. officials said the gang still moves tons of cocaine and marijuana into the United States from its operations base in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego." A version of the AP story was used by ABC News, the Washington Post, Wall Street Journal, USA Today, Newsweek, Miami Herald, San Francisco Chronicle, Dallas Morning News, and Houston Chronicle.

Suspected Drug-Smuggling Tunnel Found Along US-Mexico Border. The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/16) reports the DEA announced it has "discovered a tunnel under the U.S.-Mexico border in Imperial County that apparently was used for smuggling drugs. The 400-foot tunnel reaches between a residence in Calexico and a residence in Mexicali, Mexico, said John S. Fernandes, DEA special agent in charge. It is about 20 feet underground, equipped with lighting and bolstered with wooden beams every few feet."

San Diego County Challenges California's Medical Marijuana Law. The AP (9/16) reports San Diego County "is challenging California's medical marijuana law in state court, saying it should not be required to comply with a state law directing counties to issue ID cards to users. At the same time, local police, working with federal agents, have shuttered all of the nearly 30 marijuana dispensaries in the county. … San Diego prosecutors said neighbors complained about one store in the summer of 2005, prompting an investigation that culminated in joint Drug Enforcement Administration and local police raids in July. Fifteen operators were charged with illegally selling the drug for recreational use to people who are not ill -- including one undercover agent who prosecutors said he got a doctor to give him a medical marijuana recommendation for his dog." The San Diego Union-Tribune, San Jose Mercury News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Contra Costa Times, and Arizona Republic are among the newspapers that used the AP story.

In Michigan, Federal Law Credited For Drop In Gun Crimes. The Lansing (MI) State Journal (9/16) reports authorities say gun crimes in Lansing "are on the decline because of a federal initiative that gives longer prison sentences to people convicted of them. … Authorities on Friday highlighted the conviction of a 31-year-old Lansing Township man involved in a multi-state drug operation. Benjamin Preston Foreman was sentenced this month to 25 years in prison; he had received five additional years because of federal gun charges."

IMMIGRATION:

DHS Set To Designate Contractors For Secure Border Initiative. The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Witte, 748K) reports the Department of Homeland Security "is expected within days to name a winner in a competition that could permanently change the way the United States conducts surveillance, apprehension and detention operations along its northern and southern boundaries. The choice promises to lend significant insight into how the government sees the future of border security, with firms offering rival visions of how that future looks. All year, the nation's largest military contractors have been locked in intense competition to team with the government on a program that gives the private sector unusually wide sway over a critical national security issue. … The resulting proposals are the latest incarnation of decades' worth of attempts to use technology to create a virtual fence along the border. So far, none have been successful. Recent initiatives have ended with cameras that failed to work in extreme temperatures and millions of dollars wasted. But with immigration legislation stalled in Congress, Homeland Security officials are gambling that this new effort -- known as the Secure Border Initiative -- will be their best hope of cutting the flow of illegal immigrants into the country."

Mexicans With Green Cards Provide Preview Of Guest Worker Program. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, A1, Millman, 2.03M) reports on "an estimated tens of thousands of Mexicans with an unusual place in the bitter debate over immigration. Thanks to quirks in the law, they have green cards enabling them to come to the U.S. for work stints. Many…call themselves 'subidos' from the Spanish verb for 'to rise,' because they do the grueling jobs of pouring concrete for tall structures such as grain silos for the ethanol plants increasingly rising across the Great Plains." The Journal notes, "The experience of the…Mexicans who use green cards to hop across the border provides some intriguing clues about how an official guest-worker system might play out. By quickly filling jobs and providing needed skills, such workers are a boon to employers. They rarely put a burden on social services, because they leave their school-age children and elderly relatives at home. Nonetheless, there is some evidence that the Mexicans drive down wages in the industries where they work."

DOJ_NMG_0063644

US Farmers Forced To Make Emergency Requests For Foreign Laborers. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Romney, 918K) reports, "As border enforcement shrinks the labor force of undocumented field hands and immigration reform looms in Congress, growers have focused with renewed vigor on the need for a simplified federal guest worker program. For Harry Singh & Sons, which imported nearly half the agricultural visa holders in California last year, the federal program became a necessity in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001. With half its fields on the Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base, the company suddenly came under scrutiny by immigration officials. In a mid-harvest panic, having lost three-quarters of its workers, the company turned to the federal government. Singh & Sons' experience since then offers a close look at a program that growers and worker advocates alike agree is deeply flawed, yet crucial to comprehensive immigration reform." The Times adds, "Growers must generally ask the U.S. Department of Labor to certify the existence of a labor shortage 90 days before foreign workers are needed. But the harvest was in full swing, so" Singh & Sons' "filed an emergency request. … If all had gone well, those workers would have been vetted and approved by the State Department and then bused to Oceanside. But the Department of Labor kicked the application back for revisions, and by mid-December…$2.5 million in tomatoes had rotted in the fields."

Mass Emigration Seen As Third World's Best Hope For Economic Development. The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (9/18, A17) writes, "In ' Let Their People Come ,' a new book published by the Center for Global Development, Lant Pritchett reports that if rich countries permitted extra immigration equivalent to 3 percent of their labor force, the citizens of poor countries would gain about $300 billion a year. That's three times more than the direct gains from abolishing all remaining trade barriers, four times more than the foreign aid given by governments and 100 times more than the value of debt relief."

TAX:

IRS Cracking Down On Partisan Activity By Religious Groups. The New York Times (9/18, Goodstein, 1.21M) reports that with midterm elections "less than two months away, Christian conservatives are enlisting churches in eight battleground states to register voters, gather crowds for rallies and distribute voters' guides comparing the candidates' stands on issues that conservatives consider 'family values.'" But the religious conservatives "are facing resistance from newly invigorated religious liberals and moderates who are creating their own voters' guides and are organizing events designed to challenge the conservatives' definition of 'values.'" Meanwhile, both "religious flanks are looking nervously over their shoulders at the Internal Revenue Service, which this year announced a renewed effort to enforce laws that limit churches and charities from involvement in partisan political campaigns." The IRS "issued a report in February that said nearly half of the 110 tax-exempt organizations it investigated after the 2004 elections for improper political activity were churches. Of the 40 churches that the I.R.S. had finished investigating, 37 were found to have violated the law. These churches were given warnings or penalized with excise taxes and, although none lost their tax exemptions, the I.R.S. is still investigating seven more cases against churches." Capitalizing on "the crackdown, the advocacy group Americans United for Separation of Church and State plans to begin mailing letters today to 117,000 clergy members in 11 states warning them to avoid 'any activity designed to influence the outcome of a partisan election,' by either supporting or opposing a particular candidate."

Targeted Liberal California Church May Defy IRS Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Glover, Sahagun, 918K) reports, "A liberal Pasadena church facing an IRS investigation over alleged politicking sounded a defiant note Sunday, with its leaders and many congregants saying the probe amounted to an assault on their constitutional rights and that they were inclined to defy the agency's request for documents." After "delivering an impassioned sermon about the investigation to a standing-room-only crowd of about 900," the Rev. Ed Bacon, rector of All Saints Episcopal Church, said, "These people are offended. Freedom of speech and freedom of religion have been assaulted by this act of the IRS, and I think my people want to be heard in court." The Times adds Bacon said "he would consult with attorneys and church officials before deciding a course of action but that the vast majority of parishioners with whom he spoke Sunday felt the church should resist a summons demanding copies of newsletters, e-mails and other records."

DOJ_NMG_0063645

Refund-Anticipation Loan Practices Facing Legal, Regulatory Challenges. USA Today (9/18, 1B, McCoy) reports, "Each year, an estimated 10 million Americans, frustrated by weeks-long waits for their IRS refunds, turn to tax preparers who provide checks within days. Those checks are usually refund-anticipation loans, payments that are secured by and repaid from a pending federal tax refund." Due to being short-term loans, "the annualized interest rates often soar to 100% or higher. More than half of those who received the loans in 2004, or more than 5 million taxpayers, were recipients of the earned income tax credit, a major federal anti-poverty program, IRS data show." USA notes that there are several "recent actions posing legal and regulatory challenges to refund-anticipation loans: •In February, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer sued H&R Block for allegedly misleading clients about the cost of the loans." That case "is proceeding even as H&R Block and its lending partners recently agreed to pay $101.5 million to settle other class-action cases filed over refund-anticipation loans. •Jackson Hewitt, the nation's second-largest tax preparer, disclosed to investors in July that it is nearing a $5 million consent judgment with Lockyer's office to settle an inquiry launched in 2003 over the firm's refund-loan marketing." USA adds, "IRS Commissioner Mark Everson called the loans 'predatory' in a USA TODAY interview. However, he said, 'What you have is a real demand on the part of approximately 10 million people who, when they come in and file their tax returns, they want their money, and they want it right away.' 'And if the IRS were to step in and say, 'You can't do it,' I think there would be an uproar on this,' said Everson."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New High Court Term To Feature Controversial Cases. The National Law Journal (9/18, Coyle) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court's new term, which already offers controversial challenges involving abortion, affirmative action, punitive damages and global warming, promises to add significantly to the emerging portrait of the newly constituted Roberts court." The Journal continues, "The justices will open the 2006-2007 term on the traditional first Monday in October -- Oct. 2 -- but in an untraditional way. There will be no oral arguments because of the Jewish holy day, Yom Kippur. … But on that day, or as has become more routine in recent years, on the Friday before the first Monday, the Court will announce new grants of review -- as well as denials -- of cases gleaned from the thousands that came into the Court throughout the summer." The Journal adds, 'The justices approach the opening day with a relatively spare argument docket, having agreed to hear arguments in 31 cases, fewer than the number granted review at this time a year ago. But there is none of the uncertainty that surrounded them last fall as they awaited the arrival of a new chief justice and dealt with the impending departure of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. … But even if the high court only decided the 31 cases currently on the docket, there is plenty of potential drama and legal significance in that group, say scholars and court watchers. … 'There are some stand-out cases and each of them will test whether this is a "restrained" Court,' said constitutional law scholar Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University School of Law, referring to the abortion, affirmative action and punitive damages challenges. … Each of those 'headline' cases, he added, also reflects the influence of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who has played a major role or has cast the decisive vote in the precedents or doctrines underlying those challenges."

Hardiman Tapped For 3rd Circuit Vacancy. The Legal Intelligencer (9/18, Duffy) reports, "Two of the vacancies on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals could soon be filled now that President Bush has nominated Thomas Hardiman, a 41-year-old federal judge who has been on the bench in federal court in Pittsburgh for less than three years." The Intelligencer continues, "If confirmed, Hardiman, a former partner at Reed Smith, will fill the vacancy created in July 2005 when Judge Richard L. Nygaard took senior status.

DOJ_NMG_0063646

… Likewise, the second nominee, Judge Kent Jordan, 49, had served less than four years on the District of Delaware federal bench when he was chosen in June to replace Senior Judge Jane R. Roth." The Intelligencer adds, "No nominee has yet been named to replace Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who was elevated to the U.S. Supreme Court in January. … Hardiman is the former treasurer of the Republican Committee of Allegheny County, but also has strong ties to the Democratic Party by marriage. His wife is the former Lori Zappala, the niece of former Pennsylvania Supreme Court Chief Justice Stephen A. Zappala and cousin of Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen A. Zappala Jr. … Appointed to the Western District bench at age 38, Hardiman is one of the youngest 3rd Circuit nominees in recent memory -- but not the youngest."

Paulson Said To Be Returning Treasury To "Top Tier" Status. The Washington Post (9/18, A15, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "There was some chatter last week in the press about how new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is restoring his department to its traditional top-tier status after six years of downward drift under largely ignored predecessors John Snow and Paul O'Neill. Yes, we're hearing about how heavy-hitters have been filling top positions at Treasury and how Paulson talks regularly with the White House and President Bush 's innermost circle, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Some White House and State Department reporters say they detect the hand of veteran Bush spinmeister Jim Wilkinson at work in all this scuttlebutt. After all, Wilkinson worked at the White House and more recently at State before becoming Paulson's chief of staff just a couple months ago."

Earmark Reform Languishing In Senate. Roll Call (9/18, Newmyer, Ackley) reports a senior Senate leadership aide said the "two Senators taking the lead on reforming their chamber's earmark rules need to come up with a measure that can sail through the Senate before GOP leaders approve it." The Senate is "struggling to match the reform enacted last week by their House colleagues, and with the clock ticking down to adjournment, it is unclear whether Senators will be able to produce any workable rules changes." Senate Republican leaders are "deferring to Rules and Administration Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and ranking member Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a GOP leadership aide said." In addition, "similarly imperiled is a plan that Lott and Dodd want to push to eliminate the long-standing Senate tradition of secret holds, in which Senators can block legislation without identifying themselves. Republican leadership in the chamber remains opposed to the proposal."

Bilbray Says Earmark Reform A First Step In Budget Overhaul. In a USA Today op-ed (9/18), Rep. Brian Bilbray says, "With the public demanding reform, the House adopted rule changes to the practice of earmarking that will bring more transparency to the legislative and appropriations process. For the first time, earmarks will be put in the public light where everybody will be able to see how their tax dollars are being spent. This is the first step of many in what must be an ongoing commitment from this Congress to blow away the fog of anonymity that surrounds our governing process." Bilbray goes on to call "on Congress to adopt a two-year budget cycle, so that election-year politics wouldn't influence budget and appropriations decisions. I believe that decisions about the budget process should be made after elections, not before them."

GOP Fiscal Policies Seen As Contributing To Possible Loss Of Majorities. In his Wall Street Journal column (9/18), John Fund says if Republicans "lose big in November, one reason will be their tardy response to public outrage over profligate spending. The guilty pleas of former GOP Rep. Duke Cunningham and lobbyist Jack Abramoff prompted demands for reform of the earmarks -- pork projects members often secure in secret -- that were prominent in both scandals." The Federal Government is "now an astounding 185 times as big in real terms as it was a century ago. A general sense that Republicans have forgotten why they were sent to Washington is a big reason why only 43% of Republicans approve of Congress in this month's Fox News poll. If Republicans can't better explain how they plan to get a grip on spending, many voters will conclude they both deserve and need a time-out from power."

NYTimes Criticizes Congress For Failing To Overhaul Lobbying Rules. The New York Times (9/18, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "One of the shabbiest shell games under way in Congress is the attempt to convince voters that lawmakers are curbing their corrupt relations with power lobbyists. The cravenness was never clearer as G.O.P. House leaders passed a placebo rules change in place of honest reform — and on the very day when one of their own, Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, was plea bargaining in the corruption investigation of his old friend Jack Abramoff, the disgraced überlobbyist and influence peddler." The "political ghosts of Mr. Ney and Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, should haunt this Congress and its Republican bosses for their disgraceful refusal to end the Capitol's embrace of the lobbying industry. In the first burst of the Abramoff scandal last spring, both houses made all manner of reform vows, then cynically hung two hollow bills out to die on the vine."

DOJ_NMG_0063647

Boehner Clarifies Comments On Democrats' Commitment To War On Terror. House majority leader John Boehner was asked on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace) if he would like to "take back" his claim that Democrats are "more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people." Boehner replied, "the point I was trying to make is that there's a very big difference between the two parties in terms of how best to protect the American people from terrorists. I could have articulated this much better, but the fact is, is that, if you look at the USA Patriot Act, we're trying to give the president tools to protect Americans; they fought against us. You look at the Hamdan decision that came down from the Supreme Court. Democrats were jubilant that the court was taking away the president's ability to do these military tribunals. And then when the leak came out on the terrorist surveillance program over at NSA, the Democrats were jubilant that this had been exposed and began to press the administration."

WPost Urges Boehner To Apologize. The Washington Post (9/18, A16, 748K), in an editorial, writes that Boehner "should apologize. … Whether one disagrees with Democrats on any particular issue, it is offensive to try to paint opponents, as Mr. Boehner did, as uninterested in 'protecting the American people' -- and to dodge the implications of that statement by claiming, as Mr. Boehner did, that he was simply wondering. As the election season heats up, this is a line of argument that Republicans would do well to drop."

USPS Granted Official Two Month Vacation Despite Allegations Of Improprieties. The Washington Post (9/18, A15, Williamson, 748K) reports, "All summer, federal-dom has been abuzz over a steamy U.S. Postal Service Inspector General's report accusing the agency's former public affairs chief of heavy drinking, expense account chicanery and sexual harassment. But who knew that the subject of the report, Azeezaly S. Jaffer, has spent the season on vacation, courtesy of the Postal Service? Jaffer's taxpayers' holiday bears witness, a Postal Service spokesman said, 'to how hardworking he is.' The June IG report accuses Jaffer, who managed a staff of 160 and a $20 million budget, of, among other things: drinking at a work function until he passed out; running up $8,000 in extra hotel room charges so he could qualify for a suite with a bathtub for two; and following a female colleague into her hotel room, propositioning her, then passing out."

Transportation Department Official Charged With Using Stolen Funds For Escort Services. The Washington Times (9/18, McElhatton, 88K) reports, "As a specialist on fuel cell technology in the US Department of Transportation, Shang Hsiung traveled the country for years to attend trade conferences to discuss alternative fuel and other agency initiatives." But Federal authorities "say the 54-year-old Takoma Park man had another agenda during his out-of-town trips. Since 2001, prosecutors say, Mr. Hsiung used counterfeit checks and stolen credit-card information -- including co-workers' card numbers -- to pay for escort services while on government travel." Charging documents "do not state how much money investigators think was stolen over the years. A spokesman for the US attorney's office in the District said the amount is not yet part of the public record but 'is in the thousands of dollars.'"

Report Lists Six Key Trends For Overhauling Government Operations. The Washington Post (9/18, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that a report to be released today lists "six trends that are keys to overhauling government operations and improving federal performance. The trends were identified by three senior staff members at the IBM Center for the Business of Government with an eye to helping federal agencies prepare for an era in which incremental change may not be enough to meet public expectations or to address such megaproblems as terrorism. … The trends, according to IBM, are: Changing the rules. The traditional personnel, procurement and financial management systems are being replaced. … Using performance management. … Providing competition, choice and incentives. … Performing on demand. … Engaging citizens. … Using networks and partnerships."

First Lady To Headline Opening Of Clinton Global Initiative. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that First Lady Laura Bush "headlines the opening of the second annual Bill Clinton Global Initiative. That's Bubba's big effort to fix the world's problems. Rules are that every headliner must pledge action in a major problem area; the first lady will call for a special clean water program in sub-Saharan Africa."

DOJ_NMG_0063648

Colleagues Praise Hyde's Accomplishment As International Relations Chair. The Washington Post (9/18, A15, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "The plaudits have already begun for House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), who's leaving Congress at the end of this term. At the end of a committee meeting Tuesday, likely one of the last Hyde will chair, his good buddy Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the panel's ranking Democrat, praised Hyde's accomplishments and asked everyone to give him a round of applause for his service."

Senate Urged To Approve General Officer Promotions. In the Washington Times (9/18, 88K), DOD insider Stephen Herbits writes that "Gen. John Craddock and Vice Adm. James Stavridis" will be facing the Senate Armed Services Committee for their General Officer nominations. Herbits warns that "it will be tempting for some senators to use the occasion to play 'let's beat up on Rumsfeld' instead of truly considering the merits of the officers before them." Given the growing reluctance of potential officeholders to endure the Senate confirmation process, Herbits counsels, "But the Senate has no place pillorying them for decisions they don't make or policies they don't construct. And as difficult as it may be for some, it wouldn't hurt if diligent questioning was also relevant and respectful."

NYTimes Urges Census Bureau To Change The Way It Counts Inmates. The New York Times (9/18, 1.21M)editorializes, "The Census Bureau has stubbornly rebuffed critics who argue that the nation's prison inmates should be counted at their homes instead of where they are serving time. But a persuasive new report from the National Research Council makes the current method difficult to defend. The Census Bureau commissioned the report, which deals with residency rules in general. In one of its most important findings, the report says that the practice of counting inmates at prisons sometimes distorts the political process and 'raises legitimate concerns'' about 'equity and fairness in the census.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Nears Record High Set In 2000. USA Today (9/18, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "Six years, eight months and three days after etching a record close of 11,722.98 into the history books, the Dow Jones industrial average starts the week just 162 points shy of topping that. If it succeeds, it will erase all of the 37.8% loss it suffered during the 2000-2002 bear market, a painful period on Wall Street that shook investors' faith in stocks." USA Today notes, "The mood shift on Wall Street is being driven by a few key trends, including…a belief that the Fed chairman's forecast is playing out. When the Fed decided not to raise its target for short-term rates in August after 17 boosts, Fed chief Ben Bernanke based that decision on the belief that a slowing economy would relieve inflationary pressures. He also noted that if energy prices retreated, it would also help abate price pressures. He's been right."

The Wall Street Journal (9/18, McKay, 2.03M) reports that in May the DJIA "pulled within about 80 points of its record high, only to tumble. It was off more than 936 points, or 8%, by the time it bottomed a month later. Many shareholders took the spring peak as a chance to book profits rather than stick around for even heftier gains to top the Dow's all-time high reached in January 2000."

Inflation, Weak Housing Market Said To Imperil Recovery. The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, Trumbull, 58K) reports, "Some economists worry about a possible recession, especially if the housing market stumbles badly. Others fear that inflation will persist. But the stock market is riding on hope of a more moderate outcome: that the economy can continue growing, if perhaps more slowly, as a housing boom fades and inflationary forces diminish."

Fed Expected To Leave Rates Unchanged. USA Today (9/18, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "The Federal Reserve is expected to leave short-term interest rates unchanged when it meets Wednesday, given recent signs of moderating inflation and growth. A market that bets on future Fed moves was pricing a 90% chance that the central bank will stand pat this week for the second straight meeting. But there is less agreement about the Fed's long-term strategy. … Though core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy prices, has been running above the Fed's informal comfort zone of

DOJ_NMG_0063649

1% to 2%...Bernanke and other officials have said in speeches and statements they expect a slowing economy to reduce price pressures."

Surprising Earnings Data Attributed To Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, lp, 2.03M) reports, "Scorekeepers at the Commerce Department last month discovered that American workers were earning far more than previously estimated -- and that created an economic puzzle. The new data were out of step with other measures showing sluggish wage growth, a factor in widespread worker dissatisfaction turning up in the polls. … The answer appears to be stock options, a growing part of compensation for top-end workers. Accounting for them properly has been a major source of controversy for companies. Now it is complicating the government's economic accounting, as well. The Commerce Department's Bureau of Economic Analysis, which keeps the nation's GDP books, treats profits from the exercise of options as labor income. But options aren't counted in most other measures of wages. So the BEA reports -- which are important both to markets and the Federal Reserve -- may be overstating the extent of wage pressure, and, for related reasons, at least temporarily understating profits."

Democrats Plan To Attack GOP On Economic Issues. Roll Call (9/18, Billings) reports, "Forced to play defense on national security for the third election year in a row, Congressional Democrats have been huddling in recent days to try to sharpen their attacks on the one issue they believe puts Republicans on the run: the economy." While the economy "has long been a central focus of both the Democratic and Republican election-year platforms, Democrats in both the House and Senate have been working behind the scenes to redouble their efforts to draw attention to the issue." Democrats "in both chambers say they cannot sideline their economic message, even as they attempt to battle a powerful GOP political machine that's trying to paint them as weak on terrorism. Privately, Democrats say they believe they can tap into voters's anxieties about economic security just as effectively as the Republicans play into Americans' fears about their safety at home." House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer said, "Yes, they have the bully pulpit to talk about security, but that's the only issue they have. In all other areas, they have essentially been failures." Roll Call adds Democratic lawmakers "and aides say they believe the 2006 elections will turn on several factors, but in many of the top competitive races across the country — including contests in states such as Michigan, Ohio, New York, Indiana and Kentucky — the economy is likely to be the driving issue."

Polls Show GOP Closing Gap, Bush's Approval Rating Higher. The Washington Times (9/18, Lambro, 88K) reports Republicans "appear to be gaining on the Democrats in the 2006 midterm campaign because of growing confidence in the economy, falling gas prices and President Bush's sustained political offensive on the terrorist threat, according to pollsters and campaign strategists." National preference polls "on the so-called 'generic ballot' question -- which party's candidate voters say they would choose -- show Republicans have narrowed the once-substantial lead Democrats held and are now trailing them by three percentage points, independent pollster John Zogby said Friday." Zogby "credited the Republican Party's sudden political turnaround to 'the president's focus on the war on terrorism, a rebound among his own base,' and the Democrats' failure to lay out a clear plan of their own on 'how are we're going to get out of Iraq and what they would do about terrorism that's better than the Republicans.'" Zogby said Democrats "are not giving their Democratic base what it needs to hear on those issues. Republicans are severely wounded. The Democrats should be crushing them, and they are not." While "top election forecasters have pointed to an anti-Bush and anti-Republican 'wave' that they predict will return the Democrats to majority power in the House," Zogby said, "I don't see the landslide that others are seeing. That doesn't mean it can't materialize, but as of today, it's not happening and this is mid-September."

The Washington Times (9/18, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "'President Bush is receiving his highest job-performance numbers in a few months,' according to a Harris poll of 1,004 adults surveyed between Sept. 8 and 11 that was released yesterday. According to the respondents, 12 percent said Mr. Bush's job performance was 'excellent,' 27 percent felt it was 'pretty good' and 22 percent deemed it 'fair.' Thirty-eight percent said it was 'poor.'"

ABC World News (9/17, story 6, 2:35, Harris) reported, "With less than a month and a half to go before crucial congressional elections, Republicans and Democrats are fighting, now, over who is better protecting America from terrorism." ABC (Marlantes) added, "Republicans are turning up the volume on what they see as their strongest issue," and "polls show its working. The Democrats' lead in the battle to take control of Congress is shrinking. For months, momentum has been on Democrats' side. Liberal activists are especially energized. Democrats are working hard to separate the war on terror from the war in Iraq, which polls show is increasingly unpopular."

DOJ_NMG_0063650

Rothenberg Downplays Reports Of GOP "Surge." In his Roll Call column (9/18), Stuart Rothenberg says it is "a good idea to try to anticipate the ups and downs of this election cycle's stretch run, so when the inevitable stories about a Republican 'surge' hit the newspapers, you won't be taken completely by surprise." First, this "is the kind of cycle when long-shot challengers suddenly appear, even as late as mid-October. If the national environment doesn't change, Republican seats previously taken for granted could show up as vulnerable in late polling, as the Democrats experienced with then-Rep. Dan Rostenkowski's Illinois district in 1994." But since polling "across the country shows that Democratic voters already have rallied to Democratic candidates, some of these surprisingly close polls simply may reflect the Democratic generic vote in the district rather than a Democratic challenger's strength." Rothenberg cites the example of California's 4th CD, where Democratic challenger Charlie Brown's polling shows "him running virtually even" with Republican Rep. John Doolittle, but Brown "has the warmth of a second-degree frostbite. And that's before you get to the contradictory and confusing way he talks about issues and his personal philosophy." Second, Rothenberg adds, "beware of all national surges. And remember: Journalists always want a horse race, not a blowout." Third, "and this doesn't contradict my last warning -- don't be surprised if there is some normal 'firming' of the GOP base in the next six weeks that helps GOP candidates in Republican-leaning districts. In fact, I'm expecting it."

Republicans Seen As Likely To Retain Majorities. In a Los Angeles Times column (9/18), Niall Ferguson says, "For the Republican candidate in '08, it might actually be better if the Democrats did well in the midterms, because a brief return to power on the Hill would expose their chronic incoherence, making the case for a Republican comeback two years down the line. That scenario, however, is not on the cards. The leaves may be falling in George Bush's America, but the Republicans look like they're hanging on."

Senate Control Said To Be Within Democrats' Reach. In a sidebar story, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, 2.03M) reports that roughly a dozen of this year's US Senate races are "hotly contested. Most of the tightest races are for seats now held by Republicans, putting control of Congress's upper chamber within reach for Democrats, if everything goes their way." US News lists the Maryland contest between Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin and GOP nominee Michael Steele, the race between GOP Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger Jim Webb and the Pennsylvania race between GOP Sen. Rick Santorum and Democrat Bob Casey among the most interesting.,

Bush Said To Be "All Adrenaline And Testosterone" Going Into 2006 Elections. Time (9/25, Allen, 4.03M) reports that "as he stares down one last campaign, the President suddenly seems to be all adrenaline and testosterone. It shows in his frenetic schedule and in his assertive choice of words but perhaps most especially in his body language as he tries to win over midterm voters by looking and sounding commanding -- he's practically shaking voters by their lapels." Bush "has been on just about every imaginable stage lately. He went to Capitol Hill; gave a prime-time address; held the Rose Garden news conference; invited an anchorman into his limo, an editorialist onto Air Force One and a columnist into the Oval; held an off-the-record session for conservative radio hosts; and sat down chummily with a clutch of conservative opinion writers who had favored the war in Iraq but now think more troops are needed. That was all in nine days. He's so determined to be everywhere that he even did a White House interview with CBS's Katie Couric, despite his rough history with the network and the view among many Republican operatives that she's too liberal."

Republicans Hope 2000 Redistricting "Firewall" Will Protect Some Endangered Seats. The Washington Times (9/18, Lambro, 88K) reports one of the "last lines of defense that Republicans hope will repel the Democrats' attempts to win back the House are the thicker 'fire walls' they installed in their congressional districts under reapportionment." Three "top Democratic takeover opportunities are in Republican-leaning Ohio, where a gloomy political climate has raised Democratic hopes of a major comeback in the state." In the 1st CD, Rep. Steve Chabot faces Democrat John Cranley; in the 15th, Rep. Democrat Pryce faces Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy; and in the 18th, the seat of Rep. Bob Ney, Republican state Sen. Joy Padgett faces Democrat Zack Space. The races "are on elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg's list of 'pure tossups,' but Republican officials said the districts have been redrawn to withstand just the kind of aggressive Democratic offensive they expect in November." Ohio Republican state Chairman Bob Bennett said, "Both the 15th and 18th district lines were changed and strengthened after the 2000 census, as was the 1st district. I feel good about where we are and feel we've turned the corner, though it doesn't mean we don't have a battleground here. We do."

DOJ_NMG_0063651

At Iowa Event, Obama Says Democrats Need Tougher Line On National Security. The AP (9/18, Glover) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama "warned Democratic activists Sunday that the party must take a tougher stance on national security if it wants to succeed in the November elections." Obama, the keynote speaker at Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's 29th annual steak fry, said, "What Democrats have to do is to close the deal. We have got to show we have a serious agenda for change." The AP adds Obama's "appearance in Iowa, where precinct caucuses launch the presidential season, has raised a number of eyebrows about his intentions for a presidential run in 2008. Though only a first-term senator, Obama has burst onto the national scene." But he "wouldn't say Sunday whether he was considering a run at the White House." Obama said, "My only attentions right now are focused on '06. Whoever is looking toward 2008 without focusing on 2006 makes a mistake." The AP adds former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "also spent Sunday afternoon at the steak fry, and left little doubt that he is looking ahead to 2008." Warner said, "You know and I know that it all starts in Iowa. Do your part. We're going to take back the Congress this year and then we're going to take back our nation."

The New York Times (9/18, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Obama "insists, as always, that he is not running for president. But there are compelling clues that he is not exactly not running, either." The "most obvious was his keynote appearance here on Sunday at Senator Tom Harkin's legendary steak fry, a popular Democratic ritual in Iowa — and a prominent staging ground in this first presidential caucus state. The crowd rushed Mr. Obama when he arrived, then mobbed him for hours as other politicians wandered the fairgrounds introducing themselves and shaking hands." But "beyond his first trip to Iowa — a visit that was guaranteed to set off new speculation about his presidential ambitions — Mr. Obama is in the midst of an unconventional publicity tour of sorts. Fresh off a closely watched journey through Africa, including a stop at the home of his Kenyan-born father, Mr. Obama is about to publish a second book that supporters believe will outpace his best-seller from 1995." Obama's "40-minute speech was punctuated by applause and standing ovations but also, at its most serious moments, brought the audience to a silence hushed enough for rustling trees to be heard. It focused on the importance of a Democratic victory in the 2006 midterm elections." The trip, "which had been hyped for weeks, took on greater significance when news leaked that Mr. Obama had invited along Steve Hildebrand, a political strategist who ran Vice President Al Gore's campaign in Iowa in 2000."

Allen And Webb Clash Over War In Iraq. Tim Russert of NBC's Meet the Press (9/17) hosted a debate between Sen. George Allen and his Democratic challenger, former Navy Secretary Jim Webb. Most of the hour-long debate focused on the war in Iraq and the candidates' views on the continued presence of US troops. Webb advocated the gradual removal of American soldiers to bases outside of Iraq, while Allen said he supports "staying the course…meaning that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender." Asked if more troops were needed in Iraq, Allen did not respond directly but said, "We're going to need to do what it takes to succeed." Webb was also asked if President Bush ought to increase American troop levels in Iraq, Webb responded that the US doesn't have enough troops to do so "when you've got people now in the Army and the Marine Corps pulling their third and sometimes their fourth tours into Iraq. We're burning out our people. It's one of the things I was warning about early on." Later, Webb added, "One of the great problems we have right now in discussing this war is that very few people who have brought us this war have served, and very, very few of the children of these people who have brought us this war have served. And if you have to wake up every morning wondering about a loved one, you will look at wars like this much differently." Webb also encouraged the US to open diplomatic talks with Iran and Syria, saying, "Eventually, this is going to have to move into a diplomatic environment. Now, that's where this Administration seems to have blinders. They're not talking to Syria. They're not talking to Iran. And there are ways that we can do this, move this forward. If you look at what we did after Afghanistan, in the invasion of Afghanistan, we actually brought the countries around Afghanistan to the table, including Iran, by the way. Iran was cooperating at that time, before President Bush made his axis of evil speech and they stopped cooperating."

DOJ_NMG_0063652

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (9/18, Hardin) reports Webb and Allen "went to the mat over Iraq today as the increasingly unpopular war dominated their national TV debate." Webb said, "If we had the right people in the Senate there would have been more questions asked and a better policy in place in order to defeat international terrorism. … We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism, we have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there." The Times-Dispatch adds Allen defended "his vote in favor of authorizing the use of military force in Iraq," saying, "I think the world's better off with Saddam Hussein not in power." But Allen "tried to deflect, or sidestepped, a number of pointed questions from moderator Tim Russert on the war. They included whether Allen would have voted the same way if the Senate had known Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction."

The AP (9/18, Lewis) reports Webb said President Bush's "terror-detainee legislation would weaken the Geneva Conventions and potentially subject captured U.S. soldiers to torture." Webb said, "We have to stay on the moral high ground." The AP adds Allen said "he has not decided whether to back Bush's plan to detain, question and prosecute suspected terrorists or another measure supported by Republican Sen. John Warner, Virginia's senior senator."

ABC World News (9/17, story 6, 2:35, Marlantes) reported, "Like many vulnerable Republicans," Sen. George Allen "admits the Iraq war has not been easy. But he says retreat would be a mistake." Sen. George Allen: "This is a central battlefront in the war on terror. And it's not just the President or the Vice President or me saying that. That's what al Qaeda says." Marlantis: "Allen's opponent, Jim Webb, campaigning in the rain, holds no illusions about his own party's difficulties on the national security front." Jim Webb: "What's happened is the Republicans have positioned these issues so that the other side is on the defensive."

The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports in a front page story that the debate offered "the sharpest contrast yet in a campaign that has become central to the partisan struggle for control of Congress this fall." The joint appearance "also confronted issues of race and gender and debated the use of torture in the war on terror. But the exchange largely centered on a controversial war that has become the defining issue of the Nov. 7 midterm elections." Webb "called the Iraq war an 'incredible strategic blunder of historic proportions' and said he has lost confidence in Bush's foreign policy. He repeatedly reminded viewers that neither Bush nor Allen, a former governor, had served in combat." Allen "steadfastly defended Bush's Middle East policies, telling moderator Tim Russert that 'staying the course' in Iraq means 'that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender.'"

The Washington Times (9/18, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Allen "said he has not decided whether to support President Bush's push to revise Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which regulates the interrogation standards of military prisoners." But Webb "agreed with Republican Sens. John W. Warner of Virginia and John McCain of Arizona, two former Marines who are concerned that the president's plan to redefine the provision to deal with terror suspects would open the door to torture of U.S. troops." Webb said, "What you're seeing is a split between the theorists who have controlled so much of the policy in this administration, theorists who have never been on a battlefield, who have never put a uniform on, and who are looking at this thing in a totally different way from people who have had to worry about their troops and themselves possibly coming under enemy hands."

Webb Claims Affirmative Action Programs Have Evolved Into "State-Sponsored Racism." Also On NBC's Meet the Press (9/17, Russert) Webb was asked to clarify a quote in which he equated affirmative action with "state-sponsored racism," Webb responded, "African-Americans are the only ethnic group in this country that have suffered from deliberate discrimination and exclusion by the government over generations. When this program expanded to the present-day diversity programs, where essentially every ethnic group other than Caucasians are included, then that becomes state-sponsored racism. And we should either move this program back to its original intent, which I support, or we should open up diversity programs to the point where poor white cultures --and they are cultures, as in southwest Virginia -- have some opportunity."

Webb Seen As Giving Allen "Truly Competitive" Race. Under the headline, "As Senator Falters, A Democrat Rises In Virginia," the New York Times (9/18, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "This race has become more than an intriguing clash of symbols; according to the polls, it is now truly competitive. Increasingly, Democratic strategists see Virginia as a prime target for one of the six seats they need to regain a majority. Perhaps most important for Mr. Webb, whose late-starting campaign has lagged far behind Mr. Allen's in fund-raising, the Democrat's contributions have begun to climb, advisers say."

DOJ_NMG_0063653

Burns Facing The "Toughest Test Of His Career." U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Knight, 2.03M) reports on the Montana Senate race between incumbent GOP Sen. Conrad Burns and Democratic challenger John Tester. According to US News, Tester's "down-home attitude is clearly appealing to many Big Sky Country voters and has Burns facing the toughest test of his career. Burns's job is also one the national Democratic Party is eyeing hungrily in its quest to gain six seats and win back the Senate. The most recent polling put Tester, president of the Montana state Senate, slightly ahead -- a shocking turnabout for the incumbent." Burns's strategy "is to appeal to those who voted for Bush and paint Tester as too liberal for Montana."

Abramoff Scandal Not A "Decisive Issue" In Burns Reelection Campaign. The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Harden, 748K) reports in a front page story that in the Montana Senate race, Republican Sen. Conrad Burns "may be carrying" convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff "on his back, but in this thinly populated, Republican-leaning state, he continues to run neck and neck with his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, president of the Montana Senate. Poll numbers have not moved much in months." For all "the influence-peddling that has been exposed in the run-up to the midterm election, corruption on Capitol Hill has not become a decisive issue -- here or in much of the country. The Abramoff scandal, having ended the careers of a few lawmakers and stained the reputations of several others, can certainly rile up ardent Democrats, as the debate here demonstrated. But it is not making fundamental changes in the nation's partisan landscape, especially in races, as with Burns in Montana, in which candidates are facing only unsavory stories rather than indictments or guilty pleas." Burns said his "polling shows that most voters regard the 'Abramoff deal' as merely a political liability and not a damning verdict on his character. Several pollsters and observers of politics in this state agreed with that assessment." The controversy is "almost certainly the main reason Burns is in a competitive race this year, but by no means is it a guaranteed career-ender." The Post adds that despite "some early goners" such as Rep. Tom DeLay, Rep. Robert Ney, and Ralph Reed, in "strongly Republican areas, scandal-driven change is far from a sure thing."

Republicans Still Hopeful That McGavick Can Unseat Cantwell. The Washington Times (9/18, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Washington state voters today "formally choose their nominees for the U.S. Senate, setting the stage for a West Coast showdown that Republicans hope will help them capture a Democratic seat." Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell "faces anti-war candidate Hong Tran in a primary that serves as the opening act for a race with Republican Mike McGavick, who is expected to easily win his own primary contest today." Republicans and "some pollsters think Mr. McGavick, a business executive who casts himself as an independent, has a good shot at ousting the freshman senator this fall." Cantwell is "not considered in danger of losing tomorrow's primary as did her Democratic colleague Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut."

Senate Candidates Not Required To Submit Electronic Campaign Finance Reports. In his Washington Post column (9/18, D1), Jeffrey Birnbaum says that in "one of the most controversial quirks in election law, candidates for Senate are not required to file their campaign-finance reports electronically. That means voters can't effectively find out how much and from whom their would-be senators have collected money until long after the election -- too late for them to act." A "growing number of senators and public-interest groups have been working for years to change this rule. They contend that it's only reasonable that senators should be required to file their disclosures electronically -- just as candidates for the House and the presidency do. In that way voters can easily see within 24 hours via the Internet what the candidates are spending and from whom they are getting their funds." Senators have "insolated themselves from criticism that stems from their very important, end-of-campaign donations because they have denied voters accessible information when it would be most useful."

Opponent Tries To Capitalize On Reichert Fundraiser With Rove. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Verhovek, 918K) reports a "funny thing happened Friday when Karl Rove, the White House advisor, came to the Seattle suburbs to headline a fundraiser for freshman Republican Rep. Dave Reichert: The congressman did nothing to publicize the visit, and his challenger drew every bit of attention to it she could." On the day Rove "was in town, Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft Corp. executive who is Reichert's Democratic opponent, issued her fifth news release of the week casting the visit in a negative light, and while Rove and Reichert were attending a round-table briefing for Republican donors, about 60 Burner supporters mugged for cameras outside." But both of Rove's appearances — "at the fundraiser and at the round table — were private and closed to the media, so there were no news photographs of Reichert, 56, with campaign mastermind Rove."

DOJ_NMG_0063654

Graf Win Raises Questions About GOP's Immigration Strategy. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Marek, 2.03M) reports that in Arizona's 8th congressional district, a founding member of the Minutemen border group won the GOP nomination despite the fact that opponents "attacked him as extreme, and the national Republican Party went so far as to buy at least $122,000 worth of ads for Graf's most formidable moderate challenger, state Rep. Steve Huffman." Graf's victory has raised questions "about the wisdom of the party's floundering immigration strategy. It has also put in jeopardy a precious House seat" in the mostly moderate district. US News adds that many experts say "if Republicans want to keep the seat, they'll have to unite behind Graf and convince Arizonan swing voters to do so too as well."

Mehlman's RNC Said To Be Outperforming DNC. The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, Cook, 58K) reports even Democrats "acknowledge the prowess of the political machine Ken Mehlman oversees as chairman of the Republican National Committee (RNC). When Mehlman came to a Monitor-sponsored breakfast with national reporters on Friday, the policy-oriented National Journal magazine had just released a poll of political insiders ranking the performance of the RNC and the Democratic National Committee (DNC)." National Journal reporter Jim Barnes noted it is "no surprise that 94 percent of Republican insiders think the RNC is doing a better job than the Democratic National Committee in the run-up to the midterm elections. The surprise is that 68 percent of the Democratic insiders agree that the RNC is out-performing the DNC." Mehlman "downplayed the role of organization in elections." Mehlman said, "The reason I am confident we are going to keep our majority is not because of our operations. It is because of the candidates on the ballot. We won in '04 because of George W. Bush, not because we had a smart turnout operation. 80 percent of politics is motivating voters based on ideas, based on ideology, and based on the candidate that expresses ideas and ideology. I think what has hurt Democrats is the fact that for so long you've had uncertain trumpets leading the party. And that makes it very hard to do the rest." The Monitor adds Mehlman "attributes a bump in the president's job approval numbers to 'a combination of speeches and realities in the world that have reminded people that a lot of what he is saying makes sense.'" However, he "did not want to make a specific numerical forecast for the Congressional elections."

Democrats Lead Fundraising In Most Competitive House Races. Newsweek (9/25, Fineman, Bailey, 3.12M) reports on the DCCC's Red to Blue Program, which will have aid about 40 Democratic congressional candidates this year. According to Newsweek, "If you are a member…donations from strangers across the country will blow through your campaign mail slot like letters from Hogwarts. All you have to do is convince Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Chicago that you are worthy and that you can win." Emanuel says the program "is a Good Housekeeping Seal." Newsweek adds that "there is evidence that the Red to Blue Program is working: Democratic candidates are even or ahead in fund-raising in most of the races that neutral observers regard as competitive."

Emanuel's Brother Becoming A Political Networking Force In Los Angeles. Newsweek (9/25, Fineman, Bailey, 3.12M) reports that DCCC Chair Rahm Emanuel's brother, Hollywood agent Ari Emanuel "is fast becoming a political networking force in Los Angeles, issuing his clients and partners invitations to fund-raising events, including one for Rahm himself and for his House campaign committee."

Wesley Clark To Take Position At UCLA. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Trounson, 918K) reports Wesley K. Clark, a former NATO commander and 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, "will join the University of California, Los Angeles, this fall as a senior fellow, university officials are set to announce Monday. Clark, who is expected to arrive on campus about the first of October, will teach occasional seminars, publish policy papers and organize and hold an annual conference on national security, officials said. He will be affiliated with the university's Ronald W. Burkle Center for International Relations."

DOJ_NMG_0063655

WPost Urges Universities To Eliminate Early Admissions. The Washington Post (9/18, A16, 748K) writes in an editorial "Harvard University's much-applauded decision no longer to allow the early acceptance of students should help ensure a more equitable admissions process and attract a more diverse group of students." But while Harvard "risks little" the University of Delaware "took a bigger chance last spring when it eliminated early admissions." So "as other schools ponder whether they can afford to follow the example…they would do well to note the widespread reaction of parents, teachers and guidance counselors who see the decision as a step toward easing the anxiety, tension and premature pressure that has come to permeate the process for too many students."

US Showdown With Iran Seen As Increasingly Likely. In its cover story, Time (9/25, Duffy, 4.03M) reports on "What War with Iran Would Look Like." Time says that from the State Department to the White House to the highest reaches of the military command, "there is a growing sense that a showdown with Iran…may be impossible to avoid. … So what would it look like? Interviews with dozens of experts and government officials in Washington, Tehran and elsewhere in the Middle East paint a sobering picture: military action against Iran's nuclear facilities would have a decent chance of succeeding, but at a staggering cost. … A Pentagon official says that among the known sites there are 1,500 different 'aim points,' which means the campaign could well require the involvement of almost every type of aircraft in the US arsenal: Stealth bombers and fighters, B-1s and B-2s, as well as F-15s and F-16s operating from land and F-18s from aircraft carriers. … Many sites are in highly populated areas, so civilian casualties would be a certainty."

Rice To Push New Iran Sanctions Resolution. In its cover story, Time (9/25, Duffy, 4.03M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week "will push her partners to get behind a new sanctions resolution that would ban Iranian imports of dual-use technologies, like parts for its centrifuge cascades for uranium enrichment, and bar travel overseas by certain government officials. The next step would be restrictions on government purchases of computer software and hardware, office supplies, tires and auto parts -- steps Russia and China have signaled some reluctance to endorse. But even Rice's advisers don't believe that Iran can be persuaded to completely abandon its ambitions. Instead, they hope to tie Iran up in a series of suspensions, delays and negotiations until a more pragmatic faction of leadership in Tehran gains the upper hand."

Iran May Be Years Away From Producing A Nuclear Bomb. Newsweek (9/25, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column that last week the House intelligence committee's assessment of Iran's nuclear program "was slammed by UN nuclear experts, who pointed out that there's little evidence Iran is anywhere near producing weapons-grade uranium. And three US officials familiar with recent intel reporting on Iran, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitive subject matter, said that US agencies have not altered assessments that Iran is years away from producing a nuclear bomb. … David Albright, a former UN WMD inspector and independent expert, told NEWSWEEK: 'Iran's gas-centrifuge program is moving unexpectedly slowly. The program was expected to be much further along by this point.'" Another of US official "said intel reports show Iran was experiencing significant problems with gyroscopes it has been trying to install on missiles that could deliver Iranian bombs to targets in the region and even further."

Iranian President Says US, Iran Are Not Fated To Be In Conflict. As part of its cover package, Time (9/25, MacLeod, 4.03M) interviews Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Asked what he would say to President Bush if he could sit down with him, Ahmadinejad said, "The issues which are of interest to us are the international issues and how to manage them. I gave some recommendations to President Bush in my personal letter, and I hope that he will take note of them. I would ask him, Are rationalism, spirituality and humanitarianism and logic are they bad things for human beings? Why more conflict? Why should we go for hostilities? Why should we develop weapons of mass destruction? Everybody can love one another." Asked why his supporters chant "Death to America," Ahmadinejad said, "When they chanted that slogan, it means they hate aggression, and they hate bullying tactics, and they hate violations of the rights of nations and discrimination. I recommended to President Bush that he can change his behavior, then everything will change." Ahmadinejad was also asked if the US and Iran are fated to be in conflict. He said, "No, this is not fate. And this can come to an end. I have said we can run the world through logic. We are living our own lives. The US government should not interfere in our affairs. They should live their own lives. They should serve the interests of the US people. They should not interfere in our affairs. Then there would be no problems with that."

DOJ_NMG_0063656

Bush, Ahmadinejad To Address UN General Assembly. USA Today (9/18, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad deliver dueling speeches at the United Nations this week in what could become a dramatic showdown over Iran's nuclear program." Bush "has pledged to use his UN talk to send Iran a clear warning that it must heed a UN Security Council resolution calling on it to suspend its program to make nuclear fuel. Iran says its program is for peaceful purposes, while Bush says Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons." The two leaders "are scheduled to speak hours apart Tuesday at the annual meeting of heads of state of the General Assembly."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, LaFranchi, 58K) says Bush "will studiously avoid… Amadinejad. And Mr. Bush probably won't take up the controversial leader's challenge to the American president to face him in a 'civilizational debate.'" But "Bush does plan to lay out his vision for the world, including an elaboration of his "freedom agenda" and the role of democracy in building global security, when he addresses the 192-country assembly Tuesday."

Under the headline, "Europeans Trying to Grease Wheels for US Talks With Iran," the Washington Post (9/18, A14, Linzer, 748K) reports, "European efforts to get Iran and the United States around the same negotiating table are at an advanced yet sensitive stage, with a small number of remaining differences to be tackled this week when world leaders gather at the United Nations." In his UN speech tomorrow, President Bush will detail "why he regards the Tehran government as a grave threat yet is willing to support negotiations to ease those concerns." The Post adds that since 2002, Bush "has sought, without success, to roll back" Iran's nuclear program, however, many allies have "been wary of supporting a U.S. president who has invaded two countries in the past five years and who has said that 'all options are on the table' for Iran." Bush and Secretary Rice "will meet with allies" in New York "to discuss prospects for talks as well as options if those do not materialize." Rice had dinner last night with EU foreign policy head Javier Solana, who is said to be "waiting for [Ali] Larijani to deliver a firm commitment from his government to halt its uranium enrichment program." Administration "officials expressed skepticism, however, that Larijani would be able to secure that commitment. They said the administration has not made preparations for talks, such as formalizing a negotiating team or outlining guiding principles for discussion." The Post adds, "Through Solana and other mediators, [Tehran has] said it would be hard for them to sit down with a U.S. administration that is seen as threatening the Iranian leadership." Tomorrow night, Rice is slated to have dinner with her counterparts from France, Britain, Germany, Russia, China and Italy "to discuss Iran."

The Financial Times (9/18, Guha, Giles, Dombey) follows Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson's work on Iran at the IMF and World Bank meetings in Singapore. Washington "is seeking to increase economic pressure on Iran, even as its partners in the European Union talk to the Islamic Republic about beginning formal negotiations on Tehran's nuclear programme." Paulson "is personally lobbying finance ministers and central bank governors to ensure their national financial systems are not used by Iranian entities involved in proliferation or terrorism finance. But his efforts have irritated some European officials, who have objected to what they see as Washington's moves to impose sanctions on Iran through the back door." The EU continues a "diplomatic push to open negotiations as an alternative to sanctions – which, in any case, face serious obstacles at the UN."

Chirac Calls For Negotiations With Iran, Delay In Action On Sanctions. The Australia Daily Telegraph (9/18) reports this morning, "French President Jacques Chirac has urged world powers not to refer Iran to the UN Security Council over its nuclear program, at the same time calling on Tehran to give up uranium enrichment. 'First we have to find an agenda for negotiation, then engage the negotiation and during that negotiation I propose that on the one hand the six refrain from referring the issue to the Security Council and that Iran renounce during the negotiation the enrichment of uranium,' he said." The Daily Telegraph adds, "Mr Chirac said that he was 'never a supporter of sanctions' and had 'never noticed that sanctions are effective'. However he added that he 'did not mean that we must not have sanctions -- which if it comes to it must be moderate and well-adapted'."

Bush's Attitude Toward UN Said To Have Changed. The Washington Times (9/18, Curl, 88K) reports, "Bush, who once said the United Nations was teetering on the brink of irrelevancy and demanded it show some backbone, has increasingly turned to the organization for international problem-solving, even as most Americans think the body has outlived its usefulness." On issues "from North Korea to Iran to Sudan, the president….has deferred to the United Nations to drive action." The Times adds, "Critics say Mr. Bush has been forced to become more multilateral after bucking the world body by invading Iraq, but administration officials assert that the United Nations remains a useful tool to spur foreign leaders to step in on major issues."

DOJ_NMG_0063657

USA Today (9/18, Jackson, 2.27M) reports Bush and United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan "say they get along fine on a personal level. It's the issues, from the Iraq war to nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea, that divide them." Noting those "lingering US-UN tensions," USA Today reports Bush said Fridsay that "the UN has been slow to address growing violence in the Darfur region of the Sudan and again questioned the institution's stewardship of its finances." Annan, "at a news conference of his own last week, cited the biggest conflict of them all: Iraq. Asked about a recent visit to the Middle East, Annan said, 'Most of the leaders I spoke to felt that the invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them.'" Annan "said his overall relations with the Bush administration 'are very good,' including with the president himself. For his part, Bush said of Annan: 'I like him. And we've got a good relationship, personal relationship.'"

Hezbollah Leader Plans Celebration Of "Victory" Over Israel. The AP (9/18) reports, "Hezbollah's leader called Sunday for a massive rally in Beirut's bombed out southern suburbs to mark the militant group's 'victory' over Israel during the monthlong fighting this summer." Sheik Hassan Nasrallah "said the rally, to be held Friday evening, would show Hezbollah's 'absolute commitment to our right to recover our land and prisoners and defend our nation, its dignity, freedom, sovereignty and real and full independence in the face of (Israeli) occupation.'"

Israeli Panel To Investigate Conduct Of Lebanon War. The New York Times (9/18, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "The Israeli government established a committee on Sunday to investigate the political and military leadership's handling of the recent war in Lebanon, which has come under intense public criticism in the month since the fighting ended." In Israel, "many citizens say that the military campaign in Lebanon was poorly planned and executed, and that leaders should be held accountable." The committee "will examine the political leadership and the security echelon regarding all aspects of the campaign in Lebanon," Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Ellingwood, 918K), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Pope Expresses Regret That His Comments Sparked Violence In Muslim World. ABC World News (9/17, lead story, 2:40, Harris) reported Pope Benedict "is facing the worst crisis since he was elected last year. Today, he said he's sorry that remarks he made recently about Islam touched off protests and violence, from Pakistan to Palestine and beyond. But the Pope did not issue a retraction. And many Muslims are saying they want a full apology. Tonight, there are real concerns about continuing violence." ABC (Wright) added, "When the Pope took on the Prophet, he clearly did not foresee this -- angry mobs of true believers across the Muslim world. Not exactly the sort of interfaith dialogue he had hoped to spark. Today, amid heavy rains and heavy security, at his summer retreat, Benedict tried to calm to storm. 'I am deeply sorry,' he said, 'for the reactions in some countries to a few passages of my speech.' He explained that the offending remarks, made last week at Regansburg University in Germany, were quotations from a medieval text, not his own views. He was quoting a 14th century Christian emperor sharply critical of the prophet Mohammad; the Pope had tacitly criticized spreading religion through the point of a sword. Benedict then said 'Jihad, or holy war' is 'incompatible with the nature of God.' Some Muslim leaders called that the start of a new crusade."

NBC Nightly News (9/17, lead story, Colt, 9.87M) reported, "In Iran today about one thousand theology students protested. Students in Egypt marched as well. In Palestinian areas 2 churches were vandalized this morning. They are not clear that a shooting of a nun today was directly related to the Pope statements."

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 2, , Seigenthaler, 9.87M) interviewed Izam Demebi, the director of London's Institute of Islamic Political Thought. Izam Demebi: "His lecture had come at a time of high tension. There is a war on terrorism that the military sees as a war on Islam. Where George Bush recently associated fascism with Islam. Where all sorts of things are happening sending all sorts of images and messages."

Rise Of Islamists Said To Be Destabilizing Mideast Governments. The New York Times (9/18, Slackman, 1.21M) reports, "From Cairo, to Rabat, Morocco, to Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, the order that emerged after World War II -- long accustomed to encouraging domestic anger against Israel -- has seen its influence and grip on power challenged in the wave of instability washing across the Middle East. That has roughly coincided with the rise of the insurgency in Iraq." This region "has long been defined by conflict, and leaders are unafraid to use force to crush opposition." But "the current level of instability has unnerved them. They are not about to be toppled, not as long as they retain firm control over their security operations. But they find themselves fighting to maintain stability and credibility, political analysts said." The Post also reports, "The empowerment of the Islamists has been propelled by events large and small -- the occupation of Iraq, Israel's war with Hezbollah, the United States' support for Israel in that war, Danish cartoons lampooning the Prophet Muhammad, and most recently comments about Islam made by Pope Benedict XVI."

DOJ_NMG_0063658

Writer Says Islamic World Is Not Monolithic. Writer Melik Kaylan writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) that in the wake of Pope Benedict XVI's recent comments citing a Byzantine-era critique of Islam, the "usual hubbub of outrage ensued. Various self-appointed and official Islamic spokesmen…responded sharply in the name of their faith." One might "intone gravely that the West continues to mishandle its relations with the umma -- the sphere of active Muslim believers -- with the implied assumption that there is such a unified entity of tens of millions, and that they all feel outrage in the same way at the same time." Kaylan adds, "As many Muslim apologists contend, though often for disingenuous purposes, the Islamic world is indeed not monolithic. It remains highly fissiparous and regional, inmixed with a myriad of localized customs, superstitions and hagiologies. … The spread of fundamentalist Islam was itself fostered by the West via the Arabian peninsula for political reasons. It has become the ultimate, invasively colonial force and aims to subjugate the entire umma to its tenets."

Abbas, Hamas Suspend Unity Government Talks. The Washington Times/AP (9/18, El Deeb) reports, "Coalition talks between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the militant group Hamas have stalled over U.S. demands that a national unity government recognize Israel, Palestinian officials said Sunday." The shutdown of coalition talks "underscores the difficulty Abbas is having in trying to get Hamas to soften its anti-Israel ideology, a move that would pave the way to ending international sanctions that are crippling the Palestinian economy." When Abbas meets President Bush on the margins of the UNGA, he will "try to win U.S. support for a coalition that doesn't fully meet international demands for a changed stance on Israel." Abbas aides "said he would warn that failure to work out a unity government could lead to a Palestinian civil war." Despite Abbas' efforts, the AP says, "some Palestinians officials wondered whether Abbas and Hamas can bridge their differences."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush Team's "Inaction." The New York Times (9/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "After six months of crippling sanctions, Hamas's leaders are trying to figure out the very minimum they need to say -- and the even less they plan to do -- to end their isolation and salvage their government. Skepticism is more than warranted." But "Hamas's admission of weakness could provide at least a chance to quell the violence and resuscitate peace talks. The Bush administration should not squander the opportunity. … Skepticism is a basic requirement for dealing in the Middle East. But that cannot be an excuse for nearly six years of White House inaction. It's time that Mr. Bush and his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, try the hard work of diplomacy."

More Commentary. Jackson Diehl writes in the Washington Post (9/18, A17, 748K), "The Palestinian leadership knows that the still-evolving unity pact isn't likely to impress either Olmert or Bush, since it almost certainly won't commit Hamas or the new government to formal recognition of Israel or an unqualified renunciation of violence." But "if it goes forward it will be a fresh initiative," and "Western governments and Israel would be reduced to arguing with each other, rather than pressing for a Palestinian government that could make peace." Diehl adds, "The US-Israeli strategy to counter this maneuver amounts to a series of small tactical steps. Once an Israeli soldier still held captive in Gaza is released, Olmert will meet with Abbas and release hundreds or thousands of Palestinian prisoners. An Israeli chokehold over movement in and out of Gaza will be eased. If all goes well, Olmert might even discuss transferring security responsibility in several West Bank towns from the Israeli army to Palestinian security forces controlled by Abbas."

Administration, Business Groups Said To Stymie Darfur Divestment Bill. The Financial Times (9/18, Dinmore) reports, "Moves in Congress to put financial pressure on Sudan to stop the killings in Darfur have been stymied by a combination of big business interests and the Bush administration." The Times adds, "While giving rhetorical backing to anti-genocide protests staged around the world on Sunday, Democrats and Republicans admitted that a new watered down draft of the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act was further evidence of US unwillingness as well as inability to take decisive action." Of the bill, the Times says, "It is not clear whether [SFRC Chairman Richard] Lugar's draft will get through the committee, though there is a sense that so much time has been wasted that something is better than nothing. The sudden arrival of the draft caught many by surprise and it is still being studied." The State Department "declined to make an official comment on the issue."

DOJ_NMG_0063659

As AU Ponders Withdrawal, Both Sides Press To Renew Fighting. The Washington Post (9/18, A12, Timberg, 748K) reports, "As the African Union prepares to abandon its troubled peace mission to Darfur, the region is descending ever more steeply into war." The "intensity of the combat" throughout Darfur "has forced a new flood of civilians to flee their burned and bombed-out villages for sprawling camps on the outskirts of [many] cities." The Post adds, "With its current mandate and resources, African Union officers express despair about their ability to keep peace when both the government and rebel forces are determined to return to war." When interviewed, AU officers "muttered angrily about their failure to enforce calm while expressing greater fears. They used the words 'genocide' and 'Rwanda' to describe what they expect will follow their departure." Many experts say the AU, "while ineffective at peacekeeping, is serving as vital eyes and ears for the outside world at a time when the Sudanese government is making it more difficult for aid groups and journalists to operate here. With the African Union gone, they say, the last buffer will be lost against a bloodier assault in Darfur."

Far-Right Party Wins Representation In East German State. The New York Times (9/18, Landler, 1.21M) reports, "A far-right party made further inroads in Germany's economically fragile east on Sunday, winning seats in a state election in Mecklenburg-West Pomerania, a lonely land of farms and fishing villages that is the home constituency of Chancellor Angela Merkel." The National Democratic Party, "which openly espouses xenophobic and neo-Nazi views, was projected to win slightly more than 7 percent of the vote, according to preliminary results. That was less than analysts here had feared, but enough to clear the threshold of 5 percent for seats in the state legislature." The Times adds, "Extreme-right parties will now be represented in three of Germany's six eastern states -- a trend that worries officials and underlines the divide between the country's eastern and western halves. Far-right parties have negligible support in more-prosperous western Germany." The result "is a rebuke for Mrs. Merkel and her conservative party, the Christian Democratic Union, which lost votes in Mecklenburg and fared even worse in the second of the two state legislative elections on Sunday, in Berlin."

Conservatives Win Swedish Elections. The New York Times (9/18, Lyall, Ekman, 1.21M) reports, "Sweden swept away 12 years of center-left government on Sunday, voting to reject its longtime prime minister, Goran Persson, in favor of a conservative candidate who has pledged to revise the Swedish welfare state." Fredrik Reinfeldt's Alliance for Sweden finished almost two percentage points ahead of the "left-of-center" coalition, whose key component, the Social Democrats, "received just 35.2 percent, their worst showing since universal suffrage began in Sweden in 1921. Mr. Persson, 57, who has been prime minister since 1996, said he would step down as party leader in March." The Times calls the Social Democrats "one of the world's most consistently successful political parties," and notes their defeat "reflects a feeling not only that Mr. Persson has become complacent in office, but also that Sweden's celebrated social welfare model, with its high tax rate and generous benefits, has encouraged too many people to stay out of work for too long." Reinfeldt "successfully made unemployment a major issue in the campaign. By most measures, Sweden is thriving economically," however Reinfeldt believes "it has encouraged a vast swath of people to fall out of the labor market, a particularly acute problem with an aging population."

The Financial Times (9/18, Ibison) calls Reinfeldt's election "a stunning rebuke for prime minister Göran Persson and his party that has led Sweden for 65 of the last 74 years, overseeing the creation of its world-famous welfare state." Sweden "is set for an historic change of direction as it moves away from being a welfare state towards encouraging more market-based activity." The AP (9/18, Kratovac) says Reinfeldt "once wrote a book criticizing the country's vaunted cradle-to-grave welfare state. Now he will have the chance to tweak the model." In addition, he "is decidedly more pro-American than" Persson.

DOJ_NMG_0063660

López Obrador Proclaims Himself President-Elect, Will Lead "Parallel" Government. The Financial Times (9/18, Thomson) reports, "Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential election last July, proclaimed himself president-elect at the weekend and vowed to set about transforming the country's institutions to establish 'a new republic.'" Speaking "before tens of thousands of cheering supporters, he said he would not recognise the government of Felipe Calderón, the official winner, and promised to continue his 'civil resistance' movement."

The Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) reports "hundreds of thousands of supporters of…López Obrador elected him the leader Saturday of a 'parallel government' opposed." The "symbolic 'vote' -- a show of hands in the packed Zocalo plaza -- was the latest development in Mexico's nearly three-month electoral dispute."

The AP (9/18, Adams) reports Lopez Obrador said "the parallel government will work on proposals to rewrite Mexico's constitution to guarantee the right to food, work, health care, education and housing while overhauling 'corrupt' public institutions."

IAEA Concerned About Terrorists' Access To Serbian Nuclear Site. The UN's nuclear watchdog says that more than two tons of radioactive material stored in a research facility in Serbia are an easy target for terrorists seeking to build a "dirty bomb." The Washington Times (9/18, 88K) reprints a London Daily Telegraph (Pancevski) story which reported that nuclear inspectors have dubbed the rundown, lightly guarded storage facility at the Institute of Nuclear Sciences in Vinca "the world's most dangerous disused nuclear site" because of "the potency of the material and the risk of leakage." Michael Durst, the special program manager at the IAEA "said the Vinca site topped the global priority list of unsecured uranium sources because it combined the threats of nuclear proliferation and environmental disaster." The IAEA fears that the nuclear material "could be packaged with conventional explosives to spread radioactive material over a large area -- a so-called dirty bomb."

US Officials Said To Have Bungled Chinese Spy Ring Case. The Washington Times (9/18, Gertz, 88K) reports on a yearlong investigation into "one of the most damaging losses of defense technology in American history." US intelligence knew that Chinese Center for Asia Pacific Studies at Zhongshan University, known to US intelligence officials as CAPS, "received funding from the People's Liberation Army and conducted operational research for the Chinese military. … The fact that the spy ring went undetected for two decades was a major counterintelligence failure. Worse, the US government would go on to bungle the case." Investigators believe Chi Mak "gave China schematics and design information on the latest generation of Aegis weapons systems, which L-3 helped to develop. Aegis -- meaning shield -- is being upgraded to become America's most advanced and mobile anti-missile system for use on guided-missile cruisers, guided-missile destroyers, Sea Wolf-class submarines and aircraft carriers."

US, Europe Seek To Push Up Exchange Values Of Asian Currencies. Amid concerns that their nations companies are being undercut by their Asian competitors, the US and its European allies are pressing to push up the exchange values of Asian currencies. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, Phillips, 2.03M) reports, "In statements at top-level financial meetings during the weekend, European officials suggested they expect the yen to rise, in an apparent effort to jawbone financial markets to drive the Japanese currency up against the euro. At the same time, finance officials from the Group of Seven major industrial powers, including the US, renewed their long campaign to persuade China to allow the yuan to appreciate against the dollar and euro." At the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund's steering committee yesterday, Treasury Secretary hank Paulson "called for 'greater exchange-rate flexibility in Asian emerging economies.' He also called on finance ministers to clamp down on Iran's finances. He said Tehran uses front companies to finance its nuclear ambitions and to fund terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas."

China Competes With West To Aid Asian Neighbors. China has been making loans to countries that were once the "sole preserve of the World Bank, the Asian Development, the United States and Japan," the New York Times (9/18, Perlez, 1.21M) reports. According to the Times, "For poor countries like Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar, and somewhat better-off countries like the Philippines, China's loans are often more attractive than the complicated loans from the West. The Chinese money usually comes unencumbered with conditions for environmental standards or community resettlement that can hold up major projects. The aid does not carry penalties for corruption that are being increasingly used by the World Bank president, Paul D. Wolfowitz. … For its part, China benefits from the added infrastructure -- roads, ports and bridges -- in the underdeveloped but growing region around it, to help increase trade and to move natural resources from China's periphery to its heartland."

DOJ_NMG_0063661

Afghan Finance Minister Expected To Enter Race To Replace Annan. Former Afghan Finance Minister Ashraf Ghani is expected to join the race to succeed Kofi Annan as UN Secretary General. The Financial Times (9/18, Johnson) reports that Ghani "will declare his candidacy this afternoon in a meeting with Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, who is visiting the US." Observers say Ghani "had a strong track record as an administrator but suffered from his reputation for impatience." The Times adds, "In a second round of straw polls in the Security Council last week, Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, consolidated his lead. It also emerged that Vaira Vike-Freiberga, the Latvian president, would run."

Foreign Service Officers Say DSS Abuses Security Clearance Process. Dozens of Foreign Service officers say their careers have been ruined because the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service suspended their security clearances based on suspicious or unsubstantiated accusations. The Washington Times (9/18, Kralev, 88K) reports several officers accused the DSS of "abusing the security clearance process" by punishing "whistleblowing, dissenting viewpoints or minor acts of possible misfeasance unrelated to national security." DSS "declined to comment for this article, saying only that it does everything according to the law and administrative regulations. A spokeswoman said there are up to 30 suspensions every year from among the up to 40,000 State Department employees and contractors who hold security clearances at any given time."

IMF Expected To Approve Overhaul Today. The IMF today is expected to approve an overhaul that would give four fast-growing countries more of a say in the IMF's operations. USA Today (9/18, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that while the US is backing the overhaul, key economic powers including Brazil and India oppose it and "intense skirmishing" is expected "about the new formula the IMF eventually will adopt to complete its internal realignment. Poor countries, in particular, fear their already weak representation could ebb further. … Nations enjoying a greater say than their economic punch warrants, such as Belgium and the Netherlands, worry that any new approach will cost them. (The U.S., which has 17% of the IMF votes but accounts for 30% of the global economy, says it won't seek a larger say.)" USA adds, "First to benefit: China, Turkey, South Korea and Mexico, the countries suffering the biggest gap between their share of IMF votes and the size of their economies. The measure, expected to be approved today, will trigger only modest changes immediately. China, for example, will see its share of IMF votes rise to 3.7% from 2.98%."

Colombian "Peace Communities" Disavow Any Contact With Armed Groups. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Kraul, 918K) reports on the Colombian "peace community" of San Jose de Apartado, where "a group of 1,200 peasant pacifists is taking a brave stand against the country's civil conflict. The community of three villages…was formed in 1997 after a Catholic archbishop named Isaias Duarte -- who would be assassinated five years later -- encouraged the farmers to say no to war. It is one of 10 such peace communities, or 'humanitarian zones,' in Colombia, according to Justice and Peace, a human rights advocacy organization in Bogota, the capital." Members of the community "disavow any contact or collaboration with armed groups, and agree to work as a collective on crops, livestock and community projects and to share what they produce. … But the community's profession of neutrality has not shielded it from horrendous violence. Of San Jose's nearly 1,400 original members, 178 have been killed since 1997 by armed groups looking to clear the zone of suspected collaborators, appropriate valuable land for themselves or claim transit routes for arms and drugs traffic in and out of nearby Pacific and Caribbean ports."

US' Human Rights Efforts In Equatorial Guinea Called "Low Key." U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Cue, 2.03M) that in April Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised President Teodoro Obiang Nguema of Equatorial Guinea as a "good friend" of the United States. Obiang "may head a corrupt and repressive regime, according to the State Department's own human-rights reports, but Equatorial Guinea is a growing oil producer -- now No. 3 in sub-Saharan Africa after Nigeria and Angola -- and an oil-needy America can't afford to be too picky about choosing its petro pals." The Bush Administration "says it is pressing Obiang and his government for progress on issues such as political reform, anticorruption measures, and human-rights protections. … The Bush administration has kept its human-rights efforts low key, and has somewhat successfully exercised its influence on Obiang to release political prisoners and improve jail conditions."

DOJ_NMG_0063662

NATO Official Praises Unified Missile Defense. In the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M), NATO assistant secretary general Marshall Billingslea writes, "Today NATO crosses a major milestone in its theater missile defense efforts. The Alliance is announcing, in London, the selection of a trans-Atlantic consortium of companies with whom we will begin working on the first of our major missile defense contracts." Given the "growing threats" from sources like North Korea and Iran, Billingslea recommends, "We can choose to address the whole range of threats together, and develop a common defense for the entire Alliance."

WSJournal Says WHO Has "Come To Its Senses" On DDT. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) says that WHO has announced that it will begin promoting the use of DDT to combat malaria in developing nations. It has "long been known that DDT is the cheapest and most effective way to contain the disease, which is spread by infected mosquitoes. But United Nations health agencies and others have for decades resisted employing DDT under pressure from anti-pesticide environmentalists. After tens of millions of preventable malarial deaths in these poor countries, it's nice to see WHO finally come to its senses." The Journal adds, "One insecticide won't end malaria, and DDT's proponents don't claim it will. But by keeping more people alive and healthy, DDT can help create the conditions for the only lasting solution, which is economic growth and development. It's encouraging that even a UN health agency seems to have figured that out."

WPost Praises Rockefeller, Gates Foundation Efforts In Africa. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/18, A16, 748K) praises the Rockefeller Foundation and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation for their pledge of $150 million over five years to combat hunger in Africa. The Post notes that despite many problems, "the two charities are right to be trying. … The Rockefeller Foundation already has a presence in East Africa, and its grants have resulted in some progress: 20 new seed varieties and a fix for the broken licensing program that had prevented the dissemination of seeds in Kenya. The partnership with the Gates Foundation will add money and ambition to these efforts."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Immigration Reform Efforts Reinvigorate Support For Guest Worker Program."
"Did Victim's Photo Prejudice A Jury?"
"Village's Unarmed Rebellion."
"Death Squads Target The Iraqi Next Door."
"Pope Issues A Rare 'Sorry.'"
"Pasadena Church May Fight IRS Summons."

USA Today:

"Spinach Probe, Recalls Expand."
"Safety Tips."
"States Hit By E. Coli Cases."
"On The Road."
"School Buses In 11 States Tune In To Radio Programming Aimed At Kids."
"Hundreds Of Unapproved Drugs Sold By Prescription."

New York Times:

"Bid to Stockpile Bioterror Drugs Stymied By Setbacks."
"Hewlett Review Is Said to Detail Deeper Spying."
"In a Rare Step, Pope Expresses Personal Regret."
"As Senator Falters, A Democrat Rises In Virginia."
"China Competes With West In Aid To Its Neighbors?"
"Unearthing A Town Pool, And Not For Whites Only."

Washington Post:

"Allen, Webb Quarrel Over War In Iraq, Bush Policies."
"Pope 'Sorry' About Reaction To Islam Remark."
"Firms Vie For Rights To Border Security."
"Corruption Isn't Rattling Elections."
"Violence Changes Storied Baghdad Street."

DOJ_NMG_0063663

Washington Times:
"Fumbled China Spy Probe An Intelligence Failure."
"Pope 'Deeply Sorry' About Muslim Reply."
"Security Probes Hold Up Diplomats."
"Rumsfeld Advisor Resigns As Pentagon Shake-Up Looms."
"President Relenting On Value Of U.N."
"U.S. Airlines Sing The Blues Over Virginia Startup."

Detroit Free Press:
"Football Mom, Dads Prepare For Voting Game."
"Inside Ford."
"Murder Trial To Start With Finger Pointing."
"Welcome To Ann Arbor, Google."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"CIA Awaits Terror Policy."
"Electives Round Out Education."
"Lost Ship Holds Key To Colony Mystery."

Houston Chronicle:
"U.S. Wartime Prison System Holds 14,000 In Legal Limbo."
"Language Barriers."
"The ESlate May Not Be So Clean."
"Tiny Houston oil Company At The Center Of Global Drama."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Pope Benedict Apologizes; Pope Benedict Apologizes Analysis; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; E. Coli Outbreak; Detainee Debate; Campaign 2006; Kidnap Victim Found; Evangelical Youth Movement; Football Story.
CBS: Preempted By Football.
NBC: Pope Benedict Apologizes; Pope Benedict Apologizes Analysis; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Detainee Debate; Duquesne University Basketball Shooting; Kidnapped Baby; E. Coli Outbreak; Space Shuttle; Amazing Medical Recovery; New Orleans Football Dreams.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: SC-Kidnapped Girl Freed; PA-Duquesne Basketball Players Shot; CA-Wildfire; Female Space Tourist; Space Shuttle.
CBS: Detainee Debate; E-Coli Outbreak Investigation; CA-Wildfire; Pope-Islam Comments.
NPR: Pope-Islam Comments; Iraq-Kirkuk Bombings; Afghanistan-Taliban Driven Out Of Safe Havens In South; Tropical Storm Helene; Sweden-Parliamentary Elections; Ahmedinejad-Chavez Meeting; Sudan Protests.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Makes remarks at the White House Conference on Global Literacy, New York Public Library; meets with the Prime Minister of Malaysia, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York; meets with the President of El Salvador, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York; meets with the President of Honduras, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York; meets with the President of Tanzania, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York; attends a Republican National Committee reception, private residence, New York. Closed press.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Delivers remarks, Maine Victory 2006 luncheon, private residence, Cape Elizabeth, Maine (closed press); remarks, Congressman Don Sherwood reception, private residence, Dallas, Penn. (closed press).

LYNNE CHENEY — Hosts Constitution Day 2006, Bigelow Hall, University of Louisville, Louisville, Ky.

LAURA BUSH — Hosts the White House Conference on Global Literacy, New York Public Library; rings closing bell, New York Stock Exchange, with Women entrepreneurs, NYSE.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets at 2 p.m. for a period of morning business, then begin considering the Oman free trade agreement at a time TBA.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: INVESTORS CONFERENCE _ Council of Institutional Investors' annual fall conference. Speakers include former SEC Chair Harvey Pitt. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Former SEC Chair Harvey Pitt, now CEO of Kalorama Partners. 9:30 a.m. Carter Burgess, managing director of the Directorship Search Group. 11:15 a.m. Beverly Aisenbrey, managing director of Frederic W. Cook and Co. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

FEDERAL CREDIT UNIONS _ 2006 National Association of Federal Credit Unions Congressional Caucus. Highlights: 9 a.m. Morning-long general session, with Larry Sabato, University of Virginia's Center for Politics, and NCUA's JoAnn Johnson and Gigi Hyland. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW.

CLIMATE SUMMIT _ Washington Summit on Climate Stabilization. Participants include Iceland President Olafur Ragnar Grimsson; Robert Corell, Arctic Climate Impact

DOJ_NMG_0063664

Assessment and American Meteorological Society. Highlights: 1 p.m. - 5 p.m. Workshop on ``Communicating Climate Science Evidence to the Public." Participantss: Susan Joy Hassol, writer of HBO film, ``Too Hot Not to Handle." Karen Coshof, with Stonehaven Productions film ``The Great Warming," others. At Climate Institute, 1785 Massachusetts Ave., Suite 100. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT _ 10 a.m. - 3 p.m. American University forum on ``The Current State of Congressional Oversight," with Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.; GAO Comptroller General David Walker; others. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

MEANING OF CITIZENSHIP _ 10 a.m. - 3 p.m. National Conference on Citizenship's annual conference, aimed at strengthening citizenship in three areas: American history and civics education; community and public service; civic and political participation. Highlights: 10:05 a.m. Plenary address: Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. 10:35 a.m. John Bridgeland, Advisory Board Chair, National Conference on Citizenship, speaks on ``The State of Our Civic Union." 12:20 p.m. Keynote, Robert Portman, director, Office of Management and Budget, on ``Fostering Citizenship: Our Federal Efforts." 12:50 p.m. Forum with Joseph Torsella, National Constitution Center; Thomas Davidson, principal, Constitution High School; students from Constitution High School; Harris Wofford, Case Foundation. 1:20 p.m. Afternoon Plenary Address: Senator Robert Byrd, who will administer the Citizens Oath to students at NCC. 2 p.m. Service to America, with USA Freedom Corps; Corporation for National and Community Service; Peace Corps; Citizen Corps; United Way of America; Hands On Network; Partnership for Public Service; Chavez Schools. 2:55 p.m. Presentation of Citizen of the Year Award to Irasema Salcido, founder and CEO, Chavez Schools. With remarks by Craig Turk, chairman, National Conference on Citizenship. Location: Marriott-Metro Center, 775 12th St. NW.

ENERGY SECURITY-REPORT _ 9 a.m. Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-NM, John Podesta, CEO, Center for American Progress, and Christopher Flavin, chairman, Worldwatch Institute, release report on ``American Energy: The Renewable Path to Energy Security." Location: S-211, US Capitol.

AL-QAEDA _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. New America Foundation discussion on ``Al Qaeda Past, Present and Future," with Lawrence Wright, The New Yorker; Peter Bergen, New America Foundation. Location: 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CHURCHES-POLITICS _ 10 a.m. Americans United for Separation of Church and State holds a news conference to announce a national campaign to oppose illegal partisan politicking by churches. Speaker - Rev. Barry Lynn. Location: National Press Club.

FEDERAL PAY-SURVEY _ 10 a.m. Briefing to release survey of Senior Executive Service members on impact of government's pay-for-performance management system. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

TEACHER EDUCATION _ 10 a.m. The Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation, others, release a report showing teacher education is out of step with classroom realities. It also finds a majority of U.S. teachers prepared in lower quality programs. Location: National Press Club.

WOMEN IN ACADEMIA-REPORT _ 10 a.m. National Academies of Science release report on women in academic science and engineering, ``Beyond Bias and Barriers." With Donna Shalala, president, University of Miami, and former HHS secretary; others. Location: Kaiser Family Foundation, 1330 G St., N.W.

FUEL-EFFICIENT CARS _ 10:30 a.m. Sens. Bob Bennett and Ron Wyden unveil bipartisan plan to provide tax credits to consumers who buy more fuel efficient cars, trucks and SUVs. Location: Senate Swamp site.

IRAQ FOR SALE _ 11 a.m. Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-ND) holds news briefing with filmmaker Robert Greenwald and former KBR/Halliburton Iraq truck drivers. They'll discuss war profiteering in Iraq, and Greenwald's new movie ``Iraq for Sale." Location: Room 124, Dirksen.

HUFFINGTON SPEECH _ 11:30 a.m. Columnist Arianna Huffington speaks at Women of Washington's ``Hope is a Woman" luncheon. Her topic: ``On Becoming Fearless." Location: Four Seasons Hotel, 2800 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

CONSTITUTION DAY-JUDGES _ 12 p.m. American University's College of Law marks National Constitution Day with law professors examining ``Judicial Independence." Location: Room 603, Washington College of Law, AU.

MUSLIMS-CIVIL RIGHTS REPORT _ 12 p.m. Council on American-Islamic Relations releases 11th annual report, titled ``The Struggle for Equality," on the status of Muslim civil rights in the United States. Location: CAIR, 453 New Jersey Ave. SE.

DOJ_NMG_0063665

IRAQ-CONTRACTORS _ 2 p.m. The Senate Democratic Policy Committee holds a hearing on efforts to seek accountability for contracting abuses in Iraq. Julie McBride a former Halliburton employee at Camp Fallujah in Iraq; Edward Sanchez and Sean Larvenz, former Halliburton truck drivers in Iraq; Scott Allen, an attorney who represents survivors of the April 2004 convoy attack; Alan Grayson, an attorney who represents Ms. McBride in a False Claims Act. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

GULF COAST RECOVERY-FEMA _ 3 p.m. Department of Homeland Securitys Federal Emergency Management Agency holds tele-conference to discuss the Alternative Housing Pilot Project for the Gulf Coast states. Participants include Gil Jamieson, Deputy Director for Gulf Coast Recovery. Contacts: FEMA, 504-762-2477. Notes: Call 800-320-4330, pin number 051397, press ``.

KASHMIR FORUM _ 3 p.m. Indo-American Kashmir Forum on ``The Rise of Counter-Insurgency in Kashmir and the Myth of the Separatist Kashmiri Muslim," with Captain SK Tikoo, Hindu leader of a Muslim political party comprised of former Kashmiri militants. Location: CSIS, 1800 K St. NW.

RUSSIA-TRADE _ 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. Embassy of the Russian Federation holds launch for updated edition of ``The Russia: All Regions; Trade and Investment Guide." Location: Embassy, 2650 Wisconsin Ave. NW.

AMERICA'S ENERGY ``ADDICTION" _ 6 p.m. - 8:30 p.m. DOD's offices of acquisition and technology, as well as Force Transformation, hold forum on ``Energy: A Conversation about our National Addiction." Topics include used fuel policy and the 103 commercial reactors in the US. Location: Doubletree Hotel, 300 Army Navy Dr., Crystal City, Va.

MACPHERSON-I.F. STONE _ 6:30 p.m. Myra MacPherson discusses her new book ``All Governments Lie!: The Life and Times of Rebel Journalist I.F. Stone." Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

DEBATING THE CONSTITUTION _ 7 p.m. National Archives presents debate between Judge Richard Posner and Geoffrey R. Stone titled ``The Constitution in a Time of National Emergency." Issues include balancing personal liberty against public safety. Location: Burke Theater, United States Navy Memorial.

ALBRIGHT-RELIGION _ 7:30 p.m. Former Sec. of State Madeleine Albright gives Snowdon lecture on ``Reflections on America, God and World Affairs." Location: Gaston Hall, Georgetown Univ.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
White House, Senate Holdouts Say Compromise Possible On Detainee Bill ... 3
US Said To Hold 14,000 Detainees In Overseas Prisons ... 6
Chambliss' Comparison Of Civil War, War On Terror Draws Fire. 6

Homeland Response:
BioShield Setbacks Threaten Deal To Produce Anthrax Vaccine. 6
Fish Used To Monitor Water Supplies ... 7
"Path To 9/11" Writer Says He Has Received Death Threats ... 7
Freedom Tower Project Makes "Progress." ... 7

War News:
US Working To Establish Secure Perimeter Around Baghdad ... 7
Sunni Politician Assassinated; Dozens Of Bodies Recovered ... 8
Anbar Tribes Reportedly Have Formed Coalition To Fight Al Qaeda ... 8
Casey Says Iraq Needs 12 To 18 Months Before It Can Take Over Its Own Security ... 9
Deadly Bombings Kill Twenty-Four In Kirkuk ... 9
Suicide Bombers Kill Three Iraqi Police Outside US Base In Fallujah ... 9
Iraqi Police Uncover Large Munitions Cache Near Basra ... 9
US Has Held Iraqi AP Photographer Since April Without Charging Him ... 10
Kimmitt Optimistic About Iraq's Economic Recovery Plan ... 10
Minister Analyzes US Christians' Response To War In Iraq ... 10
NATO Hails Afghan Offensive, But Violence Continues ... 10

DOJ:
DOJ's "Institutional Memory" Profiled ... 10

Corporate Scandals:
Sentencing Of Several Enron Officials Slated For This Month ... 11
Hewlett-Packard Faces Deadline To Turn Over Documents Related To Snooping Scandal ... 11

Criminal Law:
Ney Pleads Guilty To Charges Linked To Abramoff Scandal ... 12
Former New Jersey State Senator Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes ... 12
Aryan Brotherhood Leaders Avoid Death Penalty ... 13
Miami Seniors Press For Federal Action On Rising Medicare Fraud ... 13
FBI Documents Detail Disgraced Philly Consultant's Fund-Raising Prowess ... 13
Gotti Lawyer Makes Closing Arguments ... 13
High Court To Consider Murder Conviction Overturned By 9th Circuit ... 14
Review Reveals Flaws In National Security Contracting Procedures ... 14
Armitage Revelation Has Reconfigured Plame Leak Case ... 15
Few Police Departments Require Four-Year Degrees ... 15
Kidnapping Victim Found After Sending Text Message ... 15
Police Seek Gunman After University Shooting ... 15
National Guard Joins Search For Kidnapped Baby ... 15

Civil Rights:
Key Witness Says FBI Ignored Exculpatory Comments In Boston Police Brutality Case ... 16

Antitrust:
MAN AG Embarks On Bid For Scania AB ... 16
AOL Agrees To Sell German Internet-Access Unit ... 16

Environment:
Investigators Search For Source Of E. Coli Outbreak ... 16
Associates Offer "Complex" Portrait Of Alleged Long Island Polluter ... 17
Boehlert Calls For Increase In CAFE Standards ... 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Mexico Extradites Drug Cartel Suspect To US ... 17
Suspected Drug-Smuggling Tunnel Found Along US-Mexico Border ... 18
San Diego County Challenges California's Medical Marijuana Law ... 18
In Michigan, Federal Law Credited For Drop In Gun Crimes ... 18

Immigration:
DHS Set To Designate Contractors For Secure Border Initiative 18

Tax:
IRS Cracking Down On Partisan Activity By Religious Groups ... 19
Refund-Anticipation Loan Practices Facing Legal, Regulatory Challenges ... 19

Congress-Administration:

New High Court Term To Feature Controversial Cases..... 20
Hardiman Tapped For 3rd Circuit Vacancy 20
Paulson Said To Be Returning Treasury To "Top Tier" Status.... 20
Earmark Reform Languishing In Senate..... 20
Boehner Clarifies Comments On Democrats' Commitment To War On Terror..... 21
USPS Granted Official Two Month Vacation Despite Allegations Of Improprieties 21
Transportation Department Official Charged With Using Stolen Funds For Escort Services 21
Report Lists Six Key Trends For Overhauling Government Operations 22
First Lady To Headline Opening Of Clinton Global Initiative 22
Colleagues Praise Hyde's Accomplishment As International Relations Chair 22
Senate Urged To Approve General Officer Promotions 22
NYTimes Urges Census Bureau To Change The Way It Counts Inmates 22

Other News:

Dow Nears Record High Set In 2000..... 22
Democrats Plan To Attack GOP On Economic Issues..... 23
Polls Show GOP Closing Gap, Bush's Approval Rating Higher.. 23
Republicans Hope 2000 Redistricting "Firewall" Will Protect Some Endangered Seats 24
At Iowa Event, Obama Says Democrats Need Tougher Line On National Security..... 25
Allen And Webb Clash Over War In Iraq 25
Burns Facing The "Toughest Test Of His Career."..... 26
Republicans Still Hopeful That McGavick Can Unseat Cantwell. 27
Senate Candidates Not Required To Submit Electronic Campaign Finance Reports..... 27
Opponent Tries To Capitalize On Reichert Fundraiser With Rove27
Graf Win Raises Questions About GOP's Immigration Strategy. 27
Mehlman's RNC Said To Be Outperforming DNC..... 27
Wesley Clark To Take Position At UCLA..... 28
WPost Urges Universities To Eliminate Early Admissions 28
US Showdown With Iran Seen As Increasingly Likely..... 28
Hezbollah Leader Plans Celebration Of "Victory" Over Israel 30
Pope Expresses Regret That His Comments Sparked Violence In Muslim World 30
Rise Of Islamists Said To Be Destabilizing Mideast Governments 31
Abbas, Hamas Suspend Unity Government Talks 31
Administration, Business Groups Said To Stymie Darfur Divestment Bill 31
Far-Right Party Wins Representation In East German State 32
Conservatives Win Swedish Elections..... 32
López Obrador Proclaims Himself President-Elect, Will Lead "Parallel" Government..... 32
IAEA Concerned About Terrorists' Access To Serbian Nuclear Site 33
US Officials Said To Have Bungled Chinese Spy Ring Case 33
US, Europe Seek To Push Up Exchange Values Of Asian Currencies..... 33
China Competes With West To Aid Asian Neighbors..... 33
Afghan Finance Minister Expected To Enter Race To Replace Annan..... 33
Foreign Service Officers Say DSS Abuses Security Clearance Process 33
IMF Expected To Approve Overhaul Today 34
Colombian "Peace Communities" Disavow Any Contact With Armed Groups 34
US' Human Rights Efforts In Equatorial Guinea Called "Low Key."..... 34
NATO Official Praises Unified Missile Defense 34
WSJournal Says WHO Has "Come To Its Senses" On DDT 34
WPost Praises Rockefeller, Gates Foundation Efforts In Africa.. 35

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 35

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 35

DOJ_NMG_0063668

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House, Senate Holdouts Say Compromise Possible On Detainee Bill. CBS News Radio (9/18) reports this morning, "There is a change in the battle between the Bush White House and three respected Republicans over the war on terror. The senators who want no retreat from the Geneva Conventions are signaling a willingness to compromise. Among them John McCain on ABC's This Week." McCain: "Absolutely the talks are continuing. I have supported this President in the war on terror. I have supported him in the war in Iraq. I think he is a friend, I hope he considers me a friend. I believe we can sit down, we can work this out." CBS added, "The White House insists it is not looking to redefine the Geneva Convention rules on prisoner detention and interrogations nor does it want to legalize torture." National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley: "The President is very clear, this not about torture. This is about a program that is going to be professionally run by people who have been highly trained."

ABC World News (9/17, story 5, 0:25, Harris) reported last night that "there are hopeful noises about ending a rather extraordinary showdown between President Bush and some powerful senators from his own party. … Today, both sides say they are confident they can reach some sort of compromise."

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 4, Jordan, 9.87M) reported, "On the Sunday talk shows, talk of compromise on the issue that's loudly split the Bush Administration and several key Senate Republicans." Stephen Hadley, National Security Advisor: "We need to find a way through that obstacle course. I think we can." Sen. John McCain: "I believe we will be able to work this out to the satisfaction of everybody concerned." NBC added, "Another sign Senate Republicans are trying to find a solution tomorrow staffers from Chairman of the Judiciary Committee will be meeting with Senator McCain staffers."

The New York Times (9/18, Sanger, 1.21M) runs a story titled "Compromise Called Possible On Interrogations," in which it says Hadley "is negotiating with…McCain…and other Senate leaders over the administration's proposal, which would give the C.I.A. permission to use "alternative" techniques when interrogating terrorism suspects. … Asked if he believed compromise was possible, Mr. Hadley said, 'I do.' He said it was essential that 'we continue to have this terribly important program for protecting the country, as the president requires, that gives the men and women who carry out this program clear guidance and clear Congressional support, and also achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change Common Article 3,' referring to the Geneva Conventions." The Times adds, "Other administration officials said it became clear over the weekend that the administration was going to have to give ground. 'I don't think anyone anticipated the avalanche of opinion that would be assembled on the other side of what seemed like a pretty abstruse legal issue,' one official said, speaking on condition of anonymity as he was not authorized to discuss the issue with a reporter." USA Today (9/18, Diamond, 2.27M) runs a similar story under the headline "Compromise On CIA Interrogations Possible," while the AP (9/18, Pickler) reports, "The Bush administration and holdout GOP senators expressed confidence on Sunday they could reach a compromise on rules for CIA interrogations of suspected terrorists."

The Washington Times (9/18, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Sen. Lindsey Graham "agrees with Mr. McCain on the issue and said the administration and Congress are closer than some observers think. 'I think we can get there from here,' Mr. Graham said." The Times adds, "'Fox News Sunday' moderator Chris Wallace noted that many of those opposed to the administration's plan, including Mr. Graham, Mr. McCain and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, all have military combat experience. In contrast, many of the plan's supporters, including Mr. Bush, do not."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, Chaddock, 58K) says that "for now, the GOP revolt in the Armed Services Committee is giving cover to Senate Democrats, who don't want to head into another midterm election tagged with being weak in the war on terror." Yesterday, Sen. Mitch McConnell "said it would be awkward for Democrats to 'go home and explain a vote...to shut down an intelligence program that we know has helped save lives.'"

USA Today (9/18, Kiely, Johnson, 2.27M) runs a "Question and Answer" background report on the legislation, in which it says "the House of Representatives has scheduled a vote on the president's plan for this week and is likely to approve it. The Senate is more likely to approve the competing Armed Services Committee bill. If that happens, House and Senate negotiators would have to work out the differences." The Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M), in an editorial, makes a similar point, "The good news is the Senate is not the last word on this debate. The House is likely to endorse the Administration's preferred language this week, and a bill that emerges from conference may be a compromise the CIA can live with. The government's ability to protect Americans using the vital tool of interrogation depends on it."

Newsweek (9/25, Hirsh, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports that "recently Bush administration officials, in private negotiations with the Senate, have agreed to drop waterboarding from a list of approved CIA interrogation techniques, according to a Senate source involved in the dispute. … The Bush administration wants to maintain seven other approved CIA interrogation methods, however, for use against suspected high-level terrorists, according to one congressional source and a lawyer involved in the negotiations." Newsweek also reports, "Scott Horton, a New York City Bar Association lawyer who has advised the Senate on the legislation, says Capitol Hill aides have told him that the CIA has sought to use the following techniques: (1) induced hypothermia; (2) long periods of forced standing; (3) sleep deprivation; (4) the 'attention grab' (the forceful seizing of a suspect's shirt); (5) the 'attention slap'; (6) the 'belly slap'; and (7) sound and light manipulation." Time (9/25, Calabresi, 4.03M) provides a brief description of the terrorism bills being considered by lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0063669

Graham Says A Compromise Is Still Possible. Time (9/25, Tumulty, Bacon, 4.03M) reports, "White House and congressional leaders had hoped that focusing on terrorism in the final months before a tight midterm election would give their party an advantage over the Democrats. But they didn't count on a rebellion in their own ranks, made worse by the fact that it is led by [Sen. Lindsay] Graham and two more senior members of the Armed Services Committee who also have impressive military credentials: chairman John Warner, a former Secretary of the Navy who was a Marine ground officer in the Korean War, four years before Graham was born; and John McCain, a former Navy pilot whose father and grandfather were admirals and who still suffers from what he endured during 5 1/2 years in a North Vietnamese POW camp." Time adds, "The showdown on the Senate floor, where majority leader Bill Frist is expected to introduce the President's proposal, is not likely to be pretty." Graham "insists that there are still ways to work out a compromise, although both sides appear to be digging in. 'I share the President's goal of pursuing a CIA program that would protect us and operate within the rule of law,' he told TIME. 'And I will work with him to achieve that.'"

Negroponte Says Legal Uncertainty Has Diminished Use Of Interrogations. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte was asked on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace) if the CIA is currently unable to interrogate detainees "because intelligence officers are unwilling to risk being charged with war crimes." Negroponte answered, "There's been precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now and certainly since the Supreme Court decision." Negroponte noted that a terrorism suspect "may be questioned, but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques that the president was referring to the other day may be problematic because of the uncertainty that has been introduced by the current situation. So all these patriotic, professional agents are looking for is the kind of clarity to ensure that they will not be violating the law when they carry out these interrogations." Asked if the legislation, "as passed by the Senate Armed Services Committee and drafted by Warner and McCain and Graham, is unacceptable," Negroponte replied, "the director of the CIA tells me that, if it were passed in that form, he does not believe it would be possible for the program to go forward. And I accept his judgment on that." The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Miller, 918K) runs a story on the detainee bill in which it focuses on Negroponte's TV appearance, which it says "was part of a campaign by the Bush administration to defend a CIA program in which high-ranking Al Qaeda operatives had been held in secret prisons abroad and subjected to interrogation methods that critics contend are tantamount to torture."

Hadley, Senators Outline Their Stance. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, also on ABC's This Week (9/17, Stephanopoulos), said, "What we're talking, in terms of Common Article 3, is a minimum set of standards that would apply to what's called unlawful combatants, people like Al Qaida terrorists. And let's be clear who these people are. These are people who don't wear uniforms, who hide among civilian populations and, quite frankly, use war crimes, killing innocent civilians as a tactic. So let's be clear what we're talking about here. Nonetheless, notwithstanding the fact these are people who don't detain Americans on the battlefield; they kill them, we have said that we are going to provide the kinds of standards of treatment that are in the Detainee Treatment Act, sponsored by Senator McCain, approved by the Congress in December of last year. … It's interesting that the Department of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the director of Central Intelligence, the agencies whose men and women are on the front lines on the war on terror and are at risk every day, support this legislative approach we have proposed."

On CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), Hadley added, "The most important thing here, and the question before the Congress and the American people is -- do we want a program run by the Central Intelligence Agency that questions these Al Qaida terrorists? … If so, we need to give clear guidance to the men and women who run it. And if you don't want the program, then you explain why you're willing to give up a tool which really has gotten more information about Al Qaida and made more of a contribution in preventing attacks on this country and our troops abroad than almost any other country."

Appearing on CNN's Late Edition (9/17, Blitzer), Hadley singled out a provision barring "humiliating treatment," saying, "I'm saying that nobody knows what humiliating treatment is. What does it mean? And the concern is that these people are being asked to take on very tough assignments. They want to be clear as to what is required, and they want it to be interpreted by U.S. law, not by opinions of European courts or other courts."

DOJ_NMG_0063670

McCain, asked on ABC's This Week (9/17, Stephanopoulos) to respond to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's contention that "interpreting" the Geneva Conventions "is accepted practice in international law," said, "Of course it's not -- when we ratify a treaty…that was the time to, quote, 'interpret,' or make reservations. … The Vietnamese treated us rather badly for quite a period of time. That didn't mean that the United States of America wanted to interpret the Geneva Conventions any other way. In fact, they insisted that the Vietnamese treat us under those, and indeed for reasons that are still not clear to me, it was improved." McCain added, "We have to hold the moral high ground. We're the nation that people look up to. We can't lower our standards because others do. … There is a war that we are losing in some ways, as General Powell pointed out, and that's our standing in the world because of our treatment at Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo, et cetera. We have to keep the moral high ground."

On CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), Graham said, "What I would like to do is give our president the tools that we need to defend ourselves, an effective CIA program, where our agents can't be prosecuted for war crimes ill-defined; they can't be sued and lose their houses because they're doing their job; they can defend themselves in court if they're ever accused of doing something, by saying, 'I was following orders.' … If it's seen that our country is trying to redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of the CIA, why can't every other country redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of their secret police? It would be a disaster."

Sen. Arlen Specter, also on CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), added, "I agree with senators Graham, Warner and McCain that you cannot have classified information which is not shown to the defendant. I agree with them that you cannot use coerced confessions because they're unfair and unreliable. I disagree with senator McCain, Graham and Warner and the president trying to eliminate habeas corpus. That is, judicial review, because we have so many complicated matters. When you come to the Geneva Convention, we have to follow the Geneva Convention. But what I'm looking for is a way to accommodate both interests, and I think that is possible."

During his appearance on CBS' Face the Nation (9/17, Schieffer), Democratic Sen. Carl Levin commented, "We cannot claim that we are abiding by international treaties such as the protections in Geneva that protect our troops if we decide unilaterally that we're going to modify Geneva. And the problem with this administration is that it's had this unilateral approach to law and to many other things in this world, and it's coming back to haunt us. And if we modify Geneva unilaterally, it's going to come back to haunt us, because other countries are going say, 'you people don't live up to obligations. What we saw at Abu Ghraib is what the CIA is all about, and don't complain when we treat your people the way you treat detainees.'"

On CNN's Late Edition (9/17, Blitzer), Sen. Evan Bayh said, "We can be true to the Geneva Convention, but we can do it by amending the War Crimes Act to give clarity to our agents so they can conduct these intelligence interrogations, get the information we need to protect our country but protect our own people and be true to our own values in the process."

Responding to Bayh's comment, Sen. John Cornyn, also on CNN's Late Edition (9/17, Blitzer), said, "I'm glad to hear what he said. … But I do think it's going to take more than amending the War Crimes Act because when the Department of Justice passes judgment on whether an interrogation technique is lawful or unlawful, they're going to look at the whole range of laws, not just the War Crimes Act, to determine that. That's why we need the clarity that would be provided by the Detainee Treatment Act."

McCain Said To Be Risking His 2008 GOP Frontrunner Status. Fox News' Brit Hume, appearing on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace), said, "I might add this about McCain, that he is seeking the Republican nomination for president of the United States. It's pretty clear. He's supposedly the frontrunner. Another week of this, he won't be the frontrunner. In fact, I would say if this ends in some kind of a confrontation in which he, quote, 'wins,' I think his chances of becoming the nominee of the Republican Party are basically out the window."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, also on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace), asked, "Do we think if we polled the soldiers in Iraq, they would be with McCain on this, not with Bush? I rather doubt it. This is an issue of how tough we can be on the very few high- value terrorists whom we choose to have the CIA interrogate. It has nothing to do with the military treatment of other military prisoners. And on this issue, I think the country is with Bush. I think the enlisted men in the military are with Bush. And Bush is going to win."

The New York Times (9/18, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports McCain "on Sunday flew to New Hampshire -- and right into a blistering editorial from the conservative Manchester Union-Leader that assailed him for standing up to President Bush on the issue." McCain "responded with a spirited defense, invoking his experience as a prisoner of war as he vowed to block the White House effort." McCain said, "The United States has always been better than our enemies. I'll tell you right now: one of the things in prison, in North Vietnam, that kept us strong was that we knew we were not like our enemies. That we came from a better nation, with better values, with better standards." The Times adds that after "months of orchestrated peace, the battle with Mr. Bush over the administration's effort to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions has put Mr. McCain back into a familiar position: bucking the White House and at odds again with some conservatives, who had already been wary of his ideological views." The dispute is "shaping up as an early chapter in a shift of influence in the Republican Party away from Mr. Bush as he approaches the final two years of his administration, and toward its presidential nominee of 2008. And it is spotlighting divisions in the party as prospective presidential candidates jockey for support from the conservative wing." Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts "said in an interview that he disagreed with Mr. McCain, and offered a forceful endorsement of Mr. Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0063671

Relatives Of 9/11 Victims Urge Senate To Reject Bush Bill. The AP (9/18, Pickler) reports "34 relatives of Sept. 11 victims released the text of a letter they had sent to senators asking them to fight Bush's proposal. The family members said they do not believe 'that it is in the interest of the United States to create a system of military courts that violate basic notions of due process and lack truly independent judicial oversight. Not only does this violate our most cherished values and send the wrong message to the world, it also runs the risk that the system will again be struck down, resulting in even more delay' in prosecuting terrorists, the relatives wrote.

Krugman Claims Torture "Appeals To The President And The Vice President." Paul Krugman, in a column titled "King Of Pain," writes in the New York Times (9/18, 1.21M), "I haven't seen much discussion of the underlying question: why is Mr. Bush so determined to engage in torture? … So why is the Bush administration so determined to torture people? To show that it can. The central drive of the Bush administration -- more fundamental than any particular policy -- has been the effort to eliminate all limits on the president's power. Torture, I believe, appeals to the president and the vice president precisely because it's a violation of both law and tradition."

More Commentary. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (9/18, 1.21M), "Bush, Cheney & Co. are desperately trying to hold together a house of cards that is ready to collapse because their strategy and tactics for fighting terrorism were slapped together with no real regard for the rule of law. What we've seen over the past few years has been a nightmare version of the United States. Torture? Secret prisons? Capital trials in which key evidence is kept from the accused? That's the stuff of Kafka, not Madison and Jefferson."

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, writes in the Washington Post (9/18, A17, 748K), "The Soviets understood that these methods were cruel. They were also honest with themselves about the purpose of such cruelty -- to brutalize their enemies and to extract false confessions, rather than truthful intelligence. By denying this, President Bush is not just misleading us. He appears to be deceiving himself."

US Said To Hold 14,000 Detainees In Overseas Prisons. In a 2,230-word analysis piece, the AP (9/18, Quinn) reports, "In the few short years since the first shackled Afghan shuffled off to Guantanamo, the U.S. military has created a global network of overseas prisons, its islands of high security keeping 14,000 detainees beyond the reach of established law." The AP continues, "Captured on battlefields, pulled from beds at midnight, grabbed off streets as suspected insurgents, tens of thousands now have passed through U.S. detention, the vast majority in Iraq. Many say they were caught up in U.S. military sweeps, often interrogated around the clock, then released months or years later without apology, compensation or any word on why they were taken." Many experts told the AP "the detention system often is unjust and hurts the war on terror by inflaming anti-Americanism in Iraq and elsewhere." Some practices have been curtailed, and "living conditions for detainees may be improving as well," but the AP adds, "Whatever the progress, small or significant, grim realities persist."

Chambliss' Comparison Of Civil War, War On Terror Draws Fire. Roll Call (9/18, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Sen. Saxby Chambliss "argued last week that the South could have won the war between the states if the Confederates had just had better intelligence. During Thursday's closed-door Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on trials, interrogation and detention of foreign terrorism suspects, Chambliss made an analogy between the current war on terror and the Civil War. He made the point that history would have been altered dramatically if only the South had had better intel. Democratic sources expressed outrage that he compared the Civil War to the Bush administration's war on terror."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

BioShield Setbacks Threaten Deal To Produce Anthrax Vaccine. The New York Times (9/18, Lipton, 1.21M) reports on "Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion effort" to build a national stockpile of new drugs and vaccines that critics say "has largely failed to deliver." The "most acute" problems have come with the project's "$900 million push to add a new anthrax vaccine to the stockpile. What had begun as an effort to test and manufacture a safer, faster-acting vaccine has turned into an ugly battle between two biotech businesses. Each has hired Washington lobbyists to attack its rival's product and try to win over lawmakers and administration officials. Delivery of the new vaccine is far behind schedule, and a dispute between the Department of Health and Human Services and VaxGen, the company chosen to make the vaccine, could even end the deal."

DOJ_NMG_0063672

Fish Used To Monitor Water Supplies. The Washington Post (9/18, A8, Lee, 748K) reports on the bluegill's new task of "keeping vigil over the Washington region's water supplies, where it might be able to save millions of lives in the event of a terrorist attack." The fish "are a key component of the IAC 1090 Intelligent Aquatic Biomonitoring System, a new water-monitoring device that electronically analyzes the behavior of eight captive bluegills to detect the presence of chemical toxins or other contaminants." The system, also in use in New York City and San Francisco, "automatically trips an alarm, takes samples, and summons authorities by e-mail and pager" if it detects signs of stress in the fish.

"Path To 9/11" Writer Says He Has Received Death Threats. Cyrus Nowrasteh, who wrote the screenplay for "The Path to 9/11," writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M), "I am neither an activist, politician or partisan, nor an ideologue of any stripe. What I am is a writer who takes his job very seriously, as do most of my colleagues: Also, one who recently took on the most distressing and important story it will ever fall to me to tell. I considered it a privilege when asked to write the script for 'The Path to 9/11.' I felt duty-bound from the outset to focus on a single goal -- to represent our recent pre-9/11 history as the evidence revealed it to be." Nowrasteh adds, "In July a reporter asked if I had ever been ethnically profiled. I happily replied, 'No.' I can no longer say that. The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. … The hysteria engendered by the series found more than one target. In addition to the death threats and hate mail directed at me, and my grotesque portrayal as a maddened right-winger, there developed an impassioned search for incriminating evidence on everyone else connected to the film."

Freedom Tower Project Makes "Progress." While "several hurdles remain," the Wall Street Journal (9/18, Frangos, 2.03M) reports on "progress" made with the $2 billion, "iconic" Freedom Tower, as the state and federal governments reiterated their leasing commitments. New York's Office of General Services, the state government's property manager, signed a "nonbinding 'term sheet'" that is the basis of their deal to acquire "415,000 square feet" at "$59 a square foot" for "15 years," with the option to expand to "1 million square feet over 50 years." Meanwhile, the federal government's property manager, the General Services Administration, signed their "third" nonbinding memorandum of agreement that takes "600,000 square feet" at "$59 a square foot." This latter commitment will require congressional approval, one "hurdle" challenging the Freedom Tower's "financial viability." Another is a meeting this week to finalize the rebuilding framework for the WTC complex, and the last "hurdle" is whether the Freedom Tower can attract private business, since the only government agencies are the only ones to sign tentative lease agreements. If the federal and state governments actually sign the leases, the Freedom Tower would be on a "stronger financial footing" because the agreements could be "used as collateral to back construction bonds." And, the project will be financed from insurance proceeds and revenue the Port Authority collects at bridge and tunnel tolls. Also, the project appears to be gaining "political support," since Democratic gubernatorial nominee Eliot Spitzer, who once called the tower a "white elephant," said the lease agreements are a "crucial step in ensuring the financial viability of the Freedom Tower."

WAR NEWS:

US Working To Establish Secure Perimeter Around Baghdad. NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 3, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that the US military's "immediate focus is to establish a security corridor around the capital to protect it from insurgent car bombers but one analyst doesn't believe the strategy is workable." General Barry McCaffrey, military analyst: "I am skeptical in the short run anything will tune back this level of violence." NBC continued, "The plan within two weeks to dig ditches and erect sand barriers, the aim to funnel inbound traffic through 28 checkpoints, the purpose stop suicide bombers trying to infiltrate the city. This has been tried in other smaller Iraqi towns and has been successful but Baghdad is a sprawling city. This is a major security undertaking on short notice."

US, Iraqi Officials Claim Security Belt Will Not Include Trenches. USA Today (9/18, Sabah, 2.27M) reports, "Iraq's Defense Ministry said Sunday that plans to fortify the 28 entrances to Baghdad do not include encircling the city with trenches, as has been reported. Col. Qassim Atta, a ministry spokesman, denied that Iraqi and U.S. forces planned to set up a perimeter of new trenches and berms to try to staunch one of the bloodiest periods in the capital since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. 'The 28 entrances to Baghdad will be tightly controlled by the Iraqi police,' Atta said. 'But to besiege Baghdad with trenches is total exaggeration.'" U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson "said the plan had been 'mischaracterized' in the media. 'There are plans for a security belt around Baghdad in order to constrict movement through authorized checkpoints. … This has been mischaracterized by some media as a giant trench around the city. This is not what's happening.'"

DOJ_NMG_0063673

Sunni Politician Assassinated; Dozens Of Bodies Recovered. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports police in Baghdad "reported the discovery of 24 bullet-riddled corpses that had been dumped in various parts of the capital. Armed men also assassinated Muhammad Shihab al-Dulaimi, an official with the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni political bloc in parliament, while he was driving his car in the capital's Mansoor district, said Brig. Gen. Fadhil Abdul Muhsin of the Interior Ministry."

The New York Times (9/18, Al-Ansary, Adeeb, 1.21M) reports, "The police in Baghdad reported finding 36 bodies in several neighborhoods, an Interior Ministry official said. Eight were discovered in one area with gunshot wounds to the head and bearing marks of torture. But an American military spokesman said her office was aware of only 11 bodies found."

Sectarian Death Squads Said To Choose Victims Seemingly At Random. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, McDonnell, 918K) reports, "Evidence enough in the cold calculation of life and death in this capital of fear. A wrong turn, a detour, an untoward stare, a pointed finger, an anonymous denunciation, a nod of the head — these can, and do, lead regularly to death. Sectarian death squads snatch victims off the street or from their cars, from their homes or their offices, from mosques or hospitals. The killers come at night or day. They come in uniforms or civilian garb." The Times goes on to report, "Some bodies are never found, perhaps tossed in a clandestine grave, or decomposed beyond recognition, or dumped in the Tigris River or an irrigation canal from which they never emerge. So many corpses were clogging the capital's main sewer plant last spring that authorities launched an inquiry, with U.S. technical assistance. Investigators discovered a macabre pattern: Manholes from as far as several miles away had been used as disposal sites, allowing the remains to course underground through broad concrete pipes along with the city's subterranean effluvia."

Very Few Of Baghdad's Booksellers Remain. The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Raghavan, 748K) reports on the remnants of the booksellers on Mutanabi Street in Baghdad "the intellectual ground zero of Baghdad, they are the guardians of a literary tradition that has survived empire and colonialism, monarchy and dictatorship. In the heady days after the U.S.-led invasion, Mutanabi Street pulsed with the promise of freedom. Now, in the fourth year of war, it is a shadow of its revered past. Many of the original booksellers have been forced to shut down. Others have been arrested, kidnapped or killed, or have fled Iraq. … Under former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, Mutanabi Street was the nexus for resistance and freewheeling debates, where underground writers published illegal books that denounced Hussein."

Anbar Tribes Reportedly Have Formed Coalition To Fight Al Qaeda. The New York Times (9/18, Al-Ansary, Adeeb, 1.21M) reports, "Nearly all the tribes from Iraq's volatile Sunni-dominated Anbar Province have agreed to join forces and fight Al Qaeda insurgents and other foreign-backed 'terrorists,' an influential tribal leader said Sunday. … Twenty-five of about 31 tribes in Anbar…have united against insurgents and gangs that are 'killing people for no reason,' said the tribal leader, Sheik Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi." The Times notes, "It is unclear how quickly or forcefully the tribal fighters will confront Al Qaeda and other insurgents, who mostly operate in and around the provincial capital, Ramadi, despite recurrent American military efforts to stop them." Rishawi "said the 25 tribes counted 30,000 young men armed with assault rifles who were willing to confront and kill the insurgents and criminal gangs that he blamed for damaging tribal life in Anbar, dividing members by religious sect and driving a wave of violent crime in Ramadi. 'We are in battle with the terrorists who kill Sunnis and Shiites, and we do not respect anyone between us who talks in a sectarian sense,' said Mr. Rishawi, the leader of the Rishawi tribe, a subset of the Dulaimi tribe, the largest in Anbar. Half the Rishawi are Shiite Arabs and half are Sunni, he said."

Reports Of Tribal Agreement Disputed. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports "on Sunday, tribal leaders in Anbar province denied news reports that local chieftains had gathered recently and agreed to join forces to fight al-Qaeda. 'All the talk and rumors that you may hear about alliances or new initiatives to wipe out al-Qaeda by the tribes in Anbar is all pure nonsense,' Sheik Faraj Khalid Essawi said. 'We wish that we could build a strong tribal alliance against al-Qaeda to defeat them and reestablish security in our area and rebuild the dignity and the stature of the tribal sheiks. But frankly, we are unable to stand up to or to confront al-Qaeda because even the American army itself has not succeed in defeating it.'"

Iraqi Insurgents Described As "Only Loosely Related" To Bin Laden's Al Qaeda. The Christian Science Monitor's Peter Grier (9/18) writes, "The war in Iraq constitutes a perimeter defense of the United States. Simply put, the US is fighting Al Qaeda and other extremists there, so it doesn't have to fight them on American soil. That's the way President Bush sees the situation, anyway. In his speech to the nation on Sept. 11, he said that terrorists wouldn't quit fighting if the US pulled out of Iraq. Instead, they'd pursue their target, in essence pouring through a gap in US lines. … Is that really the case? Many critics of the administration think Iraq is not the foremost trench in a global war on terrorism. The enemy there, they say, is only loosely related to the one that struck at the American heartland five years ago. Most insurgents in Iraq are natives, not wandering members of a terrorist international. It's unlikely they'd look for further ways to target the US if it left, say some terrorism experts."

DOJ_NMG_0063674

Sailor Dies From Wounds Sustained In Anbar. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports "the U.S. military announced that a sailor assigned to the 1st Marine Logistics Group died Saturday from combat injuries in Anbar province."

Casey Says Iraq Needs 12 To 18 Months Before It Can Take Over Its Own Security. Gen. George Casey, the senior US military officer in Iraq, took Newsweek (9/25, Nordland, 3.12M) on a tour of Adhamiya, "a place that has been known for years as the worst neighborhood in Baghdad." Casey "says he's pleased with the progress he's seeing. 'It has worked,' Casey says. 'You see the reactions of the people on the streets.' Even so, the general acknowledges, 'there's a long way to go.' He says Iraq will need 12 to 18 months more before it's ready to take charge of its own security."

Bush Case That America Is Safer From Terror Because Of War Seen As Not Catching On. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "Polls show that a majority believes that the country is, in fact, now less safe from terrorism because of the war in Iraq. At every opportunity, Bush is pressing his case that things in Iraq are headed in the right direction-and that the war must be won. But with elections just weeks away, some vulnerable lawmakers may have shuddered after opening the Washington Post last week to see a column by influential conservatives William Kristol and Rich Lowry calling for the president to send 'substantially more' troops to Iraq to 'improve the chances of winning a decisive battle at a decisive moment.'" US News adds, "The op-ed column by Kristol and Lowry didn't create much of a stir in military circles, where talk about needing more troops in Iraq is hardly new. … But that's not what President Bush says he's hearing from his top commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey."

Deadly Bombings Kill Twenty-Four In Kirkuk. ABC World News (9/17, story 3, 0:15, Harris) reported, "One note from Iraq, now, where a series of deadly bombings today in the northern city of Kirkuk. 6 bombs killed 24 people and kill wounded 84 more. This was the worst of the suicide attacks in a long time."

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 3, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, back-to-back bombings today that took a heavy toll leaving nearly two dozen Iraqis dead and the death of an American. Fears of increasing violence are leading up to the start of the Muslim holy month Ramadan. NBC (Boettcher) added, "It was a wave of bombings, the likes not seen in the oil rich city north of Baghdad. … This is what coalition forces fear could be in Baghdad's future as the holy month of Ramadan approaches." NBC noted, "more than 200 victims have been delivered to the Baghdad morgue in the past few days."

The USA Today/AP (9/18, 4A, Barzanji) reports, "There was no indication who was behind the bombings." According to the AP, "the worst assault involved a suicide truck bomb. The explosion in the city center killed 18 and wounded 55, police Brig. Sarhat Qadir said. A few hours later, a car bomb was rammed by a suicide attacker into a joint U.S.-Iraqi army patrol in the south of the city. At least three bystanders died and eight people were injured. Two roadside bombs and two parked car bombs went off in other parts of the city, killing three civilians and wounding 21 people, including two policemen and four soldiers, police told the Associated Press."

The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports, "The restive northern city -- considered a likely flash point for sectarian violence because of its combustible mix of Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens -- declared a state of emergency and hastily put up dozens of checkpoints to thwart further attacks, police Maj. Jalal Mahmood Aras said. The attacks were the most recent bloodshed in a bitter struggle between Arabs and Kurds to take control of Kirkuk, the country's third-largest city. Iraq's new constitution calls for a referendum to determine whether the Kirkuk region will become a part of the Kurdish north.

The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Roug, 918K) reports, "There has been an upsurge in attacks during recent weeks in Kirkuk, where Kurds and Sunni Arabs have struggled for control of the city's oil wealth. Late Friday night, a bomb exploded in the Tiseen neighborhood, injuring three people. Sunday's attacks, however, were unusual in their scale and toll."

Suicide Bombers Kill Three Iraqi Police Outside US Base In Fallujah. The Washington Post (9/18, A11, Paley, 748K) reports that in Fallujah "two suicide car bombs exploded within minutes as the drivers tried to ram into a U.S. military base, killing at least three Iraqi police officers and wounding five others, police Capt. Ammar Yasser Halbousy said."

Iraqi Police Uncover Large Munitions Cache Near Basra. The AP (9/18) reports Iraqi police "have uncovered a large munitions cache in southern Iraq, near the area where a roadside bomb killed two British soldiers earlier this month, a spokesman said Sunday. Police received a tip that munitions were being stored in the town of Ad Dayr, near the southern city of Basra, Maj. Charlie Burbridge said. A raid early Saturday uncovered dozens of artillery and mortar rounds, as well as 100 rounds of high explosive shells of various caliber, Burbridge said.

DOJ_NMG_0063675

US Has Held Iraqi AP Photographer Since April Without Charging Him. The AP (9/18, Tanner) report the U.S. military "has imprisoned an Associated Press photographer for five months, accusing him of being a security threat but never filing charges or permitting a public hearing. Military officials said Bilal Hussein, an Iraqi citizen, was being held for 'imperative reasons of security' under United Nations resolutions. AP executives said the news cooperative's review of Hussein's work did not find anything to indicate inappropriate contact with insurgents, and any evidence against him should be brought to the Iraqi criminal justice system." Hussein "is a native of Fallujah who began work for the AP in September 2004. He photographed events in Fallujah and Ramadi until he was detained on April 12 of this year. 'We want the rule of law to prevail. He either needs to be charged or released. Indefinite detention is not acceptable,' said Tom Curley, AP's president and chief executive officer."

Kimmitt Optimistic About Iraq's Economic Recovery Plan. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) Robert Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary and presidential emissary for the Iraq compact, writes, "Ministers from around the world will meet today to discuss the International Compact for Iraq, an Iraqi government-led initiative to transform Iraq's economy and achieve financial independence within five years. If the Iraqis map out a credible and promising plan, the international community will support it, investing in Iraq's future. Additional assistance will be expressly conditional on Iraq achieving the benchmarks it has set out. A most important issue to be covered is how to develop Iraq's oil sector and immense oil reserves in a manner that benefits all the Iraqi people and serves as a unifying force across sectarian lines." According to Kimmitt, Iraqi leaders "will commit to pass a law developed through a consensus-building process that will share oil revenue among all Iraqi regions, enable development and delineate significant opportunities for private investors."

Minister Analyzes US Christians' Response To War In Iraq. In an op-ed for the USA Today (9/18, 2.27M) Oliver 'Buzz' Thomas, a minister in Tennessee, writes, "Three-quarters of the U.S. population consider themselves Christian. That translates into about 224 million Americans. So why are so few of us taking the teachings of Jesus seriously when it comes to this latest war? Out here in the heartland, only a handful of churches are even talking about it."

NATO Hails Afghan Offensive, But Violence Continues. The AP (9/17, Abrashi) reports, "NATO said Sunday that its two-week offensive in south Afghanistan was a 'significant success' that had driven Taliban insurgents from their positions and opened the way for development. But violence was unabated, with suicide bombers killing three civilians and wounding six soldiers." In another development, "some 400 heavily armed Taliban crossed into the western Farah province, taking control of its Gulistan district after chasing away the police and burning the district headquarters and a local clinic, provincial police chief Gen. Sayed Aqa Saqib said." Lt. Gen. David Richards said that NATO would not "dance to the Taliban's tune" by pursuing Taliban fighters who sought to thus distract NATO.

USA Today (9/18, 2.27M) reports that Lt. Gen. David Richards called the two-week offensive in southern Afghanistan a "significant success." He adds in the brief article, "This time, we're not leaving." The Taliban's seizure of the Gulistan district HQ is noted.

NATO Call For Troops To Afghanistan Falls Short. The Washington Post (9/18, Moore, Anderson, 748K) reports, "More than a week after NATO's top leaders publicly demanded reinforcements for their embattled mission in southern Afghanistan, only one member of the 26-nation alliance [Poland] has offered more troops, raising questions about NATO's largest military operation ever outside of Europe and the goal of expanding its global reach." Commanders resorted to the "highly unusual" act of publicizing their need for more forces "after 18 months of fruitless private pleas with alliance members."

The pessimistic article observes, "The North Atlantic Treaty Organization's forces are suffering the highest casualty rates of the nearly five-year-long conflict in Afghanistan, and as European governments are feeling stretched by the demands for troops there and in Iraq, Lebanon, the Balkans and in several African countries." In addition, public opinion in Europe "is also tainted by the war in Iraq, and a general frustration that President Bush's fight against terrorism has led to a deteriorating global security situation, according to public officials and analysts."

Afghans Express Anger At Government. The New York Times (9/18, Gall, 1.21M) reports that American and Afghan troops moving into Andar district found "anger and frustration" among the locals. The bulk of the article describes a meeting with "elders and townspeople" who complain to US forces about the government's inaction and the police's "preying" on the population.

DOJ:

DOJ's "Institutional Memory" Profiled. The Legal Times (9/18, McLure) runs a lengthy profile of David Margolis, "an assistant deputy attorney general and the Justice Department's most powerful career lawyer. … Margolis is widely described as the 'institutional knowledge' of the Justice Department. A notorious straight shooter known more for his love of country music and outlaw garb than his politics, he's managed to navigate the shifting sands of Washington to retain a powerful voice under Attorney Generals Janet Reno, John Ashcroft, and now Alberto Gonzales. Though Margolis is technically outranked by more than a dozen political appointees at DOJ headquarters and all 94 U.S. attorneys scattered throughout the country, his influence on the department extends far beyond his title, say both current and former Justice officials." The Times adds, "Margolis' bulletproof reputation and lack of partisan stripes also mean that the presidentially appointed attorneys general and deputy attorneys general at the top often turn to Margolis when Justice Department investigations venture into the swirl of national politics. From the investigation after former White House lawyer Vincent Foster's suicide to the ethics of Kenneth Starr's Lewinsky probe to the leak of Valerie Plame's identity, Margolis has played a major role in the DOJ's attempts to show that its law enforcement actions aren't motivated by political concerns." The Times notes, "Margolis serves as the Justice Department's chief disciplinarian of its federal prosecutors, helps choose U.S. attorneys and U.S. marshals, vets top FBI officials, advises prosecutors on when to recuse themselves from investigations, authorizes travel requests for the director of the FBI and the administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, and approves requests by political appointees to attend campaign events. In addition, on the rare occasion when a nominee for a presidential appointment is part of a criminal investigation, it falls to Margolis to decide how much of the investigation's information should be shared with the White House and the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0063676

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sentencing Of Several Enron Officials Slated For This Month. The Houston Chronicle (9/18, Hays) reports, "Open season for the Enron era's criminal sentencings is about to get into full swing. .. A few former executives-turned-felons have already received their punishments for crimes they committed within the disgraced energy company's walls, and two have lived in a prison cell. … But this month launches a string of sentencings for those who helped prosecutors as well as those who fought them and lost since Enron cratered nearly five years ago." The Chronicle continues, "The most high-profile sentencing comes next month for former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, barring any last-minute delays. Andrew Fastow, the former finance chief who is among the most notorious felons to emerge from the Enron rubble, also is expected to garner attention when he is sentenced later this month. … A jury convicted Skilling in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors in the government's foremost case to emerge from its sprawling Enron investigation. He aims to appeal." The Chronicle adds, "Skilling's potential punishment of 20 to 30 years in prison is comparable to the 25 years awaiting WorldCom founder Bernard Ebbers, who was convicted last year of engineering an $11 billion fraud that undercut the company. … Another Enron defendant convicted by a jury this year, former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard, is slated to be sentenced a week after Skilling. He faces a maximum of 30 years, but likely will serve half that or less, for one count of conspiracy, three counts of wire fraud and a count of falsifying books and records. … And a slew of Skilling's former underlings whose cooperation helped prosecutors win his conviction face punishments for their own crimes, ranging from probation to 15 years behind bars, depending on the offense and whether prosecutors recommend leniency."

Hewlett-Packard Faces Deadline To Turn Over Documents Related To Snooping Scandal. USA Today (9/18, 3B, Kessler) reports, "Hewlett-Packard has until today to turn over a massive stack of documents related to its snooping scandal to Congress, which has also asked four key players to testify. The House Committee on Energy and Commerce is investigating whether HP illegally obtained the home phone records of nine journalists and at least two board members. It wants the computer giant to voluntarily hand over nearly all related documents. Friday, the panel also requested testimony from HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, general counsel Ann Baskins and outside counsel Larry Sonsini, who works for prominent Silicon Valley law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati. Additionally, it summoned Ronald DeLia, a private investigator. HP has admitted hiring detectives who pretended to be reporters and board members to access their phone records, a trick that may be illegal under fraud laws." USA notes, "Other agencies are interested in HP. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to charge employees of HP and its subcontractors. The Department of Justice, Securities and Exchange Commission and FBI have also launched inquiries."

HP Leak Investigation Reveals "Rare Glimpse" Of Boardroom Turmoil. The New York Times (9/18, Darlin) interviews anonymous sources who offer details of Hewlett Packard's investigation of news leaks there, reporting that the "secret investigation" was "more elaborate than previously reported." The Times reports, "Those briefed on the company's review of the operation say detectives tried to plant software on at least one journalist's computer that would enable messages to be traced, and also followed directors and possibly a journalist in an attempt to identify a leaker on the board. The revelations at Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer maker that helped define Silicon Valley, have provided a rare glimpse of boardroom turmoil — resulting in Ms. Dunn's agreement to step down as chairwoman in January, and two resignations from the board. But they have also cast a harsh light on the questionable and possibly illegal techniques used in the episode, raising the possibility of criminal charges." The Times adds, "Those briefed on the internal review said that at various times, questions were raised about the legality of the methods used. They did not identify who raised the questions, when, or to whom they were addressed. But a crucial legal opinion, its origins previously undisclosed, was supplied by a Boston firm that shares an address and phone number with a detective firm on the case."

DOJ_NMG_0063677

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Charges Linked To Abramoff Scandal. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Pound, 2.03M) reports that Rep. Robert Ney last week "agreed to plead guilty to criminal charges linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ney acknowledged his guilt on charges of conspiring to defraud the public of his 'honest services' and making false statements. According to prosecutors, Ney accepted trips worth more than $170,000 from Abramoff, his lobbyists, and their clients. The Abramoff team showered him with campaign gifts, meals, and sports and concert tickets; Ney gave them legislative help."

The Legal Times (9/18, Palmer, Schwartz) reports, "In the two-count plea, filed in the U.S. District Court for the D.C. Circuit, Ney, 52, admitted to making false statements and to being part of a conspiracy to violate congressional gift bans by accepting handouts and free trips from Abramoff and his clients in exchange for pushing their legislative agenda beginning in 2000 until April 2004." The Times adds, "Ney is the first member of Congress to face charges in a lobbying scandal that has already ensnared six other lobbyists and government officials. Abramoff and his associates Michael Scanlon, former Ney Chief of Staff Neil Volz, Adam Kidan and Tony Rudy all pleaded guilty to bribery charges. David Safavian, former chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstructing justice in connection with his work with Abramoff. (Judge Paul Friedman denied Safavian's motion for a new trial this week.) … Lawyers familiar with the investigation say the government is likely to bring charges against other government officials, former Hill staffers and lobbyists in the coming months."

Former New Jersey State Senator Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/16, Martin) reported and powerful New Jersey Democratic Party leader and former state Sen. John Lynch on Friday "admitted secretly taking tens of thousands of dollars from a contractor while lobbying to help him develop state parkland, a stunning acknowledgment of corruption by one of New Jersey's most influential politicians." Lynch "pleaded guilty to defrauding the state's citizens and to tax evasion," and Jack Westlake, "a developer and longtime member of the Monmouth County Board of Taxation, pleaded guilty to a separate tax evasion charge. Their pleas marked a sudden end to a four-year investigation that began with an inquiry into billboard sales by two high-level aides to former Gov. James E. McGreevey," and "U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie called it possibly 'the most significant' case in his office during a four-year barrage of corruption prosecutions that has sent dozens of elected officials, public employees and contractors to prison. … He praised the case prosecutors, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Jeffrey Chiesa and Ricardo Solano, and lead investigators, Special Agents William Grace of the FBI and William Frederick of the IRS."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/16, Graham, Moroz, 399K) reported, "Christie said investigations spawned by the billboards case would continue, and FBI Special Agent in Charge Leslie Wiser warned, 'our team is not done.' 'Put this on the billboard: 97-0 and counting,' he said. … Christie called Lynch's plea 'a sad moment,' and acknowledged that the conviction might not change the way politics work in New Jersey. 'The problem is that you get rid of one set of corrupt bosses and another set seems to come in to replace them,' he said. 'It's up to the people of this state and the leaders of this state... to decide if they want to continue on this path.'" The New York Times (9/16, Kocieniewski, 1.21M) noted, "In a written statement distributed by his lawyer, Jack Arsenault, Mr. Lynch said he was deeply sorry for betraying the public trust and embarrassing his family, political colleagues and constituents." Christie "hailed the guilty pleas as the end of an era of political bosses that had led to what he called 'the corrupt McGreevey administration.'"

The Asbury Park Press (9/17, Malwitz) noted, "When the FBI exercised a search warrant at the office Westlake and Lynch shared in Tinton Falls, Lynch claimed he was innocent," but "with Friday's guilty plea, the bang of a judge's gavel in federal court forever tainted his name." The Bergen Record (9/16, Sampson, Maddux) reported that Lynch "is by far the most prominent of dozens of New Jersey public officials convicted in a series of federal corruption probes during the past several years. State Republican Party chief Tom Wilson was quick to make political hay of the news. 'John Lynch isn't just symbolic of the Democratic Party in New Jersey: He was the literal hub of the Democratic Party in New Jersey,' Wilson said. … Democratic State Committee Chairman Joe Cryan fired back: 'These types of things happen in both parties, whether it's Republican mayors in Monmouth County or Republican congressmen around the country. Tom should know better than to make these kinds of allegations.'"

DOJ_NMG_0063678

Former McGreevey Aide Disputes Claim Of Sexual Relationship. The New York Times (9/18, Jacobs, 1.21M) reports, "There were no fireworks, no swooning — and no sex, for that matter, says the man at the center of the political maelstrom that led to the resignation of Gov. James E. McGreevey." Golan Cipel "said in an interview from Israel yesterday that he wanted to set the record straight and dispute Mr. McGreevey's memoir, 'The Confession,' which is to be released tomorrow. He said the book was simply an attempt to rehabilitate Mr. McGreevey's public image." The Times notes, "At the time of Mr. McGreevey's resignation, lawyers for the governor said Mr. Cipel was threatening to file a sexual harassment lawsuit," but Cipel yesterday "said he wanted only that Mr. McGreevey stop harassing him. The F.B.I. investigated extortion accusations but declined to take action." The AP (9/18) notes that "Cipel said FBI investigators came to Israel and concluded he didn't try to blackmail McGreevey. 'I was just the only one with the courage to speak out,' Cipel said."

Aryan Brotherhood Leaders Avoid Death Penalty. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Goffard, 918K) reported that jurors on Friday "deadlocked…on whether to execute two kingpins of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang who orchestrated a decades-long reign of murder from their cellblocks. As a result, Barry 'The Baron' Mills, 58, and Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham, 59, will live out their years where they have spent most of their adult lives — and where their names already carry near-mythic weight: behind bars." The Orange County Register (9/16, Welborn) noted, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Terri K. Flynn said that even though the jury did not vote for death for Bingham and Mills, the trial was a success. She said the convictions in July should send a message to Aryan Brotherhood members and other prison gangs that the government will go after violent prison inmates. 'These two defendants have effectively been gutted,' she said. 'They will spend the rest of their lives hidden away in isolation in some prison.'"

The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M) added, "The judge is scheduled to sentence the two men to life terms on Nov. 13. Under the law, the prosecutors cannot ask for a new penalty phase." The AP (9/16, Flaccus) also reported on the deadlock, in a widely-distributed story.

Miami Seniors Press For Federal Action On Rising Medicare Fraud. The Miami Herald (9/17, Dorschner, 310K) reported, "When Muriel Sherman, 81, decided to go to war against Medicare fraud, she found a lot of seniors who wanted to join her. Her story, reported in The Miami Herald last month, has sparked a wave of responses from seniors with similar stories about their identities being used for widespread fraud that FBI officials estimates runs $1 billion a year in South Florida alone." The Herald noted, "Timothy J. Delaney, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami Division, warned seniors not to do investigations on their own. 'I would leave that up to the professionals.' Delaney, who previously was the FBI's national case manager for healthcare fraud cases, acknowledged that healthcare fraud is a huge issue here, particularly in durable medical equipment, a long-standing concern, and in expensive HIV/AIDS infusion treatments, which was first revealed as a massive problem in a Miami Herald report last year. 'It is a huge problem, but there are many people trying to do something about it,' Delaney said. Thirty of the Miami division's 390 case agents are dedicated to healthcare fraud."

Miami Federal Prosecutors Cracking Down On "Street-Level" Scams. The AP (9/18, Anderson) reports, "Borrowing a tactic used successfully against drug traffickers, federal prosecutors in Miami are attacking the problem by focusing on both the 'street-level' scams that typically involve between $1 million and $5 million in [Medicare] fraud as well as the high-dollar cases involving large health providers. Since last October, the effort has result in criminal charges against more than 100 people in 63 separate cases and civil lawsuits against another 38 defendants. All told, the cases over this one-year period involved more than $100 million in Medicare fraud, Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said. In past years, Acosta said, criminals widely thought that investigators wouldn't waste much time on relatively small-dollar fraud amounts of $1 million or $2 million." The AP notes, "The crackdown involves several federal, state and local agencies."

FBI Documents Detail Disgraced Philly Consultant's Fund-Raising Prowess. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/17, Budoff, 399K) reported, "When Democrat Bob Casey Jr. needed money for his gubernatorial race, there was one man he couldn't do without: fund-raiser extraordinaire Robert M. Feldman." He "also raised millions for other politicians, such as Gov. Rendell, Mayor Street, and former New Jersey Gov. Jim McGreevey," but "ever since Feldman got entangled in an FBI investigation into Philadelphia corruption and another in Puerto Rico, he has lived in exile from the political world he once walked as a king." The Inquirer added that "a remarkably candid portrait of Feldman's dealings has emerged from a court case and FBI wiretaps of conversations with the late dealmaker Ronald White. The documents had not been previously made public."

Gotti Lawyer Makes Closing Arguments. The New York Times (9/16, Williams, 1.21M) reported that during his closing arguments Friday, "John A. Gotti's lawyer acknowledged for the first time yesterday that his client had once been the boss of the Gambino organized crime family. But when Mr. Gotti gave up the Mafia life in 1999, the lawyer said, his withdrawal was heartfelt and true. … A federal prosecutor, in her closing arguments, said Mr. Gotti's claim to have quit the Mafia was a ruse to avoid prosecution," but Charles Carnesi "said his client had soured on the mob life. 'The message is: "I went to the very top of this life and it's no good. It destroys you and your family. It's not worth the toll,"' Mr. Carnesi said." The Times adds that "Carnesi attacked the F.B.I. tapes that are at the center of the government's case, particularly a recording from 2003 in which prosecutors say Mr. Gotti can be heard complaining about a demotion to 'captain' in the Gambino family. Mr. Carnesi said that the word 'captain' had never been uttered, though he did not say what the conversation had been about."

DOJ_NMG_0063679

Newsday (9/16, DeStefano) reported "Carnesi said that as a young man, his client was intoxicated with the respect his late father…received. … But after a few years, the younger Gotti…became disillusioned with mob life, the lawyer said. 'There is a point where the boy becomes a man; a man learns it is not like that,' said Carnesi, referring to the romanticized notion of La Cosa Nostra. Instead, Gotti saw the death of men he knew and days filled with 'treachery and deceit,' the lawyer said." The New York Daily News (9/16, Zambito, 729K) noted, "The jury of seven women and five men is expected to start deliberating Monday in the federal government's third attempt at convicting Gotti." The New York Post (9/16, Cornell, 608K) also reported on Carnesi's closing, under the headline "'Junior': My Father 'Freed' Me."

Gotti Lamented What He Saw As Decline Of Traditional Mob Culture. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/16, Caruso) reported, "As he languished in a federal prison in 2003…Gotti had plenty to worry about. … But at the root of his troubles was this: The modern mob, he lamented, was losing its manliness. 'Now are we men? Or are we punks or rats or weasels? You tell me,' he angrily asked one friend while serving a racketeering sentence. Gotti's conversations were routinely recorded before his release from prison last year, and the tapes have played a central role in his current racketeering trial." The AP noted that "the tapes provide an inside look at the gangster's code, particularly its obsession with 'being a man' at all costs."

High Court To Consider Murder Conviction Overturned By 9th Circuit. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Savage, 918K) reports that for Jim Studer, "wearing a button with a photo of his brother, Tom, was a simple way of bearing witness for him at the trial of Tom's accused killer, Mathew Musladin." Little did he "think the buttons he and his parents wore to the trial in San Jose would nearly free the man convicted of Tom's murder — or put the killer's case before the Supreme Court. But he had not considered that Musladin would someday have a chance to bring his case before the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals." The Supreme Court has long "cast a critical eye on the liberal-leaning 9th Circuit, particularly in cases involving crime and the death penalty. The justices will consider two of those cases soon after they return next month." The jury convicted Musladin "of first-degree murder and attempted murder, and he was sentenced to 32 years to life in prison." But Musladin's case "came before two" of the 9th Circuit's "decidedly liberal judges," Stephen Reinhardt of Los Angeles and Marsha S. Berzon of San Francisco. In a 2-1 decision, the judges reversed Musladin's conviction, saying that the buttons worn by Studer's family deprived Musladin of a fair trial." Judge Reinhardt said "the photo buttons — described by the prosecutor as 2 inches in diameter and by Musladin's lawyer as 3 to 4 inches — conveyed a 'specific message.' 'The buttons essentially 'argue' that Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty,' Reinhardt said."

Review Reveals Flaws In National Security Contracting Procedures. U.S. News and World Report's (9/25, Ragavan) cover story reports on the scandal involving defense contractor Mitchell Wade, noting that it would ultimately lead him and one lawmaker, former Rep. Randall Cunningham, to jail and "still more criminal charges" are expected "in the next few days or weeks, against some of the most influential insiders in the nation's capital." US News adds, "A two-month US News investigation, based on a review of hundreds of pages of court documents, private internal MZM records, and detailed interviews with a dozen key officials, shows how Wade used his connections on Capitol Hill and inside the Pentagon to gather inside information and turn his company into a moneymaking juggernaut. … The magazine's review also revealed fundamental flaws in the government's national-security contracting procedures and showed how Wade risked compromising sensitive government secrets."

FEC Looking Into MZM Contributions To Lawmakers. In its cover story, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Ragavan, 2.03M) reports in its cover story, "According to US Attorney Kenneth Wainstein in Washington, who is leading the MZM investigation, Wade admitted pressuring MZM executives to make campaign contributions. He also got 19 MZM employees or their spouses to make 39 different contributions in their names, which he then reimbursed-in violation of federal election laws. Virginia Rep. Virgil Goode, a Republican, received $46,000 in such 'straw contributions,' and Florida Rep. Katherine Harris, also a Republican, got $32,000. … Wade had other Republican lawmakers in his sights, as well. He tried to cultivate Mississippi's Trent Lott, then the Senate majority leader, by sending him expensive seven-fold ties, and North Carolina's Elizabeth Dole, by proffering a marble bust. Both declined the gifts. In all, Wade gave nearly $305,000 in campaign contributions-98 percent of it to Republicans." US News adds, "According to knowledgeable sources, the Federal Election Commission is investigating a number of MZM-related campaign contributions, including $12,000 that King and his wife made to Representative Goode."

DOJ_NMG_0063680

MZM May Have Had A Role In Getting US Troops To Iraq. In a separate story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Ragavan, 2.03M) reports that MZM "may have played a role in getting troops to Iraq, according to a national commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led to the war. The commission blamed the Pentagon's National Ground Intelligence Center (where Wade had analysts on contract through earmarks) that handled much of the military's prewar analysis of whether Saddam Hussein had developed nuclear precursor capabilities. The report didn't single out the MZM analysts but said that NGIC had 'in particular displayed a disturbing lack of diligence and technical expertise.'"

Hoekstra Seeks Probe Of Cunningham's Awarding Of Intel Contracts. In its cover story, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Ragavan, 2.03M) reports in its cover story, "The chairman of the House Select Committee on Intelligence, Republican Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, has also asked an independent investigator, Michael Stern, to conduct a separate inquiry into Cunningham's activities while he served on the intelligence committee. Stern, congressional sources say, has found that Cunningham corrupted the awarding of intelligence contracts, much the same way he did military contracts. The leaders of the intelligence committee are now debating whether to subpoena Cunningham to testify."

Armitage Revelation Has Reconfigured Plame Leak Case. Time (9/25, 4.03M) reports in its "Notebook" column that the Valerie Plame leak case "received a radical reconfiguring when former State Department bigwig Richard Armitage confirmed that he was the original source for columnist Robert Novak's revelation. Novak weighed in last week, calling Armitage's contrition bogus and the leak deliberate." Time examines the major players in the case including Armitage, Novak, Vice President Dick Cheney's former Chief of Staff Lewis "Scooter" Libby, The Nation reporter David Corn who "still sees scandal in Bush aides' efforts to tarnish Wilson."

Few Police Departments Require Four-Year Degrees. USA Today (9/18, Johnson) reports, "Since 1963, when the Multnomah County, Ore., Sheriff's Department became one of the first police agencies to impose a four-year degree requirement on recruits, only a few other local departments have followed. Less than 5% of local police departments with more than 100 officers require four-year degrees, says Louis Mayo, executive director of the Police Association for College Education. Most departments give higher pay to recruits with four-year degrees, he says, but have avoided requiring recruits to have them for several reasons. Among them: concerns about recruiting enough minority officers in increasingly diverse urban areas, and fears that not enough college graduates would be attracted by police salaries."

Kidnapping Victim Found After Sending Text Message. ABC World News (9/17, story 7, 2:15, Harris) reported, "A suspect is under arrest in South Carolina tonight, charged with kidnapping a teenage girl and holding her in a booby-trapped bunker, 15 feet under ground. And police say they were able to rescue this girl and capture the suspect, all because she managed to send a text message from a cell phone." ABC (Osunasami) added, "When her family finally received that text message, it was nothing short of a miracle. The 14-year-old girl had been held in what authorities describe as a booby-trapped bunker, underneath leaves and branches, 15 feet in the ground. The girl got a hold of a cell phone, left behind by the accused kidnapper, and was able to send a text message. Police were able to pinpoint the cell phone signal and were able to rescue her yesterday."

Police Seek Gunman After University Shooting. NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 5, , Seigenthaler) reported, "Authorities are searching for a gunman" in Pittsburgh who "shot five basketball players after they left a party on campus. Two of the players remain in critical condition." NBC (Okwu) added, "Police say the shooter, believed to be a non-student had been disruptive inside the party, encountered two of the players outside after leaving and opened fire. All but one of the students are new recruits brought on to help a struggling team."

National Guard Joins Search For Kidnapped Baby. NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 6, , Seigenthaler) reported, "In Missouri, the National Guard as well as state and local police are involved in a search for a nine-day-old baby girl. The mother said she was stabbed by a kidnapper. It happened in Union, Missouri." NBC (Shamlian) added, "The family's nightmare started Friday night when a woman interested the home of the new mother with a gun and a knife. The intruder cut her throat and snatched the new born. The 21-year-old mom survived. Her one-year-old son was not hurt. The FBI and the Missouri National Guard are combing the area for evidence. A bloody knife was found in the woods near the home. He says the kidnapper likely wanted a baby of her own."

DOJ_NMG_0063681

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Key Witness Says FBI Ignored Exculpatory Comments In Boston Police Brutality Case. The Boston Globe (9/17, Lehr, 425K) reported, "It was the most notorious Boston police brutality case of the last 10 years, and, in the end, the federal investigation hinged on what Officer Kenny Conley saw -- and what he wouldn't say. Conley was convicted of perjury and obstruction of justice after he testified that he never saw a drug-unit officer, dressed in plainclothes, who had been pummeled by other officers who mistook him for a fleeing slaying suspect," but "a Globe reexamination of the case has found an apparent and perhaps devastating defect in the eyewitness case against Conley, one which, for some court observers, raises the possibility of government misconduct." Key prosecution witness Robert "Smut" Brown, "a drug dealer whom Conley and other officers were pursuing on the night of the beating," said in a jailhouse interview with the Globe that "Conley wasn't the officer he saw, and that he tried, unsuccessfully, to alert federal authorities during the trial that they had the wrong man. … Indeed, he says, minutes before testifying, he spotted in the courthouse hallway the officer he had seen standing near the scene of the beating that night and pointed him out to Kimberly McAllister, the FBI agent in charge of the probe. 'She's like, "No, no, no, no, no, that's not the guy,"' Brown said. … McAllister, through an FBI spokesperson, said she does not recall Brown pointing out the officer in court that day. What she does remember is that Brown, fearful of police retaliation, didn't want to take the stand. Had Brown provided new evidence, McAllister would have immediately told prosecutors, said FBI spokeswoman Gail A. Marcinkiewicz."

ANTITRUST:

MAN AG Embarks On Bid For Scania AB. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, Singer) reports, "MAN AG of Germany launched a cash-and-stock takeover bid for Swedish rival Scania AB that values the maker of trucks and buses at about €9.6 billion ($12.15 billion) and would potentially form Europe's largest commercial-vehicle maker. The supervisory board of Munich-based MAN met yesterday to approve the move. Scania, of Södertälje, Sweden, hasn't approved the bid, but the German company is hopeful of the deal ultimately being friendly, said people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "A combination would bring together two of the larger makers of trucks, including 18-wheelers and light-duty commercial vehicles and buses. … Together, they would rank as the largest truck maker in Europe by market share, ahead of Volvo AB, of Göteborg, Sweden, and DaimlerChrysler AG, of Stuttgart, Germany, and third in global market share, behind Volvo and DaimlerChrysler."

AOL Agrees To Sell German Internet-Access Unit. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, Karnitschnig, Vascellaro) reports, "In the first step of a broader plan to reorganize AOL's international operations, Time Warner Inc. agreed to sell the unit's Internet-access business in Germany for €675 million ($854.7 million) to Telecom Italia. In coming weeks, AOL is expected to also complete negotiations for the sale of its Internet-access businesses in the United Kingdom and France. Proceeds from the sale of all three businesses are expected to total about $2 billion, according to people familiar with the talks." The Journal adds, "Though its European operations are profitable, AOL never managed to establish itself as a major player in the European Internet-access market, and Time Warner has since written off most of AOL Europe's value. The move to sell the access business, which is the core of the operation, comes as Time Warner has been paring its large portfolio of assets. It recently sold a regional cable channel for $375 million and has been negotiating to sell the Atlanta Braves baseball team, which is valued at about $460 million."

ENVIRONMENT:

Investigators Search For Source Of E. Coli Outbreak. ABC World News (9/17, story 4, 2:40, Yang) reported, "Teams of investigators from two agencies here at the Department of Health and Human Services have been working throughout the weekend to try to track down this deadly outbreak of E. Coli. In California's Central Valley today, the investigators are hunting for the source of the contamination. Food and Drug Administration officials tell ABC News the plant where the suspect spinach was packed shows no signs of the bacteria." ABC World News adds, "So far, they haven't identified the cause. In recent years, more people have reported getting sick from eating bad produce has been rising.

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 7, Allen) reported, "Food safety officials do not know where the tainted spinach came from or how the E. Coli got into it, reasons why the warnings now include all fresh spinach. The source of the contamination could be anything from the water used to irrigation to a worker that did not wash their hands. … Ultimately food specialists say one of the biggest issues is that we lived in a fast paced, eat on the run society."

Second Company Linked To Contaminated Spinach. The New York Times (9/18, Wald) reports that River Ranch Fresh Foods is the second company to be "\implicated in the E. coli outbreak linked to spinach, the Food and Drug Administration said late Sunday, and the number of identified victims is still rising. … The spinach that passed through River Ranch was sold under the brand names Farmers Market, Hy-Vee, and Fresh and Easy." The Times adds, "The federal health authorities are advising consumers not to eat fresh spinach. They said frozen spinach had not been implicated. The number of reported cases of E. coli infection rose by seven on Sunday, to 109, but officials said that the real number was probably higher and that reporting was probably delayed because some health departments were not staffed on weekends."

DOJ_NMG_0063682

The USA Today (9/18, Vergano) reports, "Suspicion has centered on packaged spinach sold by Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. The company has recalled all of its spinach packaged in bags, either alone or blended with salads, with "best if used by dates" from Aug. 17 to Oct. 1, 2006. A second company, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., which investigators found had bought spinach from Natural Selection, is expected to issue a recall of three packaged salad mixes, Acheson said."

The Washington Post/AP (9/18, A4) reports, "Natural Selection Foods, the world's largest producer of organic produce, has been linked to the infected greens, prompting a recall of 34 brands. They include the company's labels and those of companies contracting with Natural Selection, based in San Juan Bautista, Calif., to produce or package its spinach. On Sunday, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., added to its recall spring mixes containing spinach sold under the labels Hy Vee, Fresh and Easy, and Farmers Market, FDA officials said."

Associates Offer "Complex" Portrait Of Alleged Long Island Polluter. Newsday (9/18, Bernstein) reports, "Gerald Cohen could express concern for his employees: He would give them time off to take care of personal problems, send flowers to those who were ill, and show up at funerals for workers or their family members. But he also had a way of making employees feel insecure. Cohen bounced paychecks, never granted a raise or a bonus, withheld pension money and was unable to develop any friendly relationships, even with those who worked for him for years. … Most describe Cohen as complex," but "the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn says it has no doubt who the 72-year-old Cohen is: one of the nation's worst polluters. Earlier this month, Cohen was arrested by FBI agents and charged with failing to legally dispose of more than 11 tons of highly caustic alkaline chemicals that had been stored in two large tanks on the company's 125-acre property along Sheep Pasture Road, not far from Long Island Sound.

Boehlert Calls For Increase In CAFE Standards. In a Washington Post (9/18, 748K) op-ed, House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood Boehlert (R) writes, "politicians have handled U.S. energy policy the way BP apparently handled its pipeline: We've talked about it, we've taken some superficial actions, but we've failed to examine it closely, secure in our belief that everything seemed pretty much okay." Boehlert says, "The House repeatedly passed legislation to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, with proponents arguing that pollution from drilling is a thing of the past -- presumably a harder argument to make in the wake of this summer's revelations from BP." Boehlert writes, "The most important, realistic and feasible step the government could take would be to require automakers to make more fuel-efficient cars by raising corporate average fuel economy (CAFE) standards."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico Extradites Drug Cartel Suspect To US. There are more than 200 media references to the Mexican government's decision to extradite an Arellano Félix drug cartel suspect. For example, Copley News Service (9/17, Walker) reports the oldest of four brothers "accused of heading the ruthless Arellano Félix drug cartel in Tijuana was extradited by the Mexican government to the United States…to face drug charges in San Diego. Francisco Rafael Arellano Félix, 56, was escorted off a commercial fight at Lindbergh Field…after being handed over earlier in the day to U.S. authorities in the Texas border town of Brownsville. … Flanked by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Marshals Service, the balding, bespectacled Arellano Félix was rushed to a vehicle waiting to take him to federal prison, authorities said. … The decision to extradite Arellano Félix came the same day that U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza sharply criticized the Mexican government, saying, 'Drug cartels, aided by corrupt officials, reign unchecked on many towns along our common border.'" The San Diego Union-Tribune used the Copley News Service story.

The AP (9/17) reports the U.S. ambassador "praised the 'courage and conviction' of Mexico's President Vicente Fox on Sunday after Mexico extradited alleged drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix to the United States. Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter Saturday in the Mexican city of Matamoros, then flown across the border and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville after serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico. … U.S. officials have been pushing Mexico to overcome reluctance to extradite its citizens. When Mexico officials have tried to extradite major trafficking suspects, courts have blocked them."

In a separate story, the AP (9/16) writes that Mexico extradited drug kingpin Arellano Felix on Saturday, "making him the first major Mexican drug lord to be sent north to face drug charges. The extradition was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords. … Most of the seven Arellano Felix brothers have been arrested or killed, weakening the group. But Mexican and U.S. officials said the gang still moves tons of cocaine and marijuana into the United States from its operations base in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego." A version of the AP story was used by ABC News, the Washington Post, Wall Street Journal, USA Today, Newsweek, Miami Herald, San Francisco Chronicle, Dallas Morning News, and Houston Chronicle.

DOJ_NMG_0063683

Suspected Drug-Smuggling Tunnel Found Along US-Mexico Border. The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/16) reports the DEA announced it has "discovered a tunnel under the U.S.-Mexico border in Imperial County that apparently was used for smuggling drugs. The 400-foot tunnel reaches between a residence in Calexico and a residence in Mexicali, Mexico, said John S. Fernandes, DEA special agent in charge. It is about 20 feet underground, equipped with lighting and bolstered with wooden beams every few feet."

San Diego County Challenges California's Medical Marijuana Law. The AP (9/16) reports San Diego County "is challenging California's medical marijuana law in state court, saying it should not be required to comply with a state law directing counties to issue ID cards to users. At the same time, local police, working with federal agents, have shuttered all of the nearly 30 marijuana dispensaries in the county. … San Diego prosecutors said neighbors complained about one store in the summer of 2005, prompting an investigation that culminated in joint Drug Enforcement Administration and local police raids in July. Fifteen operators were charged with illegally selling the drug for recreational use to people who are not ill -- including one undercover agent who prosecutors said he got a doctor to give him a medical marijuana recommendation for his dog." The San Diego Union-Tribune, San Jose Mercury News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Contra Costa Times, and Arizona Republic are among the newspapers that used the AP story.

In Michigan, Federal Law Credited For Drop In Gun Crimes. The Lansing (MI) State Journal (9/16) reports authorities say gun crimes in Lansing "are on the decline because of a federal initiative that gives longer prison sentences to people convicted of them. … Authorities on Friday highlighted the conviction of a 31-year-old Lansing Township man involved in a multi-state drug operation. Benjamin Preston Foreman was sentenced this month to 25 years in prison; he had received five additional years because of federal gun charges."

IMMIGRATION:

DHS Set To Designate Contractors For Secure Border Initiative. The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Witte, 748K) reports the Department of Homeland Security "is expected within days to name a winner in a competition that could permanently change the way the United States conducts surveillance, apprehension and detention operations along its northern and southern boundaries. The choice promises to lend significant insight into how the government sees the future of border security, with firms offering rival visions of how that future looks. All year, the nation's largest military contractors have been locked in intense competition to team with the government on a program that gives the private sector unusually wide sway over a critical national security issue. … The resulting proposals are the latest incarnation of decades' worth of attempts to use technology to create a virtual fence along the border. So far, none have been successful. Recent initiatives have ended with cameras that failed to work in extreme temperatures and millions of dollars wasted. But with immigration legislation stalled in Congress, Homeland Security officials are gambling that this new effort -- known as the Secure Border Initiative -- will be their best hope of cutting the flow of illegal immigrants into the country."

Mexicans With Green Cards Provide Preview Of Guest Worker Program. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, A1, Millman, 2.03M) reports on "an estimated tens of thousands of Mexicans with an unusual place in the bitter debate over immigration. Thanks to quirks in the law, they have green cards enabling them to come to the U.S. for work stints. Many…call themselves 'subidos' from the Spanish verb for 'to rise,' because they do the grueling jobs of pouring concrete for tall structures such as grain silos for the ethanol plants increasingly rising across the Great Plains." The Journal notes, "The experience of the…Mexicans who use green cards to hop across the border provides some intriguing clues about how an official guest-worker system might play out. By quickly filling jobs and providing needed skills, such workers are a boon to employers. They rarely put a burden on social services, because they leave their school-age children and elderly relatives at home. Nonetheless, there is some evidence that the Mexicans drive down wages in the industries where they work."

US Farmers Forced To Make Emergency Requests For Foreign Laborers. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Romney, 918K) reports, "As border enforcement shrinks the labor force of undocumented field hands and immigration reform looms in Congress, growers have focused with renewed vigor on the need for a simplified federal guest worker program. For Harry Singh & Sons, which imported nearly half the agricultural visa holders in California last year, the federal program became a necessity in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001. With half its fields on the Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base, the company suddenly came under scrutiny by immigration officials. In a mid-harvest panic, having lost three-quarters of its workers, the company turned to the federal government. Singh & Sons' experience since then offers a close look at a program that growers and worker advocates alike agree is deeply flawed, yet crucial to comprehensive immigration reform." The Times adds, "Growers must generally ask the U.S. Department of Labor to certify the existence of a labor shortage 90 days before foreign workers are needed. But the harvest was in full swing, so" Singh & Sons' "filed an emergency request. … If all had gone well, those workers would have been vetted and approved by the State Department and then bused to Oceanside. But the Department of Labor kicked the application back for revisions, and by mid-December…$2.5 million in tomatoes had rotted in the fields."

DOJ_NMG_0063684

Mass Emigration Seen As Third World's Best Hope For Economic Development. The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (9/18, A17) writes, "In ' Let Their People Come ,' a new book published by the Center for Global Development, Lant Pritchett reports that if rich countries permitted extra immigration equivalent to 3 percent of their labor force, the citizens of poor countries would gain about $300 billion a year. That's three times more than the direct gains from abolishing all remaining trade barriers, four times more than the foreign aid given by governments and 100 times more than the value of debt relief."

TAX:

IRS Cracking Down On Partisan Activity By Religious Groups. The New York Times (9/18, Goodstein, 1.21M) reports that with midterm elections "less than two months away, Christian conservatives are enlisting churches in eight battleground states to register voters, gather crowds for rallies and distribute voters' guides comparing the candidates' stands on issues that conservatives consider 'family values.'" But the religious conservatives "are facing resistance from newly invigorated religious liberals and moderates who are creating their own voters' guides and are organizing events designed to challenge the conservatives' definition of 'values.'" Meanwhile, both "religious flanks are looking nervously over their shoulders at the Internal Revenue Service, which this year announced a renewed effort to enforce laws that limit churches and charities from involvement in partisan political campaigns." The IRS "issued a report in February that said nearly half of the 110 tax-exempt organizations it investigated after the 2004 elections for improper political activity were churches. Of the 40 churches that the I.R.S. had finished investigating, 37 were found to have violated the law. These churches were given warnings or penalized with excise taxes and, although none lost their tax exemptions, the I.R.S. is still investigating seven more cases against churches." Capitalizing on "the crackdown, the advocacy group Americans United for Separation of Church and State plans to begin mailing letters today to 117,000 clergy members in 11 states warning them to avoid 'any activity designed to influence the outcome of a partisan election,' by either supporting or opposing a particular candidate."

Targeted Liberal California Church May Defy IRS Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Glover, Sahagun, 918K) reports, "A liberal Pasadena church facing an IRS investigation over alleged politicking sounded a defiant note Sunday, with its leaders and many congregants saying the probe amounted to an assault on their constitutional rights and that they were inclined to defy the agency's request for documents." After "delivering an impassioned sermon about the investigation to a standing-room-only crowd of about 900," the Rev. Ed Bacon, rector of All Saints Episcopal Church, said, "These people are offended. Freedom of speech and freedom of religion have been assaulted by this act of the IRS, and I think my people want to be heard in court." The Times adds Bacon said "he would consult with attorneys and church officials before deciding a course of action but that the vast majority of parishioners with whom he spoke Sunday felt the church should resist a summons demanding copies of newsletters, e-mails and other records."

Refund-Anticipation Loan Practices Facing Legal, Regulatory Challenges. USA Today (9/18, 1B, McCoy) reports, "Each year, an estimated 10 million Americans, frustrated by weeks-long waits for their IRS refunds, turn to tax preparers who provide checks within days. Those checks are usually refund-anticipation loans, payments that are secured by and repaid from a pending federal tax refund." Due to being short-term loans, "the annualized interest rates often soar to 100% or higher. More than half of those who received the loans in 2004, or more than 5 million taxpayers, were recipients of the earned income tax credit, a major federal anti-poverty program, IRS data show." USA notes that there are several "recent actions posing legal and regulatory challenges to refund-anticipation loans: ·In February, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer sued H&R Block for allegedly misleading clients about the cost of the loans." That case "is proceeding even as H&R Block and its lending partners recently agreed to pay $101.5 million to settle other class-action cases filed over refund-anticipation loans. ·Jackson Hewitt, the nation's second-largest tax preparer, disclosed to investors in July that it is nearing a $5 million consent judgment with Lockyer's office to settle an inquiry launched in 2003 over the firm's refund-loan marketing." USA adds, "IRS Commissioner Mark Everson called the loans 'predatory' in a USA TODAY interview. However, he said, 'What you have is a real demand on the part of approximately 10 million people who, when they come in and file their tax returns, they want their money, and they want it right away.' 'And if the IRS were to step in and say, 'You can't do it,' I think there would be an uproar on this,' said Everson."

DOJ_NMG_0063685

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New High Court Term To Feature Controversial Cases. The National Law Journal (9/18, Coyle) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court's new term, which already offers controversial challenges involving abortion, affirmative action, punitive damages and global warming, promises to add significantly to the emerging portrait of the newly constituted Roberts court." The Journal continues, "The justices will open the 2006-2007 term on the traditional first Monday in October -- Oct. 2 -- but in an untraditional way. There will be no oral arguments because of the Jewish holy day, Yom Kippur. … But on that day, or as has become more routine in recent years, on the Friday before the first Monday, the Court will announce new grants of review -- as well as denials -- of cases gleaned from the thousands that came into the Court throughout the summer." The Journal adds, 'The justices approach the opening day with a relatively spare argument docket, having agreed to hear arguments in 31 cases, fewer than the number granted review at this time a year ago. But there is none of the uncertainty that surrounded them last fall as they awaited the arrival of a new chief justice and dealt with the impending departure of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. … But even if the high court only decided the 31 cases currently on the docket, there is plenty of potential drama and legal significance in that group, say scholars and court watchers. … 'There are some stand-out cases and each of them will test whether this is a "restrained" Court,' said constitutional law scholar Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University School of Law, referring to the abortion, affirmative action and punitive damages challenges. … Each of those 'headline' cases, he added, also reflects the influence of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who has played a major role or has cast the decisive vote in the precedents or doctrines underlying those challenges."

Hardiman Tapped For 3rd Circuit Vacancy. The Legal Intelligencer (9/18, Duffy) reports, "Two of the vacancies on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals could soon be filled now that President Bush has nominated Thomas Hardiman, a 41-year-old federal judge who has been on the bench in federal court in Pittsburgh for less than three years." The Intelligencer continues, "If confirmed, Hardiman, a former partner at Reed Smith, will fill the vacancy created in July 2005 when Judge Richard L. Nygaard took senior status. … Likewise, the second nominee, Judge Kent Jordan, 49, had served less than four years on the District of Delaware federal bench when he was chosen in June to replace Senior Judge Jane R. Roth." The Intelligencer adds, "No nominee has yet been named to replace Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who was elevated to the U.S. Supreme Court in January. … Hardiman is the former treasurer of the Republican Committee of Allegheny County, but also has strong ties to the Democratic Party by marriage. His wife is the former Lori Zappala, the niece of former Pennsylvania Supreme Court Chief Justice Stephen A. Zappala and cousin of Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen A. Zappala Jr. … Appointed to the Western District bench at age 38, Hardiman is one of the youngest 3rd Circuit nominees in recent memory -- but not the youngest."

Paulson Said To Be Returning Treasury To "Top Tier" Status. The Washington Post (9/18, A15, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "There was some chatter last week in the press about how new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is restoring his department to its traditional top-tier status after six years of downward drift under largely ignored predecessors John Snow and Paul O'Neill. Yes, we're hearing about how heavy-hitters have been filling top positions at Treasury and how Paulson talks regularly with the White House and President Bush 's innermost circle, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Some White House and State Department reporters say they detect the hand of veteran Bush spinmeister Jim Wilkinson at work in all this scuttlebutt. After all, Wilkinson worked at the White House and more recently at State before becoming Paulson's chief of staff just a couple months ago."

Earmark Reform Languishing In Senate. Roll Call (9/18, Newmyer, Ackley) reports a senior Senate leadership aide said the "two Senators taking the lead on reforming their chamber's earmark rules need to come up with a measure that can sail through the Senate before GOP leaders approve it." The Senate is "struggling to match the reform enacted last week by their House colleagues, and with the clock ticking down to adjournment, it is unclear whether Senators will be able to produce any workable rules changes." Senate Republican leaders are "deferring to Rules and Administration Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and ranking member Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a GOP leadership aide said." In addition, "similarly imperiled is a plan that Lott and Dodd want to push to eliminate the long-standing Senate tradition of secret holds, in which Senators can block legislation without identifying themselves. Republican leadership in the chamber remains opposed to the proposal."

DOJ_NMG_0063686

Bilbray Says Earmark Reform A First Step In Budget Overhaul. In a USA Today op-ed (9/18), Rep. Brian Bilbray says, "With the public demanding reform, the House adopted rule changes to the practice of earmarking that will bring more transparency to the legislative and appropriations process. For the first time, earmarks will be put in the public light where everybody will be able to see how their tax dollars are being spent. This is the first step of many in what must be an ongoing commitment from this Congress to blow away the fog of anonymity that surrounds our governing process." Bilbray goes on to call "on Congress to adopt a two-year budget cycle, so that election-year politics wouldn't influence budget and appropriations decisions. I believe that decisions about the budget process should be made after elections, not before them."

GOP Fiscal Policies Seen As Contributing To Possible Loss Of Majorities. In his Wall Street Journal column (9/18), John Fund says if Republicans "lose big in November, one reason will be their tardy response to public outrage over profligate spending. The guilty pleas of former GOP Rep. Duke Cunningham and lobbyist Jack Abramoff prompted demands for reform of the earmarks -- pork projects members often secure in secret -- that were prominent in both scandals." The Federal Government is "now an astounding 185 times as big in real terms as it was a century ago. A general sense that Republicans have forgotten why they were sent to Washington is a big reason why only 43% of Republicans approve of Congress in this month's Fox News poll. If Republicans can't better explain how they plan to get a grip on spending, many voters will conclude they both deserve and need a time-out from power."

NYTimes Criticizes Congress For Failing To Overhaul Lobbying Rules. The New York Times (9/18, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "One of the shabbiest shell games under way in Congress is the attempt to convince voters that lawmakers are curbing their corrupt relations with power lobbyists. The cravenness was never clearer as G.O.P. House leaders passed a placebo rules change in place of honest reform — and on the very day when one of their own, Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, was plea bargaining in the corruption investigation of his old friend Jack Abramoff, the disgraced überlobbyist and influence peddler." The "political ghosts of Mr. Ney and Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, should haunt this Congress and its Republican bosses for their disgraceful refusal to end the Capitol's embrace of the lobbying industry. In the first burst of the Abramoff scandal last spring, both houses made all manner of reform vows, then cynically hung two hollow bills out to die on the vine."

Boehner Clarifies Comments On Democrats' Commitment To War On Terror. House majority leader John Boehner was asked on Fox News Sunday (9/17, Wallace) if he would like to "take back" his claim that Democrats are "more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people." Boehner replied, "the point I was trying to make is that there's a very big difference between the two parties in terms of how best to protect the American people from terrorists. I could have articulated this much better, but the fact is, is that, if you look at the USA Patriot Act, we're trying to give the president tools to protect Americans; they fought against us. You look at the Hamdan decision that came down from the Supreme Court. Democrats were jubilant that the court was taking away the president's ability to do these military tribunals. And then when the leak came out on the terrorist surveillance program over at NSA, the Democrats were jubilant that this had been exposed and began to press the administration."

WPost Urges Boehner To Apologize. The Washington Post (9/18, A16, 748K), in an editorial, writes that Boehner "should apologize. … Whether one disagrees with Democrats on any particular issue, it is offensive to try to paint opponents, as Mr. Boehner did, as uninterested in 'protecting the American people' -- and to dodge the implications of that statement by claiming, as Mr. Boehner did, that he was simply wondering. As the election season heats up, this is a line of argument that Republicans would do well to drop."

USPS Granted Official Two Month Vacation Despite Allegations Of Improprieties. The Washington Post (9/18, A15, Williamson, 748K) reports, "All summer, federal-dom has been abuzz over a steamy U.S. Postal Service Inspector General's report accusing the agency's former public affairs chief of heavy drinking, expense account chicanery and sexual harassment. But who knew that the subject of the report, Azeezaly S. Jaffer, has spent the season on vacation, courtesy of the Postal Service? Jaffer's taxpayers' holiday bears witness, a Postal Service spokesman said, 'to how hardworking he is.' The June IG report accuses Jaffer, who managed a staff of 160 and a $20 million budget, of, among other things: drinking at a work function until he passed out; running up $8,000 in extra hotel room charges so he could qualify for a suite with a bathtub for two; and following a female colleague into her hotel room, propositioning her, then passing out."

Transportation Department Official Charged With Using Stolen Funds For Escort Services. The Washington Times (9/18, McElhatton, 88K) reports, "As a specialist on fuel cell technology in the US Department of Transportation, Shang Hsiung traveled the country for years to attend trade conferences to discuss alternative fuel and other agency initiatives." But Federal authorities "say the 54-year-old Takoma Park man had another agenda during his out-of-town trips. Since 2001, prosecutors say, Mr. Hsiung used counterfeit checks and stolen credit-card information -- including co-workers' card numbers -- to pay for escort services while on government travel." Charging documents "do not state how much money investigators think was stolen over the years. A spokesman for the US attorney's office in the District said the amount is not yet part of the public record but 'is in the thousands of dollars.'"

DOJ_NMG_0063687

Report Lists Six Key Trends For Overhauling Government Operations. The Washington Post (9/18, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that a report to be released today lists "six trends that are keys to overhauling government operations and improving federal performance. The trends were identified by three senior staff members at the IBM Center for the Business of Government with an eye to helping federal agencies prepare for an era in which incremental change may not be enough to meet public expectations or to address such megaproblems as terrorism. … The trends, according to IBM, are: Changing the rules. The traditional personnel, procurement and financial management systems are being replaced. … Using performance management. … Providing competition, choice and incentives. … Performing on demand. … Engaging citizens. … Using networks and partnerships."

First Lady To Headline Opening Of Clinton Global Initiative. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that First Lady Laura Bush "headlines the opening of the second annual Bill Clinton Global Initiative. That's Bubba's big effort to fix the world's problems. Rules are that every headliner must pledge action in a major problem area; the first lady will call for a special clean water program in sub-Saharan Africa."

Colleagues Praise Hyde's Accomplishment As International Relations Chair. The Washington Post (9/18, A15, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "The plaudits have already begun for House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), who's leaving Congress at the end of this term. At the end of a committee meeting Tuesday, likely one of the last Hyde will chair, his good buddy Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the panel's ranking Democrat, praised Hyde's accomplishments and asked everyone to give him a round of applause for his service."

Senate Urged To Approve General Officer Promotions. In the Washington Times (9/18, 88K), DOD insider Stephen Herbits writes that "Gen. John Craddock and Vice Adm. James Stavridis" will be facing the Senate Armed Services Committee for their General Officer nominations. Herbits warns that "it will be tempting for some senators to use the occasion to play 'let's beat up on Rumsfeld' instead of truly considering the merits of the officers before them." Given the growing reluctance of potential officeholders to endure the Senate confirmation process, Herbits counsels, "But the Senate has no place pillorying them for decisions they don't make or policies they don't construct. And as difficult as it may be for some, it wouldn't hurt if diligent questioning was also relevant and respectful."

NYTimes Urges Census Bureau To Change The Way It Counts Inmates. The New York Times (9/18, 1.21M)editorializes, "The Census Bureau has stubbornly rebuffed critics who argue that the nation's prison inmates should be counted at their homes instead of where they are serving time. But a persuasive new report from the National Research Council makes the current method difficult to defend. The Census Bureau commissioned the report, which deals with residency rules in general. In one of its most important findings, the report says that the practice of counting inmates at prisons sometimes distorts the political process and 'raises legitimate concerns'' about 'equity and fairness in the census.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Nears Record High Set In 2000. USA Today (9/18, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "Six years, eight months and three days after etching a record close of 11,722.98 into the history books, the Dow Jones industrial average starts the week just 162 points shy of topping that. If it succeeds, it will erase all of the 37.8% loss it suffered during the 2000-2002 bear market, a painful period on Wall Street that shook investors' faith in stocks." USA Today notes, "The mood shift on Wall Street is being driven by a few key trends, including…a belief that the Fed chairman's forecast is playing out. When the Fed decided not to raise its target for short-term rates in August after 17 boosts, Fed chief Ben Bernanke based that decision on the belief that a slowing economy would relieve inflationary pressures. He also noted that if energy prices retreated, it would also help abate price pressures. He's been right."

The Wall Street Journal (9/18, McKay, 2.03M) reports that in May the DJIA "pulled within about 80 points of its record high, only to tumble. It was off more than 936 points, or 8%, by the time it bottomed a month later. Many shareholders took the spring peak as a chance to book profits rather than stick around for even heftier gains to top the Dow's all-time high reached in January 2000."

DOJ_NMG_0063688

Inflation, Weak Housing Market Said To Imperil Recovery. The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, Trumbull, 58K) reports, "Some economists worry about a possible recession, especially if the housing market stumbles badly. Others fear that inflation will persist. But the stock market is riding on hope of a more moderate outcome: that the economy can continue growing, if perhaps more slowly, as a housing boom fades and inflationary forces diminish."

Fed Expected To Leave Rates Unchanged. USA Today (9/18, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "The Federal Reserve is expected to leave short-term interest rates unchanged when it meets Wednesday, given recent signs of moderating inflation and growth. A market that bets on future Fed moves was pricing a 90% chance that the central bank will stand pat this week for the second straight meeting. But there is less agreement about the Fed's long-term strategy. … Though core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy prices, has been running above the Fed's informal comfort zone of 1% to 2%...Bernanke and other officials have said in speeches and statements they expect a slowing economy to reduce price pressures."

Surprising Earnings Data Attributed To Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, Ip, 2.03M) reports, "Scorekeepers at the Commerce Department last month discovered that American workers were earning far more than previously estimated -- and that created an economic puzzle. The new data were out of step with other measures showing sluggish wage growth, a factor in widespread worker dissatisfaction turning up in the polls. … The answer appears to be stock options, a growing part of compensation for top-end workers. Accounting for them properly has been a major source of controversy for companies. Now it is complicating the government's economic accounting, as well. The Commerce Department's Bureau of Economic Analysis, which keeps the nation's GDP books, treats profits from the exercise of options as labor income. But options aren't counted in most other measures of wages. So the BEA reports -- which are important both to markets and the Federal Reserve -- may be overstating the extent of wage pressure, and, for related reasons, at least temporarily understating profits."

Democrats Plan To Attack GOP On Economic Issues. Roll Call (9/18, Billings) reports, "Forced to play defense on national security for the third election year in a row, Congressional Democrats have been huddling in recent days to try to sharpen their attacks on the one issue they believe puts Republicans on the run: the economy." While the economy "has long been a central focus of both the Democratic and Republican election-year platforms, Democrats in both the House and Senate have been working behind the scenes to redouble their efforts to draw attention to the issue." Democrats "in both chambers say they cannot sideline their economic message, even as they attempt to battle a powerful GOP political machine that's trying to paint them as weak on terrorism. Privately, Democrats say they believe they can tap into voters's anxieties about economic security just as effectively as the Republicans play into Americans' fears about their safety at home." House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer said, "Yes, they have the bully pulpit to talk about security, but that's the only issue they have. In all other areas, they have essentially been failures." Roll Call adds Democratic lawmakers "and aides say they believe the 2006 elections will turn on several factors, but in many of the top competitive races across the country — including contests in states such as Michigan, Ohio, New York, Indiana and Kentucky — the economy is likely to be the driving issue."

Polls Show GOP Closing Gap, Bush's Approval Rating Higher. The Washington Times (9/18, Lambro, 88K) reports Republicans "appear to be gaining on the Democrats in the 2006 midterm campaign because of growing confidence in the economy, falling gas prices and President Bush's sustained political offensive on the terrorist threat, according to pollsters and campaign strategists." National preference polls "on the so-called 'generic ballot' question -- which party's candidate voters say they would choose -- show Republicans have narrowed the once-substantial lead Democrats held and are now trailing them by three percentage points, independent pollster John Zogby said Friday." Zogby "credited the Republican Party's sudden political turnaround to 'the president's focus on the war on terrorism, a rebound among his own base,' and the Democrats' failure to lay out a clear plan of their own on 'how are we're going to get out of Iraq and what they would do about terrorism that's better than the Republicans.'" Zogby said Democrats "are not giving their Democratic base what it needs to hear on those issues. Republicans are severely wounded. The Democrats should be crushing them, and they are not." While "top election forecasters have pointed to an anti-Bush and anti-Republican 'wave' that they predict will return the Democrats to majority power in the House," Zogby said, "I don't see the landslide that others are seeing. That doesn't mean it can't materialize, but as of today, it's not happening and this is mid-September."

The Washington Times (9/18, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "'President Bush is receiving his highest job-performance numbers in a few months,' according to a Harris poll of 1,004 adults surveyed between Sept. 8 and 11 that was released yesterday. According to the respondents, 12 percent said Mr. Bush's job performance was 'excellent,' 27 percent felt it was 'pretty good' and 22 percent deemed it 'fair.' Thirty-eight percent said it was 'poor.'"

DOJ_NMG_0063689

ABC World News (9/17, story 6, 2:35, Harris) reported, "With less than a month and a half to go before crucial congressional elections, Republicans and Democrats are fighting, now, over who is better protecting America from terrorism." ABC (Marlantes) added, "Republicans are turning up the volume on what they see as their strongest issue," and "polls show its working. The Democrats' lead in the battle to take control of Congress is shrinking. For months, momentum has been on Democrats' side. Liberal activists are especially energized. Democrats are working hard to separate the war on terror from the war in Iraq, which polls show is increasingly unpopular."

Rothenberg Downplays Reports Of GOP "Surge." In his Roll Call column (9/18), Stuart Rothenberg says it is "a good idea to try to anticipate the ups and downs of this election cycle's stretch run, so when the inevitable stories about a Republican 'surge' hit the newspapers, you won't be taken completely by surprise." First, this "is the kind of cycle when long-shot challengers suddenly appear, even as late as mid-October. If the national environment doesn't change, Republican seats previously taken for granted could show up as vulnerable in late polling, as the Democrats experienced with then-Rep. Dan Rostenkowski's Illinois district in 1994." But since polling "across the country shows that Democratic voters already have rallied to Democratic candidates, some of these surprisingly close polls simply may reflect the Democratic generic vote in the district rather than a Democratic challenger's strength." Rothenberg cites the example of California's 4th CD, where Democratic challenger Charlie Brown's polling shows "him running virtually even" with Republican Rep. John Doolittle, but Brown "has the warmth of a second-degree frostbite. And that's before you get to the contradictory and confusing way he talks about issues and his personal philosophy." Second, Rothenberg adds, "beware of all national surges. And remember: Journalists always want a horse race, not a blowout." Third, "and this doesn't contradict my last warning -- don't be surprised if there is some normal 'firming' of the GOP base in the next six weeks that helps GOP candidates in Republican-leaning districts. In fact, I'm expecting it."

Republicans Seen As Likely To Retain Majorities. In a Los Angeles Times column (9/18), Niall Ferguson says, "For the Republican candidate in '08, it might actually be better if the Democrats did well in the midterms, because a brief return to power on the Hill would expose their chronic incoherence, making the case for a Republican comeback two years down the line. That scenario, however, is not on the cards. The leaves may be falling in George Bush's America, but the Republicans look like they're hanging on."

Senate Control Said To Be Within Democrats' Reach. In a sidebar story, U.S. News and World Report (9/25, 2.03M) reports that roughly a dozen of this year's US Senate races are "hotly contested. Most of the tightest races are for seats now held by Republicans, putting control of Congress's upper chamber within reach for Democrats, if everything goes their way." US News lists the Maryland contest between Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin and GOP nominee Michael Steele, the race between GOP Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger Jim Webb and the Pennsylvania race between GOP Sen. Rick Santorum and Democrat Bob Casey among the most interesting.,

Bush Said To Be "All Adrenaline And Testosterone" Going Into 2006 Elections. Time (9/25, Allen, 4.03M) reports that "as he stares down one last campaign, the President suddenly seems to be all adrenaline and testosterone. It shows in his frenetic schedule and in his assertive choice of words but perhaps most especially in his body language as he tries to win over midterm voters by looking and sounding commanding -- he's practically shaking voters by their lapels." Bush "has been on just about every imaginable stage lately. He went to Capitol Hill; gave a prime-time address; held the Rose Garden news conference; invited an anchorman into his limo, an editorialist onto Air Force One and a columnist into the Oval; held an off-the-record session for conservative radio hosts; and sat down chummily with a clutch of conservative opinion writers who had favored the war in Iraq but now think more troops are needed. That was all in nine days. He's so determined to be everywhere that he even did a White House interview with CBS's Katie Couric, despite his rough history with the network and the view among many Republican operatives that she's too liberal."

Republicans Hope 2000 Redistricting "Firewall" Will Protect Some Endangered Seats. The Washington Times (9/18, Lambro, 88K) reports one of the "last lines of defense that Republicans hope will repel the Democrats' attempts to win back the House are the thicker 'fire walls' they installed in their congressional districts under reapportionment." Three "top Democratic takeover opportunities are in Republican-leaning Ohio, where a gloomy political climate has raised Democratic hopes of a major comeback in the state." In the 1st CD, Rep. Steve Chabot faces Democrat John Cranley; in the 15th, Rep. Democrat Pryce faces Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy; and in the 18th, the seat of Rep. Bob Ney, Republican state Sen. Joy Padgett faces Democrat Zack Space. The races "are on elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg's list of 'pure tossups,' but Republican officials said the districts have been redrawn to withstand just the kind of aggressive Democratic offensive they expect in November." Ohio Republican state Chairman Bob Bennett said, "Both the 15th and 18th district lines were changed and strengthened after the 2000 census, as was the 1st district. I feel good about where we are and feel we've turned the corner, though it doesn't mean we don't have a battleground here. We do."

DOJ_NMG_0063690

At Iowa Event, Obama Says Democrats Need Tougher Line On National Security. The AP (9/18, Glover) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama "warned Democratic activists Sunday that the party must take a tougher stance on national security if it wants to succeed in the November elections." Obama, the keynote speaker at Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's 29th annual steak fry, said, "What Democrats have to do is to close the deal. We have got to show we have a serious agenda for change." The AP adds Obama's "appearance in Iowa, where precinct caucuses launch the presidential season, has raised a number of eyebrows about his intentions for a presidential run in 2008. Though only a first-term senator, Obama has burst onto the national scene." But he "wouldn't say Sunday whether he was considering a run at the White House." Obama said, "My only attentions right now are focused on '06. Whoever is looking toward 2008 without focusing on 2006 makes a mistake." The AP adds former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "also spent Sunday afternoon at the steak fry, and left little doubt that he is looking ahead to 2008." Warner said, "You know and I know that it all starts in Iowa. Do your part. We're going to take back the Congress this year and then we're going to take back our nation."

The New York Times (9/18, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Obama "insists, as always, that he is not running for president. But there are compelling clues that he is not exactly not running, either." The "most obvious was his keynote appearance here on Sunday at Senator Tom Harkin's legendary steak fry, a popular Democratic ritual in Iowa — and a prominent staging ground in this first presidential caucus state. The crowd rushed Mr. Obama when he arrived, then mobbed him for hours as other politicians wandered the fairgrounds introducing themselves and shaking hands." But "beyond his first trip to Iowa — a visit that was guaranteed to set off new speculation about his presidential ambitions — Mr. Obama is in the midst of an unconventional publicity tour of sorts. Fresh off a closely watched journey through Africa, including a stop at the home of his Kenyan-born father, Mr. Obama is about to publish a second book that supporters believe will outpace his best-seller from 1995." Obama's "40-minute speech was punctuated by applause and standing ovations but also, at its most serious moments, brought the audience to a silence hushed enough for rustling trees to be heard. It focused on the importance of a Democratic victory in the 2006 midterm elections." The trip, "which had been hyped for weeks, took on greater significance when news leaked that Mr. Obama had invited along Steve Hildebrand, a political strategist who ran Vice President Al Gore's campaign in Iowa in 2000."

Allen And Webb Clash Over War In Iraq. Tim Russert of NBC's Meet the Press (9/17) hosted a debate between Sen. George Allen and his Democratic challenger, former Navy Secretary Jim Webb. Most of the hour-long debate focused on the war in Iraq and the candidates' views on the continued presence of US troops. Webb advocated the gradual removal of American soldiers to bases outside of Iraq, while Allen said he supports "staying the course…meaning that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender." Asked if more troops were needed in Iraq, Allen did not respond directly but said, "We're going to need to do what it takes to succeed." Webb was also asked if President Bush ought to increase American troop levels in Iraq, Webb responded that the US doesn't have enough troops to do so "when you've got people now in the Army and the Marine Corps pulling their third and sometimes their fourth tours into Iraq. We're burning out our people. It's one of the things I was warning about early on." Later, Webb added, "One of the great problems we have right now in discussing this war is that very few people who have brought us this war have served, and very, very few of the children of these people who have brought us this war have served. And if you have to wake up every morning wondering about a loved one, you will look at wars like this much differently." Webb also encouraged the US to open diplomatic talks with Iran and Syria, saying, "Eventually, this is going to have to move into a diplomatic environment. Now, that's where this Administration seems to have blinders. They're not talking to Syria. They're not talking to Iran. And there are ways that we can do this, move this forward. If you look at what we did after Afghanistan, in the invasion of Afghanistan, we actually brought the countries around Afghanistan to the table, including Iran, by the way. Iran was cooperating at that time, before President Bush made his axis of evil speech and they stopped cooperating."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (9/18, Hardin) reports Webb and Allen "went to the mat over Iraq today as the increasingly unpopular war dominated their national TV debate." Webb said, "If we had the right people in the Senate there would have been more questions asked and a better policy in place in order to defeat international terrorism. … We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism, we have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there." The Times-Dispatch adds Allen defended "his vote in favor of authorizing the use of military force in Iraq," saying, "I think the world's better off with Saddam Hussein not in power." But Allen "tried to deflect, or sidestepped, a number of pointed questions from moderator Tim Russert on the war. They included whether Allen would have voted the same way if the Senate had known Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction."

DOJ_NMG_0063691

The AP (9/18, Lewis) reports Webb said President Bush's "terror-detainee legislation would weaken the Geneva Conventions and potentially subject captured U.S. soldiers to torture." Webb said, "We have to stay on the moral high ground." The AP adds Allen said "he has not decided whether to back Bush's plan to detain, question and prosecute suspected terrorists or another measure supported by Republican Sen. John Warner, Virginia's senior senator."

ABC World News (9/17, story 6, 2:35, Marlantes) reported, "Like many vulnerable Republicans," Sen. George Allen "admits the Iraq war has not been easy. But he says retreat would be a mistake." Sen. George Allen: "This is a central battlefront in the war on terror. And it's not just the President or the Vice President or me saying that. That's what al Qaeda says." Marlantis: "Allen's opponent, Jim Webb, campaigning in the rain, holds no illusions about his own party's difficulties on the national security front." Jim Webb: "What's happened is the Republicans have positioned these issues so that the other side is on the defensive."

The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports in a front page story that the debate offered "the sharpest contrast yet in a campaign that has become central to the partisan struggle for control of Congress this fall." The joint appearance "also confronted issues of race and gender and debated the use of torture in the war on terror. But the exchange largely centered on a controversial war that has become the defining issue of the Nov. 7 midterm elections." Webb "called the Iraq war an 'incredible strategic blunder of historic proportions' and said he has lost confidence in Bush's foreign policy. He repeatedly reminded viewers that neither Bush nor Allen, a former governor, had served in combat." Allen "steadfastly defended Bush's Middle East policies, telling moderator Tim Russert that 'staying the course' in Iraq means 'that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender.'"

The Washington Times (9/18, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Allen "said he has not decided whether to support President Bush's push to revise Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which regulates the interrogation standards of military prisoners." But Webb "agreed with Republican Sens. John W. Warner of Virginia and John McCain of Arizona, two former Marines who are concerned that the president's plan to redefine the provision to deal with terror suspects would open the door to torture of U.S. troops." Webb said, "What you're seeing is a split between the theorists who have controlled so much of the policy in this administration, theorists who have never been on a battlefield, who have never put a uniform on, and who are looking at this thing in a totally different way from people who have had to worry about their troops and themselves possibly coming under enemy hands."

Webb Claims Affirmative Action Programs Have Evolved Into "State-Sponsored Racism." Also On NBC's Meet the Press (9/17, Russert) Webb was asked to clarify a quote in which he equated affirmative action with "state-sponsored racism," Webb responded, "African-Americans are the only ethnic group in this country that have suffered from deliberate discrimination and exclusion by the government over generations. When this program expanded to the present-day diversity programs, where essentially every ethnic group other than Caucasians are included, then that becomes state-sponsored racism. And we should either move this program back to its original intent, which I support, or we should open up diversity programs to the point where poor white cultures --and they are cultures, as in southwest Virginia -- have some opportunity."

Webb Seen As Giving Allen "Truly Competitive" Race. Under the headline, "As Senator Falters, A Democrat Rises In Virginia," the New York Times (9/18, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "This race has become more than an intriguing clash of symbols; according to the polls, it is now truly competitive. Increasingly, Democratic strategists see Virginia as a prime target for one of the six seats they need to regain a majority. Perhaps most important for Mr. Webb, whose late-starting campaign has lagged far behind Mr. Allen's in fund-raising, the Democrat's contributions have begun to climb, advisers say."

Burns Facing The "Toughest Test Of His Career." U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Knight, 2.03M) reports on the Montana Senate race between incumbent GOP Sen. Conrad Burns and Democratic challenger John Tester. According to US News, Tester's "down-home attitude is clearly appealing to many Big Sky Country voters and has Burns facing the toughest test of his career. Burns's job is also one the national Democratic Party is eyeing hungrily in its quest to gain six seats and win back the Senate. The most recent polling put Tester, president of the Montana state Senate, slightly ahead -- a shocking turnabout for the incumbent." Burns's strategy "is to appeal to those who voted for Bush and paint Tester as too liberal for Montana."

Abramoff Scandal Not A "Decisive Issue" In Burns Reelection Campaign. The Washington Post (9/18, A1, Harden, 748K) reports in a front page story that in the Montana Senate race, Republican Sen. Conrad Burns "may be carrying" convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff "on his back, but in this thinly populated, Republican-leaning state, he continues to run neck and neck with his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, president of the Montana Senate. Poll numbers have not moved much in months." For all "the influence-peddling that has been exposed in the run-up to the midterm election, corruption on Capitol Hill has not become a decisive issue -- here or in much of the country. The Abramoff scandal, having ended the careers of a few lawmakers and stained the reputations of several others, can certainly rile up ardent Democrats, as the debate here demonstrated. But it is not making fundamental changes in the nation's partisan landscape, especially in races, as with Burns in Montana, in which candidates are facing only unsavory stories rather than indictments or guilty pleas." Burns said his "polling shows that most voters regard the 'Abramoff deal' as merely a political liability and not a damning verdict on his character. Several pollsters and observers of politics in this state agreed with that assessment." The controversy is "almost certainly the main reason Burns is in a competitive race this year, but by no means is it a guaranteed career-ender." The Post adds that despite "some early goners" such as Rep. Tom DeLay, Rep. Robert Ney, and Ralph Reed, in "strongly Republican areas, scandal-driven change is far from a sure thing."

DOJ_NMG_0063692

Republicans Still Hopeful That McGavick Can Unseat Cantwell. The Washington Times (9/18, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Washington state voters today "formally choose their nominees for the U.S. Senate, setting the stage for a West Coast showdown that Republicans hope will help them capture a Democratic seat." Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell "faces anti-war candidate Hong Tran in a primary that serves as the opening act for a race with Republican Mike McGavick, who is expected to easily win his own primary contest today." Republicans and "some pollsters think Mr. McGavick, a business executive who casts himself as an independent, has a good shot at ousting the freshman senator this fall." Cantwell is "not considered in danger of losing tomorrow's primary as did her Democratic colleague Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut."

Senate Candidates Not Required To Submit Electronic Campaign Finance Reports. In his Washington Post column (9/18, D1), Jeffrey Birnbaum says that in "one of the most controversial quirks in election law, candidates for Senate are not required to file their campaign-finance reports electronically. That means voters can't effectively find out how much and from whom their would-be senators have collected money until long after the election -- too late for them to act." A "growing number of senators and public-interest groups have been working for years to change this rule. They contend that it's only reasonable that senators should be required to file their disclosures electronically -- just as candidates for the House and the presidency do. In that way voters can easily see within 24 hours via the Internet what the candidates are spending and from whom they are getting their funds." Senators have "insolated themselves from criticism that stems from their very important, end-of-campaign donations because they have denied voters accessible information when it would be most useful."

Opponent Tries To Capitalize On Reichert Fundraiser With Rove. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Verhovek, 918K) reports a "funny thing happened Friday when Karl Rove, the White House advisor, came to the Seattle suburbs to headline a fundraiser for freshman Republican Rep. Dave Reichert: The congressman did nothing to publicize the visit, and his challenger drew every bit of attention to it she could." On the day Rove "was in town, Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft Corp. executive who is Reichert's Democratic opponent, issued her fifth news release of the week casting the visit in a negative light, and while Rove and Reichert were attending a round-table briefing for Republican donors, about 60 Burner supporters mugged for cameras outside." But both of Rove's appearances — "at the fundraiser and at the round table — were private and closed to the media, so there were no news photographs of Reichert, 56, with campaign mastermind Rove."

Graf Win Raises Questions About GOP's Immigration Strategy. U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Marek, 2.03M) reports that in Arizona's 8th congressional district, a founding member of the Minutemen border group won the GOP nomination despite the fact that opponents "attacked him as extreme, and the national Republican Party went so far as to buy at least $122,000 worth of ads for Graf's most formidable moderate challenger, state Rep. Steve Huffman." Graf's victory has raised questions "about the wisdom of the party's floundering immigration strategy. It has also put in jeopardy a precious House seat" in the mostly moderate district. US News adds that many experts say "if Republicans want to keep the seat, they'll have to unite behind Graf and convince Arizonan swing voters to do so too as well."

Mehlman's RNC Said To Be Outperforming DNC. The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, Cook, 58K) reports even Democrats "acknowledge the prowess of the political machine Ken Mehlman oversees as chairman of the Republican National Committee (RNC). When Mehlman came to a Monitor-sponsored breakfast with national reporters on Friday, the policy-oriented National Journal magazine had just released a poll of political insiders ranking the performance of the RNC and the Democratic National Committee (DNC)." National Journal reporter Jim Barnes noted it is "no surprise that 94 percent of Republican insiders think the RNC is doing a better job than the Democratic National Committee in the run-up to the midterm elections. The surprise is that 68 percent of the Democratic insiders agree that the RNC is out-performing the DNC." Mehlman "downplayed the role of organization in elections." Mehlman said, "The reason I am confident we are going to keep our majority is not because of our operations. It is because of the candidates on the ballot. We won in '04 because of George W. Bush, not because we had a smart turnout operation. 80 percent of politics is motivating voters based on ideas, based on ideology, and based on the candidate that expresses ideas and ideology. I think what has hurt Democrats is the fact that for so long you've had uncertain trumpets leading the party. And that makes it very hard to do the rest." The Monitor adds Mehlman "attributes a bump in the president's job approval numbers to 'a combination of speeches and realities in the world that have reminded people that a lot of what he is saying makes sense.'" However, he "did not want to make a specific numerical forecast for the Congressional elections."

DOJ_NMG_0063693

Democrats Lead Fundraising In Most Competitive House Races. Newsweek (9/25, Fineman, Bailey, 3.12M) reports on the DCCC's Red to Blue Program, which will have aid about 40 Democratic congressional candidates this year. According to Newsweek, "If you are a member…donations from strangers across the country will blow through your campaign mail slot like letters from Hogwarts. All you have to do is convince Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Chicago that you are worthy and that you can win." Emanuel says the program "is a Good Housekeeping Seal." Newsweek adds that "there is evidence that the Red to Blue Program is working: Democratic candidates are even or ahead in fund-raising in most of the races that neutral observers regard as competitive."

Emanuel's Brother Becoming A Political Networking Force In Los Angeles. Newsweek (9/25, Fineman, Bailey, 3.12M) reports that DCCC Chair Rahm Emanuel's brother, Hollywood agent Ari Emanuel "is fast becoming a political networking force in Los Angeles, issuing his clients and partners invitations to fund-raising events, including one for Rahm himself and for his House campaign committee."

Wesley Clark To Take Position At UCLA. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Trounson, 918K) reports Wesley K. Clark, a former NATO commander and 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, "will join the University of California, Los Angeles, this fall as a senior fellow, university officials are set to announce Monday. Clark, who is expected to arrive on campus about the first of October, will teach occasional seminars, publish policy papers and organize and hold an annual conference on national security, officials said. He will be affiliated with the university's Ronald W. Burkle Center for International Relations."

WPost Urges Universities To Eliminate Early Admissions. The Washington Post (9/18, A16, 748K) writes in an editorial "Harvard University's much-applauded decision no longer to allow the early acceptance of students should help ensure a more equitable admissions process and attract a more diverse group of students." But while Harvard "risks little" the University of Delaware "took a bigger chance last spring when it eliminated early admissions." So "as other schools ponder whether they can afford to follow the example…they would do well to note the widespread reaction of parents, teachers and guidance counselors who see the decision as a step toward easing the anxiety, tension and premature pressure that has come to permeate the process for too many students."

US Showdown With Iran Seen As Increasingly Likely. In its cover story, Time (9/25, Duffy, 4.03M) reports on "What War with Iran Would Look Like." Time says that from the State Department to the White House to the highest reaches of the military command, "there is a growing sense that a showdown with Iran…may be impossible to avoid. … So what would it look like? Interviews with dozens of experts and government officials in Washington, Tehran and elsewhere in the Middle East paint a sobering picture: military action against Iran's nuclear facilities would have a decent chance of succeeding, but at a staggering cost. … A Pentagon official says that among the known sites there are 1,500 different 'aim points,' which means the campaign could well require the involvement of almost every type of aircraft in the US arsenal: Stealth bombers and fighters, B-1s and B-2s, as well as F-15s and F-16s operating from land and F-18s from aircraft carriers. … Many sites are in highly populated areas, so civilian casualties would be a certainty."

Rice To Push New Iran Sanctions Resolution. In its cover story, Time (9/25, Duffy, 4.03M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week "will push her partners to get behind a new sanctions resolution that would ban Iranian imports of dual-use technologies, like parts for its centrifuge cascades for uranium enrichment, and bar travel overseas by certain government officials. The next step would be restrictions on government purchases of computer software and hardware, office supplies, tires and auto parts -- steps Russia and China have signaled some reluctance to endorse. But even Rice's advisers don't believe that Iran can be persuaded to completely abandon its ambitions. Instead, they hope to tie Iran up in a series of suspensions, delays and negotiations until a more pragmatic faction of leadership in Tehran gains the upper hand."

Iran May Be Years Away From Producing A Nuclear Bomb. Newsweek (9/25, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column that last week the House intelligence committee's assessment of Iran's nuclear program "was slammed by UN nuclear experts, who pointed out that there's little evidence Iran is anywhere near producing weapons-grade uranium. And three US officials familiar with recent intel reporting on Iran, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitive subject matter, said that US agencies have not altered assessments that Iran is years away from producing a nuclear bomb. … David Albright, a former UN WMD inspector and independent expert, told NEWSWEEK: 'Iran's gas-centrifuge program is moving unexpectedly slowly. The program was expected to be much further along by this point.'" Another of US official "said intel reports show Iran was experiencing significant problems with gyroscopes it has been trying to install on missiles that could deliver Iranian bombs to targets in the region and even further."

DOJ_NMG_0063694

Iranian President Says US, Iran Are Not Fated To Be In Conflict. As part of its cover package, Time (9/25, MacLeod, 4.03M) interviews Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Asked what he would say to President Bush if he could sit down with him, Ahmadinejad said, "The issues which are of interest to us are the international issues and how to manage them. I gave some recommendations to President Bush in my personal letter, and I hope that he will take note of them. I would ask him, Are rationalism, spirituality and humanitarianism and logic are they bad things for human beings? Why more conflict? Why should we go for hostilities? Why should we develop weapons of mass destruction? Everybody can love one another." Asked why his supporters chant "Death to America," Ahmadinejad said, "When they chanted that slogan, it means they hate aggression, and they hate bullying tactics, and they hate violations of the rights of nations and discrimination. I recommended to President Bush that he can change his behavior, then everything will change." Ahmadinejad was also asked if the US and Iran are fated to be in conflict. He said, "No, this is not fate. And this can come to an end. I have said we can run the world through logic. We are living our own lives. The US government should not interfere in our affairs. They should live their own lives. They should serve the interests of the US people. They should not interfere in our affairs. Then there would be no problems with that."

Bush, Ahmadinejad To Address UN General Assembly. USA Today (9/18, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad deliver dueling speeches at the United Nations this week in what could become a dramatic showdown over Iran's nuclear program." Bush "has pledged to use his UN talk to send Iran a clear warning that it must heed a UN Security Council resolution calling on it to suspend its program to make nuclear fuel. Iran says its program is for peaceful purposes, while Bush says Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons." The two leaders "are scheduled to speak hours apart Tuesday at the annual meeting of heads of state of the General Assembly."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/18, LaFranchi, 58K) says Bush "will studiously avoid… Amadinejad. And Mr. Bush probably won't take up the controversial leader's challenge to the American president to face him in a 'civilizational debate.'" But "Bush does plan to lay out his vision for the world, including an elaboration of his "freedom agenda" and the role of democracy in building global security, when he addresses the 192-country assembly Tuesday."

Under the headline, "Europeans Trying to Grease Wheels for US Talks With Iran," the Washington Post (9/18, A14, Linzer, 748K) reports, "European efforts to get Iran and the United States around the same negotiating table are at an advanced yet sensitive stage, with a small number of remaining differences to be tackled this week when world leaders gather at the United Nations." In his UN speech tomorrow, President Bush will detail "why he regards the Tehran government as a grave threat yet is willing to support negotiations to ease those concerns." The Post adds that since 2002, Bush "has sought, without success, to roll back" Iran's nuclear program, however, many allies have "been wary of supporting a U.S. president who has invaded two countries in the past five years and who has said that 'all options are on the table' for Iran." Bush and Secretary Rice "will meet with allies" in New York "to discuss prospects for talks as well as options if those do not materialize." Rice had dinner last night with EU foreign policy head Javier Solana, who is said to be "waiting for [Ali] Larijani to deliver a firm commitment from his government to halt its uranium enrichment program." Administration "officials expressed skepticism, however, that Larijani would be able to secure that commitment. They said the administration has not made preparations for talks, such as formalizing a negotiating team or outlining guiding principles for discussion." The Post adds, "Through Solana and other mediators, [Tehran has] said it would be hard for them to sit down with a U.S. administration that is seen as threatening the Iranian leadership." Tomorrow night, Rice is slated to have dinner with her counterparts from France, Britain, Germany, Russia, China and Italy "to discuss Iran."

The Financial Times (9/18, Guha, Giles, Dombey) follows Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson's work on Iran at the IMF and World Bank meetings in Singapore. Washington "is seeking to increase economic pressure on Iran, even as its partners in the European Union talk to the Islamic Republic about beginning formal negotiations on Tehran's nuclear programme." Paulson "is personally lobbying finance ministers and central bank governors to ensure their national financial systems are not used by Iranian entities involved in proliferation or terrorism finance. But his efforts have irritated some European officials, who have objected to what they see as Washington's moves to impose sanctions on Iran through the back door." The EU continues a "diplomatic push to open negotiations as an alternative to sanctions – which, in any case, face serious obstacles at the UN."

Chirac Calls For Negotiations With Iran, Delay In Action On Sanctions. The Australia Daily Telegraph (9/18) reports this morning, "French President Jacques Chirac has urged world powers not to refer Iran to the UN Security Council over its nuclear program, at the same time calling on Tehran to give up uranium enrichment. 'First we have to find an agenda for negotiation, then engage the negotiation and during that negotiation I propose that on the one hand the six refrain from referring the issue to the Security Council and that Iran renounce during the negotiation the enrichment of uranium,' he said." The Daily Telegraph adds, "Mr Chirac said that he was 'never a supporter of sanctions' and had 'never noticed that sanctions are effective'. However he added that he 'did not mean that we must not have sanctions -- which if it comes to it must be moderate and well-adapted'."

DOJ_NMG_0063695

Bush's Attitude Toward UN Said To Have Changed. The Washington Times (9/18, Curl, 88K) reports, "Bush, who once said the United Nations was teetering on the brink of irrelevancy and demanded it show some backbone, has increasingly turned to the organization for international problem-solving, even as most Americans think the body has outlived its usefulness." On issues "from North Korea to Iran to Sudan, the president….has deferred to the United Nations to drive action." The Times adds, "Critics say Mr. Bush has been forced to become more multilateral after bucking the world body by invading Iraq, but administration officials assert that the United Nations remains a useful tool to spur foreign leaders to step in on major issues."

USA Today (9/18, Jackson, 2.27M) reports Bush and United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan "say they get along fine on a personal level. It's the issues, from the Iraq war to nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea, that divide them." Noting those "lingering US-UN tensions," USA Today reports Bush said Fridsay that "the UN has been slow to address growing violence in the Darfur region of the Sudan and again questioned the institution's stewardship of its finances." Annan, "at a news conference of his own last week, cited the biggest conflict of them all: Iraq. Asked about a recent visit to the Middle East, Annan said, 'Most of the leaders I spoke to felt that the invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them.'" Annan "said his overall relations with the Bush administration 'are very good,' including with the president himself. For his part, Bush said of Annan: 'I like him. And we've got a good relationship, personal relationship.'"

Hezbollah Leader Plans Celebration Of "Victory" Over Israel. The AP (9/18) reports, "Hezbollah's leader called Sunday for a massive rally in Beirut's bombed out southern suburbs to mark the militant group's 'victory' over Israel during the monthlong fighting this summer." Sheik Hassan Nasrallah "said the rally, to be held Friday evening, would show Hezbollah's 'absolute commitment to our right to recover our land and prisoners and defend our nation, its dignity, freedom, sovereignty and real and full independence in the face of (Israeli) occupation.'"

Israeli Panel To Investigate Conduct Of Lebanon War. The New York Times (9/18, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "The Israeli government established a committee on Sunday to investigate the political and military leadership's handling of the recent war in Lebanon, which has come under intense public criticism in the month since the fighting ended." In Israel, "many citizens say that the military campaign in Lebanon was poorly planned and executed, and that leaders should be held accountable." The committee "will examine the political leadership and the security echelon regarding all aspects of the campaign in Lebanon," Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Ellingwood, 918K), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Pope Expresses Regret That His Comments Sparked Violence In Muslim World. ABC World News (9/17, lead story, 2:40, Harris) reported Pope Benedict "is facing the worst crisis since he was elected last year. Today, he said he's sorry that remarks he made recently about Islam touched off protests and violence, from Pakistan to Palestine and beyond. But the Pope did not issue a retraction. And many Muslims are saying they want a full apology. Tonight, there are real concerns about continuing violence." ABC (Wright) added, "When the Pope took on the Prophet, he clearly did not foresee this -- angry mobs of true believers across the Muslim world. Not exactly the sort of interfaith dialogue he had hoped to spark. Today, amid heavy rains and heavy security, at his summer retreat, Benedict tried to calm to storm. 'I am deeply sorry,' he said, 'for the reactions in some countries to a few passages of my speech.' He explained that the offending remarks, made last week at Regansburg University in Germany, were quotations from a medieval text, not his own views. He was quoting a 14th century Christian emperor sharply critical of the prophet Mohammad; the Pope had tacitly criticized spreading religion through the point of a sword. Benedict then said 'Jihad, or holy war' is 'incompatible with the nature of God.' Some Muslim leaders called that the start of a new crusade."

